An Expositional Commentary
ROMANS
Volume 4
The New Humanity
(Romans 12–16)
James Montgomery Boice
ROMANS
ROMANS
ROMANS
ROMANS

Romans, Volume 1
Justification by Faith (Romans 1-4)

To HIM who was delivered over to death for our sins and was raised to life for our justification

Preface

It is a formidable task to begin a study of Paul's great letter to the Romans, and exciting, too. I felt those emotions as I began these studies nearly four years ago, and I still feel them. Perhaps you feel them also, perhaps even as you hold this book in your hand and read this preface.

There are very good reasons for these feelings. For one thing, Romans has probably been the object of more intense study by more highly intelligent and motivated individuals than any document in human history. A document like the United States Constitution has also been intensely studied, of course. But interest in even so important a document as that is confined largely to one nation, while Romans has been of profound interest to people wherever Christianity has spread. Romans has been studied by many millions of persons and for nearly two millennia, that is, from the time of the apostle Paul, its author and the first great missionary of the Christian church, to the present.

The list of the most monumental and helpful commentators on Romans is a virtual history of Christianity. To study this book is to walk in the footsteps, not only of the apostle Paul, but of such theological and pastoral giants as Martin Luther, John Calvin, Robert Haldane, Charles Hodge, D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones, and many others.

But, in my opinion, it is not just this impressive array of prior witnesses that we find daunting. The real reason for our anxiety is the suspicion that a study of Romans will change us profoundly and unalterably. For that is what it was meant to do, after all! And what it has already done! In the opening chapter, I quote F. Godet as saying that there has never been and probably never will be an important spiritual movement in the history of the church that cannot be connected as cause and effect with a deeper knowledge of the truths of this book. That is true. But it is not just church history that has been influenced by Romans. Individuals have been so affected by this great epistle that they have been moved to risk everything for Jesus Christ. If they have been, what is to keep this from becoming our own experience?

We all fear change, of course. It makes us anxious. But change is precisely what we need. If we are spiritually moribund, we need to be brought from a state of spiritual death into a state of spiritual life through the gospel. If we are lethargic in our discipleship, we need to be awakened to the glories of a renewed life in Christ. If we are indifferent to the spiritual state of others, we need to be alerted to their peril apart from Christ and be moved to take the gospel to them.

I confess that I have been instructed, moved, and even deeply stirred, by my own studies. Above all, I have been convicted of how shallow I have been in my understanding of the gospel; indeed, how shallow most of our evangelical Christianity, particularly in America, has been. I used to say that American Christianity at best has mastered Romans 1 through 4, and has not even begun to understand Romans 5 through 8, not to mention the remainder of the letter. But today I am not sure we have even mastered the first four chapters. How often do we hear the depravity of the race discussed, as Paul discusses it in Romans 1? How often do we hear that from God's perspective, man is utterly depraved, as Paul says in Romans 3? How often do we hear messages on propitiation, redemption, justification, or faith, the central doctrines of the great latter half of Romans 3? Or the proof of these truths from the Old Testament, which is the burden of Romans 4?

Instead, we cling to man-centered, need-oriented teaching. And our churches show it! They are successful in worldly terms—big buildings, big budgets, big everything—but they suffer from a poverty of soul.

All this means, in my judgment at least, that it is time to get back to the basic, life-transforming doctrines of Christianity—which is to say that it is time to rediscover Romans. I invite you to discover it again with me, through this volume and those to follow. The congregation of Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, where I have served as pastor for more than twenty years, has already been doing this, since these are the messages I preached to the morning congregation for nearly two years between September 1986 and June 1988. Listeners of The Bible Study Hour will know that these studies were also aired over the radio from 1987 to 1989. As usual in the preface to my books, I wish to thank the officers and members of Tenth Presbyterian Church for permitting me to invest so much of my time in study and in the preparation of these sermons.

Who knows what God will do for us as we again discover and attempt to live out the great truths of the gospel! May he give us a Great Awakening. We certainly need it. May he even give us a new Reformation.

An Introduction to Romans

Romans 1:1-7

With those powerful opening words, written nearly two thousand years ago in the bustling commercial city of Corinth, Greece, a Jewish Christian began a letter to believers whom he had never seen in the far-off city of Rome. What a letter it was! In any other circumstances and by any other hand, the letter might have been a mere incidental piece of correspondence. But the author of this letter was the apostle Paul, and by his hand and under the guidance of the Holy Spirit this bit of ancient writing became for Christians the most influential document ever penned.

Here follow two examples. In the fourth century a distinguished philosopher and teacher named Augustine was under conviction concerning the truthfulness of Christianity. He was a brilliant and attractive man; but he had also lived an immoral life, as many of the pagan intellectuals of his day did, and his past practice of immorality held him in a vise-like grip. He tells about it in the eighth book of his Confessions, relating how, although he was convinced of the truthfulness of Christianity, he nevertheless kept putting off a true repudiation of sin and a commitment to Jesus Christ.

One day, while in the garden of a friend's estate near Milan, Italy, Augustine heard a child singing the words tole lege, tole lege ("take and read"). He had never heard a song with words like that before, so he received it as a message from God. Obeying the message, he rushed to where a copy of the Bible was lying, opened it at random, and began to read the words that first met his astonished gaze. They were from Romans, the thirteenth chapter: "Let us behave decently, as in the daytime, not in orgies and drunkenness, not in sexual immorality and debauchery, not in dissension and jealousy. Rather, clothe yourselves with the Lord Jesus Christ, and do not think about how to gratify the desires of the sinful nature" (Rom. 13:13-14). This was exactly what was needed by Saint Augustine, as he was later called. The words were the means of his conversion. Afterward he wrote, "Instantly, as the sentence ended—by a light, as it were, of security infused into my heart —all the gloom of doubt was vanished away." Augustine became the greatest figure in the early Christian church between the apostle Paul and Martin Luther.

The second example of the Romans epistle's influence is the Protestant Reformer, Martin Luther. He was no profligate, as Augustine was. Quite the contrary. Luther was a pious, earnest monk— an apparent Christian. But Luther had no peace of soul. He wanted to please God, to be accepted by him. But the harder he worked, the more elusive the salvation of his soul seemed to be. Instead of growing closer to God, he found himself moving away from him. Instead of coming to love God, which Luther knew he should do, he found himself hating God for requiring an apparently impossible standard of righteousness of human beings. In desperation Luther turned to a study of Paul's letter to the Romans and there, as early as the seventeenth verse of chapter 1, he found the solution: "For in the gospel a righteousness from God is revealed, a righteousness that is by faith from first to last, just as it is written: 'The righteous will live by faith.'" As God opened the meaning of this verse to him, Luther realized that the righteousness he needed was not his own righteousness but a righteousness of God, freely given to all who would receive it. Furthermore, this was to be received, not through any works of his own but by faith only (sola fide). Faith meant taking God at his word, believing him. Luther did this, and as he did he felt himself to be reborn and to have entered Paradise.

Here is how he put it: "I had no love for that holy and just God who punishes sinners. I was filled with secret anger against him. I hated him, because, not content with frightening by the law and the miseries of life us wretched sinners, already ruined by original sin, he still further increased our tortures by the gospel.... But when, by the Spirit of God, I understood the words—when I learned how the justification of the sinner proceeds from the free mercy of our Lord through faith... then I felt born again like a new man.... In very truth, this language of Saint Paul was to me the true gate of Paradise."

Luther called Romans "the chief part of the New Testament and the very purest gospel"; he believed that "every Christian should know it word for word, by heart, [and] occupy himself with it every day, as the daily bread of his soul."

Samuel Taylor Coleridge, the English poet, called Romans "the profoundest book in existence."

The great Swiss commentator F. Godet wrote that in all probability "every great spiritual revival in the church will be connected as effect and cause with a deeper understanding of this book."

Foundational Christianity

But is that really true? We live in a skeptical age, and it is not unreasonable to think that a sizable percentage of people hearing or reading a statement like that in our day will challenge it. We know that Romans 13:13-14 was used by God to change the life of Saint Augustine and that Augustine altered history by his impact upon the church of the Middle Ages. We know that God used Martin Luther to launch the Reformation. But that was long ago. Augustine lived in the fourth and fifth centuries. Luther labored in the fifteen hundreds. Times have changed since then. Is there any reason to expect a corresponding impact from a study of this ancient letter today?

There is every reason to expect it, and the chief reason is that Christianity has been the most powerful, transforming force in human history—and the book of Romans is the most basic, most comprehensive statement of true Christianity.

Not everyone has agreed with this assessment, of course. There have been times when one teacher or another has been enamored with the so-called simple teachings of Jesus and has rejected the writings of Paul as too doctrinaire, too technical, or too harsh. All we really need is to tell people that God loves them, these instructors have said. Others have maintained that it is not what we believe that matters so much as what we do. From that perspective it is the social teachings of Christianity that are its heart; doctrines divide, whereas ethics ennoble our lives and unite us. These views all have a seed of wisdom, but they overlook the major issue. The fundamental human problem is not to understand what proper behavior is; generally we know that quite well. The problem is that we do not do what we know we should do. Indeed, we even seem incapable of doing it. This is what Augustine discovered when he tried to reform his life apart from the power of Christ. Again, the problem is not that we need to know that God loves us, though we often doubt that he does. Our hang-up is that we do not love God, as Luther, the pious monk, discovered. We are at war with God. In effect, we hate him; at the very least we do not want him to rule over our lives and resent any meaningful attempts he makes to do so.

Romans shows how God deals with this problem. And because it tells how God deals with this basic dilemma of human life, it necessarily also unveils the true solution to nearly everything else. When we repent of our sin and thus truly come to love God, we discover the secret to an upright and satisfying life, and we become a power for good rather than a disruptive, downward force or merely an indifferent presence in society.

Overview of the Epistle

In the following chapters of this and subsequent volumes, I intend to examine this great ancient document in detail. But because this is an introductory study, it is well at the outset to fix an overview of the entire letter in our minds. Romans has the following parts:

1. A preliminary personal word and introduction (1:1-15). Romans is a doctrinal treatise placed between the opening and closing sections of a typical ancient letter. But, unlike most ancient writers, Paul uses the opening section to introduce the theme that will occupy him at length later on. It is "the gospel of God." Gospel means "good news." So Paul is announcing news that is not only good but superlatively good, since it comes from the One who is the Great Good of all.

2. A brief statement of the theme (1:16-17). In his introduction Paul shows that the gospel centers in the person of God's Son, the Lord Jesus Christ. But what is this Good News specifically? Paul's short statement shows that it concerns the revelation of God's righteousness to us apart from human works. These were the verses that transformed the life of Martin Luther, for they showed that the answer to life comes not by striving to do good works to please God, but by resting in the finished work of God for us in Jesus Christ.

3. An analysis of the depravity of human beings and an explanation of the work of Christ as the provision for that need (1:18-4:25). This is the first major section of the letter, and it contains the most penetrating and perceptive analysis of human nature in its relationship to God ever written. The first thing Paul shows is that, although people have knowledge of the existence of God through nature, all act as if the true God does not exist. Or, if they acknowledge him verbally, they nevertheless distort their > understanding so that they actually worship the creation rather than the Creator. This willful ignorance has not been overlooked by God, since he has punished it by abandoning people to the natural outworking of their sins. This spiritual outworking of sin drags the race downward and enslaves us in invisible chains.

All are involved in this tragedy. The pagan is involved, for the moral disintegration of his life shows him to be held in sin's power. The "moral" individual is also involved, for although he approves of higher behavioral standards, he inevitably fails to live up to those standards. His guilt is even greater than the pagan's. Last of all, Paul unveils the need of the pious, or "religious," individual. The problem with the merely religious person is that the practice of religion alone cannot change the heart.

But here is where the gospel enters in. Although all have been enmeshed in sin's tentacles—so that Paul can remind us, quoting from the Old Testament, that "'There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God. All have turned away, they have together become worthless; there is no one who does good, not even one'" (Rom. 3:1012)—God has taken the initiative to save us. Through the work of Christ he has provided the righteousness we lack, and he has done this not only for Jews, who might have expected it, but for Gentiles, too. This is why the late Welsh preacher, D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones of London, England, calls Romans 3:21-31, in which this doctrine is stated, "one of the greatest and noblest statements in the whole realm of scripture."

In Romans 4, which is also part of this section, Paul shows that the gospel he has explained in chapter 3 has always been God's way of saving lost sinners. It is true that God accomplished salvation through the work of Jesus Christ, who from the perspective of Paul had lived in the notfar-distant past. But the timing is unimportant, says the apostle. Those who lived before Christ were saved by looking forward to his coming, by faith, just as we who have come afterward are also saved by faith as we look back. Paul proves this by Old Testament statements concerning the patriarch Abraham and King David.

4. A review of the great scope of salvation (5:1-8:39). A number of commentators have supposed that in this second major section of his letter, Paul moves from the doctrine of justification by faith to the doctrine of sanctification. But Lloyd-Jones is surely right when he suggests that Paul is actually "showing... the certainty, fullness and finality" of what God has done. Sanctification is indeed included in this section. But the author is actually covering the full scope of what God's work in Christ means for the believer. It gives him a new status before God and new privileges
(5:1-11). It joins him to the living Lord Jesus Christ from whom flows a new life of righteousness (5:12-6:23). It releases him from the anguish of trying to attain to moral rectitude by law (7:1-25). It provides victory over sin by the power of the Holy Spirit (8:1-17). It ends in glorification, for the reason that nothing in heaven or earth can ever separate us from the inexpressible love and power of God in Jesus Christ (8:18-39).

5. A Christian view of history (9:1-11:36). Those who see a change of subject between chapters 4 and 5 inevitably see an even wider chasm between chapters 8 and 9. Indeed, it is a worse misunderstanding than this! Even many of the best commentators speak of Romans 9-11 as a parenthesis in which, so they suppose, Paul departs from his theme entirely in order to deal with God's different and separate plan for the Jewish people. A correct view, I believe, is that chapters 9 through 11 are a continuation of everything said thus far, particularly Paul's treatment of the believer's eternal security in Christ with which chapter 8 ends. Paul has argued that Jews and Gentiles are alike trapped by sin. He has shown that salvation is by Christ and that this salvation is eternal, being beyond any possibility of repudiation by God. But, some might ask, what of God's ancient chosen people? Most Jews seem to have rejected Christ. If that is so, then one of two things must follow. Either (1) certain people can be saved without Christ (the Jews), which Paul has already said to be impossible; or (2) salvation is not secure, since God has already apparently broken his covenant with the Jews and so should not be trusted.

Paul's answer is that God has not broken faith with Israel. On the contrary, he is doing today as he has always done. God is utterly consistent. There had never been a time in history in which every Jew was saved, just because that individual was a Jew. And no one is saved today merely by being what he or she is naturally: a churchgoer, a moral person, a philanthropist, an American (or any other nationality), or even a child of Christian parents. Salvation is by grace through faith, which means that it flows from God's choice and activity. It is God's salvation, after all, not man's. And God will work it out—he is working it out—until the fullness of his purpose regarding the salvation of a people for himself is complete.

This is the meaning of history. Its explanation is not found in the rise and fall of empires or in individual accomplishments. It is seen in God's choice of a people for himself and in his work of perfecting and eventually glorifying them. This thought is so wonderful to Paul that he ends this section of his letter with the tremendous doxology of Romans 11:33-36:

Oh, the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God!
How unsearchable his judgments, and his paths beyond tracing out!
"Who has known the mind of the Lord? Or who has been his counselor?"
"Who has ever given to God, that God should repay him?"
For from him and through him and to him are all things. To him be the glory forever! Amen.

6. The outworking of Christianity in individual and national life (12:1-15:13). Paul was no armchair theologian, no ivory-tower divine. His letters always contain and usually end with practical and personal considerations. It is the same here. Having explained the gospel of God's unmerited salvation in Christ and having answered all reasonable objections to it, Paul concludes by showing how the work of God inevitably spills over into the details of individual and national life. His point is not only that Christianity will make a difference in life—though it will—but that it is the only thing that will ever actually make any true alteration in the world.

7. A conclusion embracing Paul's future plans and final greetings (15:14-16:27). Having begun in letter format, the apostle now ends the epistle in the same way. In this section he tells of his hopes for the church at Rome, unveils more of his plans to visit them after having first made a trip to Jerusalem with an offering for the Jewish saints, and sends greetings to Rome from the church at Corinth. Greetings from his fellow workers and a benediction end the letter.

Paul's Regular Teaching

In the nineteenth chapter of Acts, Luke the historian says that during Paul's missionary journeys, the apostle spent two years in Ephesus teaching "the word of the Lord" to all who lived in Asia (v. 10). A marginal note in one ancient manuscript suggests that he did this for five hours each day. Counting six days to each week and fifty-two weeks to each year, that makes 3,120 hours of apostolic instruction, considerably more than most Bachelor or Master of Theology degree programs. What do you suppose Paul taught the residents of Asia during these two long years of instruction? I suggest that he taught them essentially what he has given us in outline form in Romans: the ruin of the human race in sin and the provision of a perfect and eternal remedy for that ruin through the work of Jesus Christ.

Another way of saying the same thing is to say that this is what the apostle Paul would teach if he were to work among us for the same length of time today.

Is Romans relevant today? It is—as long as people of every race, culture and nationality are estranged from God because of sin.

Is Christianity relevant? It is—as long as it can redeem us for God, produce holiness in those who are trapped by sin, explain the meaning of life, and change history. Robert Haldane, the great nineteenth-century Scottish expositor of this letter, said as he drew near his initial summation of the epistle's teaching, "Paul, writing without any of the aids of human wisdom, draws his precepts from the fountain of heavenly truth, and inculcates on the disciples of Jesus a code of duties, which, if habitually practiced by mankind, would change the world from what it is—a scene of strife, jealousy and division—and make it what it was before the entrance of sin, a paradise fit for the Lord to visit and for man to dwell in."

Part One.

Opening Statements

Chapter 1.
A Man in Christ

Romans 1:1

Lord Lyttleton and Gilbert West were two nineteenth-century English barristers. They were unbelievers who one day took it upon themselves to disprove Christianity. As they discussed their project they decided that there were two main bulwarks of the Christian religion: the resurrection of Jesus Christ and the conversion and apostleship of Paul. West undertook to write against the resurrection of Jesus, while Lyttleton's task was to disprove the factuality of Paul's conversion.

Each was somewhat rusty in his knowledge of the facts, as unbelievers often are. So one lawyer said to the other, "If we are to be honest in this matter, we should at least investigate the evidence." They agreed to do this. While they were preparing their books they had a number of conferences, and in one of them West told Lyttleton that there was something on his mind that he felt he should share. He said that as he had been studying the evidence for Jesus' resurrection he had come to feel that there was something to it, since it was very well attested. Lyttleton replied that he was glad that West had spoken as he had, because on his part he had come to feel that there was some truth in the stories of Paul's Damascus Road conversion. Later, after they had finished their books and the two met again, Lyttleton said to his friend, "Gilbert, as I have been studying the evidence and weighing it by the recognized laws of legal evidence, I have become satisfied that Saul of Tarsus was converted as the New Testament says he was and that Christianity is true; I have written my book from that perspective." West replied that in a similar way he had become convinced of the truth of Jesus' resurrection, had come to believe in Jesus, and had written his book in defense of Christianity. Today their books are found in many good libraries.

Few Christians are surprised by this story, but it has at least one unusual element. Since it is clear that the resurrection of Jesus Christ is foundational to Christianity, it is easy to understand why a nonbeliever like West would want to write a book refuting the resurrection. But the conversion and apostleship of Saint Paul might initially seem to be a much less important matter.

Yet here, as in many other places, first glances are misleading. Paul was not "the founder of Christianity," as some have called him. Jesus alone deserves that title. Yet Paul is so important as the first and greatest of the church's missionaries and as the articulator and systematizer of its theology that discrediting his claim to have been called and taught by Christ would seriously undermine Christianity itself. If Paul was not converted as a result of seeing the risen Lord while on the road to Damascus, as he claimed, and if he did not receive his gospel by a direct revelation from Jesus Christ, then Paul was a charlatan, his writings are not true, and Christianity is bereft of its single most important teacher after Christ.

"Paul"—The Man from Tarsus

Here is the man who meets us at the very beginning of our study, in fact at the very first word. In the Greek text, as well as in nearly all the English versions, the first word of this most important New Testament book is "Paul." It is a miracle that the word is even there. Paul is indeed the writer of this book. But we should remember that it was written to a largely Gentile church and that in his early days Paul was a fanatical Jew who would have little or no concern for any Gentile community, least of all a community that claimed as its Lord a man who had been crucified for blasphemy against the God of Israel only a few years before.

Who was Paul? In an appeal to the Roman commander of the Jerusalem garrison, recorded in Acts, Paul identified himself as a citizen of Tarsus in Cilicia, which he modestly called "no ordinary city" (Acts 21:39). Tarsus was a Greek city, the seat of a well-known university. Therefore, since Paul was apparently from a well-to-do family, we must assume that he received an outstanding Greek or pagan education in Tarsus. He shows some evidence of this by occasionally quoting from the pagan poets.

Important as Paul's Greek education may have been, however, there is no doubt that his education in Judaism was the chief factor in his academic and intellectual development. Paul trained under the renowned Rabbi Gamaliel in Jerusalem where, as he claimed, he acquired a thorough knowledge of Jewish law and traditions (Acts 22:3). The son of a Pharisee (Acts 23:6), he became a Pharisee himself and was so zealous for the Pharisaic ideals of righteousness that he undertook a radical persecution of the early church, which he believed opposed those ideals (Acts 22:4-5; Phil. 3:6). Paul thus had the benefits of the best possible secular and religious educations, which led Charles Hodge to insist in his Romans commentary that "Paul, the most extensively useful of all the apostles, was... a thoroughly educated man."

That is worth highlighting. From time to time Christians become skeptical of secular education or even of natural gifts or talents, supposing that these must be opposed to anything done by God's Spirit, but it is unfortunate when Christians think this way. It is possible to clarify the matter by asking three questions. First, what man did God most use in the period of history covered by the Old Testament? The answer obviously is "Moses." Second, what kind of education did Moses have? The answer is "a secular education." He had the best secular education of his day, being instructed "in all the wisdom of the Egyptians," as Stephen observed (Acts 7:22). Third question: What man, aside from Jesus Christ, did God most use in the period of history covered by the New Testament? The answer, again quite obvious, is "Paul," a man who also had the best possible education of his time, first in Tarsus from pagan teachers, whoever they may have been, and then in Jerusalem from Gamaliel, a Jewish teacher and nonbeliever. The conclusion is that there is nothing wrong with either education, whether Christian or secular, or with natural gifts. On the contrary, one's talents are God-given, and education is a very great privilege that can enhance them. If we have both, we can thank God for giving them to us.

Still, education in itself is neutral. It can be used for good or for evil. What matters is whether it is given over to God to be used by him as he wills. In his early years Paul used his education and zeal to oppose Christianity. It was only after he had his dramatic encounter with Christ that he was able to use these important tools rightly.

A Servant of Christ Jesus

This leads to the next set of words in Romans: "a servant of Christ Jesus." I have pointed out that Paul was a thoroughly educated man. But important as that is, it is necessary to add that he was also a thoroughly converted man. Paul had met Jesus Christ, and from that moment he was never his own man. He was a servant of the Lord.

In the earlier years of this century the late J. Gresham Machen, at that time Professor of New Testament Literature and Exegesis at Princeton Theological Seminary, wrote a classic study of the apostle Paul tided The Origin of Paul's Religion. It was a reply to nineteenth-century attacks on Christianity by men who, like the early Lord Lyttleton, recognized the importance of Paul for the formation of Christian thought and the establishing of Christianity but who, because they rejected a supernatural Jesus, found themselves pressed to account for the nature of the apostle's beliefs. In this book Machen destroyed the liberal views with characteristic thoroughness. On the positive side, he showed that the traditions concerning Paul's contact with the other apostles are sound and that the teachings of Paul were identical with theirs as well as with the teachings of the Lord. He also showed that Paul was convinced of the factualness of the resurrection. On the negative side, Machen showed that Paul could not have derived his beliefs from his Judaistic background or from paganism. "The religion of Paul was rooted in an event, and... the event was the redemptive work of Christ in his death and resurrection."

From a scholarly point of view, Machen might have allowed the book to rest there. But the real value of The Origin of Paul's Religion, in my judgment, is that this distinguished scholar then carried the argument one step further, showing not only that Paul was convinced of the truth of Christianity, including the great doctrine of the resurrection, but that he had been conquered and captivated by the living Lord Jesus Christ. Paul was in love with Jesus Christ, and it was his love for Christ that alone explains the nature and rigor of his life's work.

Machen wrote, "Paulinism is to be accounted for [by] the love of Paul for his Savior.... The religion of Paul was not founded upon a complex of ideas derived from Judaism or from paganism. It was founded upon the historical Jesus. But the historical Jesus upon whom it was founded was not the Jesus of modern reconstruction, but the Jesus of the whole New Testament and of Christian faith; not a teacher who survived only in the memory of his disciples, but the Savior who after his redeeming work was done still lived and could still be loved."

The conclusion of Machen's book, which I have quoted above, is the point of this first important phrase in Romans: "A servant of Christ Jesus." Paul was a super achiever, after all, so he could have introduced himself by a long list of accomplishments. He could have cited his ancestral tree, his degrees, his success in founding churches—even his writings, since Romans does not seem to have been the first of his letters. But Paul does not do this. Why? It is not because he was embarrassed about these things; he mentions them elsewhere in their proper place. It is certainly not because he did not value them. Paul overlooks these achievements because what he is most concerned about simply overshadows them. Above all else, Paul saw himself as a servant of the Lord.

Paul's letters are always filled with Jesus, no matter what he is writing about. Some letters, like Romans, are theological in nature. Others, like 1 and 2 Corinthians and Galatians, deal with problems in the churches. Some are personal; some are incidental in nature. Whatever his topic or specific purpose, Paul is always thinking about and relating his message to Jesus.

In the first seven verses of Romans, the first half of Paul's opening remarks, Jesus is mentioned by name, pronoun, title, or a descriptive phrase eight times: "Christ Jesus" (v. 1), "his Son," "a descendant of David" (v. 3), "the Son of God," "Jesus Christ our Lord" (v. 4), "him" (v. 5), "Jesus Christ" (v. 6), and "the Lord Jesus Christ" (v. 7).

This provides a very good way of testing our Christianity. Many of us, at least those who take time to read a study of Romans or certain other Bible commentaries, are convinced of the truthfulness of Christianity. Perhaps we can even articulate the doctrines of the faith, as Paul does. We can systematize theology. Ah, but do we love Jesus? Are our thoughts constantly occupied with him? Is he at the forefront? Is he the center? Is he the beginning and the end? When we talk to one another, do we speak often of him? Are we content to let the honors of the world pass by, so long as we can be known as Christ's servants? This gets very close to what is chiefly wrong with our contemporary Christianity. Our religion is one of personalities, plans, and programs, of buildings, books, and bargains. Because it is not the faith of those who love Jesus, it is shallow and selfish, constantly shifting in the ebbs and flows of cultural standards. As we grow in grace we will think less of these things and more of him who "loved me and gave himself for me" (Gal. 2:20).

Paul's description of himself as Christ's servant accomplishes a number of other things that are also worth noting:

1. Paul's description of himself as a servant of Christ puts him in the same category as those to whom he is writing. In other words, it identifies Paul first and foremost as a Christian. One of the great theological terms of Christianity, which Paul will use in his important explanation of the gospel in chapter 3, is "redemption." In his day it meant to buy in the marketplace, particularly to buy a slave. Slavery to Christ is a special kind of slavery, of course. It is a slavery in which we actually become free. Nevertheless, to become a servant or slave of Christ Jesus is a proper description of what it means to be a Christian. That is why Paul could write to the Corinthians, "Do you not know that your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit, who is in you, whom you have received from God? You are not your own; you were bought at a price. Therefore honor God with your body" (1 Cor. 6:19-20). When Paul identifies himself as "a servant of Christ Jesus," he is saying, among other things, "I am like you. Like you, I, too, have been purchased by Christ and am his follower."

2. Paul's description of himself as a servant of Christ Jesus emphasizes that his chief function as a disciple of Christ is service. This is worth noting, because it is a missing element in many of our fellowships.

Not long ago I was talking with a distinguished Christian whom God has used to found a thriving independent church in Texas. The church is now about twenty-five years old, and, according to my friend, the first fifteen years of its existence were spent in trying to convince everyone that it was the only true church in its city (or at least the only good one), and that the cause of Christ would be best served if those belonging to the other churches would simply leave their fellowships and join it. In those fifteen years the church membership grew from perhaps sixty to a hundred and fifty persons. About that time it dawned on the leaders that the way they had marked out was not self-evidently blessed by God, so they decided to take another tack. Instead of urging people to join them and thus contribute to their ministry, the leaders decided to become a church of servants. This meant giving themselves to whatever good work was being done, wherever it was done, and not being fretful if others got credit or even left the home church to further it. With this attitude the church began to grow, and in the last ten years it has swelled to more than two thousand members.

We should learn from this—and from the apostle Paul, who assumed and modeled a servant role. To be more basic, we should learn from Jesus, who said on one occasion, "... whoever wants to become great among you must be your servant, and whoever wants to be first must be your slave—just as the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many" (Matt. 20:26-28).

3. Paul's description of himself as a servant of Christ reminds his readers that he is nevertheless Christ's servant—a servant of Christ first and a servant of man second—and that he is uniting to them in this capacity. This anticipates the next of Paul's phrases.

Called to Be an Apostle

What is an apostle? "Apostle" is one of the least appreciated and even most misunderstood words in the Christian vocabulary. For some it means little more than "disciple." This is unfortunate, because a misunderstanding of this word involves a misunderstanding of much about Christianity.

The best passage for understanding the meaning of the term apostle is Acts 1:15-26, in which the eleven apostles elected a twelfth to complete their ranks after the treachery and death of Judas. As Peter explained, it was necessary for the replacement to have known the risen Lord and to have been chosen by him for this office. The disciples nominated two who met the first qualification: Joseph Barsabbas (also known as Justus) and Matthias. Then they drew lots to see whom Jesus himself would select. The choice fell on Matthias. This episode teaches that an apostle was to be a witness to the resurrection of Jesus Christ and that he was also necessarily chosen and equipped by Jesus for this function.

Yet there is more to it even than this. We know that at the very end of the Gospels and at the beginning of Acts, the Lord gives Christians a command we call the Great Commission. It means that we are all to be witnesses to Christ. If this is so, why is the apostolic office a special one? The answer comes from observing the way these chosen representatives of the Lord regarded their office. It is not only that they saw themselves as witnesses. The apostles also knew that they were to witness in an extraordinary, supernatural sense. Because they were apostles, God spoke authoritatively through them, so that what they said as apostles carried the force of divine teaching or Scripture. We see this clearly in Galatians, in which Paul defends his apostleship. At the beginning he stresses the divine origin of his calling, writing, "Paul, an apostle—sent not from men nor by man, but by Jesus Christ and God the Father who raised him from the dead" (Gal. 1:1). After that he links the nature and authority of the gospel to this office: "I want you to know, brothers, that the gospel I preached is not something that man made up. I did not receive it from any man, not was I taught it; rather, I received it by revelation from Jesus Christ" (vv. 1112).

By calling himself an apostle in Romans, Paul reminds his readers that he is writing as no mere ordinary man but rather as one who has been given a message that should be received by them as the very words of God.

This also has a bearing on ourselves, for it tells us how we are to receive this book and benefit from it. We can study it as a merely human book, of course. That cannot be bad, since Romans is a good piece of writing, one well worth studying, even on limited terms. But if we would profit by it greatly, we must receive it as what it truly is—a message from God to our hearts and minds—and we must obey its teachings, just as we would be obliged to obey God if he should speak to us directly.

Set Apart for the Gospel of God

The third phrase Paul uses to introduce himself to the believers in Rome is "set apart for the gospel of God." This takes us back to the opening overview of Paul's life. In the days before his meeting with Christ on the road to Damascus, Paul was a Pharisee, and the meaning of that word is "separation" or "a separated one." This is the word Paul now uses of his commitment to the gospel. Before he met Christ, Paul was set apart to the Pharisaic traditions. Indeed, he regarded himself as one sublimely set apart. Pharisees crossed the street rather than pass close to some unworthy sinner or vile publican. They held to dietary restraints and sacramental cleansings. The list of things a Pharisee would not do was tremendous. But, when Paul met Christ, a lifeshattering change occurred in him. Before, he was separated from all manner of things, and as a result he was self-righteous, narrow, cruel, and obsessive. Afterward, he was separated unto something, unto the gospel. That separation was positive—expansive and joyful, yet humbling. Paul never got over that divinely produced transformation.

Nor should you. Do you know what it is to be released from a negative legalism into the liberation of a positive Christianity? I am sure that in his new calling there were many things that Paul did not do. Certainly he did not make provision for fulfilling fleshly sins. He did not lie or cheat or steal or commit adultery. But Paul never thought of the rejection of these sins as privation, because he had his heart set on something more, and that was so grand a commitment that he always counted his calling to be the greatest of all privileges.

Chapter 2.
God's Grand Old Gospel

Romans 1:1-2

The most important word in the introduction to Paul's letter to the Romans is "gospel." There it occurs six times (vv. 1, 2, 9, 15, 16, 17), and it is important because it is the theme of the epistle. Romans was written to make this great gospel of God more widely known.

We read the word for the first time in verse 1, just nine words into the Greek text. Paul identifies it as "the gospel of God," to which he has been called and set apart. In verse 2 he elaborates a bit, beginning to explain exactly what this gospel is. It is a gospel "promised beforehand through [God's] prophets in the Holy Scriptures regarding his Son." That is, it concerns the Lord Jesus Christ. In verse 9 Paul uses a phrase that firms up that definition, calling it "the gospel of his Son" and adding that he desires to preach it with his whole heart. In verses 15 through 17 he speaks again of his eagerness to preach the gospel: "That is why I am so eager to preach the gospel also to you who are at Rome. I am not ashamed of the gospel, because it is the power of God for the salvation of everyone who believes: first for the Jew, then for the Gentile. For in the gospel a righteousness from God is revealed, a righteousness that is by faith from first to last...."

The Great Good News

Most of us know that the word gospel (euangelion, Greek) means "good news." But I am sure that D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones is correct when he suggests in his commentary that most of us stop at the definition and do not actually appreciate how good the good news truly is.

To appreciate the goodness of the gospel we should begin with the fact that aside from Christianity the religions of the world are not at all good news. On the contrary, they are very bad news, a burden. We see this merely by looking into the hard, grim faces of the leaders of the world's other religions—the priests, monks, mullahs, gurus, and holy men who are found in every land and among all races. These are not happy people! And the religions they teach are not happy religions for those who follow them. The reason is not hard to discover. Apart from Christianity all the religions of the world are self-help or "works" religions. That is, they tell you how to find God (or peace, happiness, whatever) by human efforts. If it were possible to do this, religion in general might be good news. But the task is not possible. God is too holy, too removed from us because of his holiness and our sin, for us to reach him. Sin has so great a hold on us that it keeps us from the happiness we long for. A religion based on what you or I can do is comfortless because its requirements become burdens that can never be lifted.

This is what Paul himself had found. He had followed a religion of strictly defined good works and high moral standards. But it had not given him peace or even a true sense of achievement. He says later in this epistle that although he had learned what he should do, he found that he could not do it and so was a very "wretched man" (Rom. 7:24).

In our day many people have recognized this and have therefore sought happiness in the religion of "no religion." They have become practical atheists, regarding religion as a tool of some people to control others and therefore something that an enlightened society should throw away. At first this "no religion" seems like good news. But the goodness evaporates as soon as we stop to think about it. If there is no God and if we are therefore free to do as we please without any thought of accountability to a divine authority or punishment by him, we seem to be liberated to joyous independence. But if there is no accountability, because there is nobody to be accountable to, what we do with this great "freedom" becomes meaningless. Moreover, if what we do is meaningless, we must be meaningless, too. We are accidental bubbles upon the great cosmic deep, destined only to burst and be forgotten.

"No religion" leads nowhere. It may seem to offer the great good news of human progress, but it actually leaves us with despair over the futility of human existence.

This is where Christianity comes in and proclaims what is really good news. The gospel is good for two reasons. First, it tells us that God is actually there—that he is not merely the figment of human imagination but really exists, that he has made us for fellowship with himself and does hold us accountable for what we do. This gives meaning to life. Second, it tells us that God loves us and has reached out to save us through the work of Jesus Christ. We could not reach God, because our sins separated us from him. But God removed our sins through Christ and so bridged the gap over these very troubled waters. Before, we were groaning after God but could not find him. Now we sing praises to the One who has found us.

Let me make this last point explicitly. Have you ever considered how characteristic it is of Christianity that such large portions of our worship consist of singing praises to God? There is singing in other religions, of course; but it is usually mere chanting, which is itself a religious exercise designed to make the worshiper more "holy" or bring him closer to the deity. Christians do not sing as a good work or as a spiritual discipline. We do not sing to find God. We sing because he has found us and we are happy about it. The very first hymn in many hymnbooks says:

All people that on earth do dwell,
Sing to the Lord with cheerful voice;
Him serve with fear, his praise forthtell,
Come ye before him and rejoice.

D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones asks, "Has the gospel come to us like that? Can we say honestly at this moment that this is the greatest and best good news that we have ever heard?" If we cannot say that, it may be because we are not really born again, regardless of our profession. Or it may be that we do not actually appreciate the gospel, because we are not walking very close to God.

A "Promised" Gospel

The second thing Paul says about this gospel, this good news, is that it was "promised beforehand" through God's prophets. This is an important point because, new as the Christian gospel seemed when it first burst upon our sin-darkened world, the gospel of the salvation of men by God through the work of Jesus Christ was nevertheless no novelty. On the contrary, it was the goal to which all prior revelations of God during the Old Testament period led. We find this affirmed in every surviving example of the apostolic preaching.

1. The preaching of Paul. The apostle Paul seems never to have tired of showing this connection when he spoke about the gospel. In the thirteenth chapter of Acts, which gives us the first recorded example of Paul's preaching, we find Paul reviewing Israel's history to show (just as he does in Romans 1) that God sent Jesus as a descendant of King David, according to his promise, and that everything that happened to Jesus during the days of his earthly ministry fulfilled the Holy Scriptures. He was condemned and crucified as the prophets had said he would be. Afterward, he was raised from the dead according to these same prophecies. In the latter half of this sermon Paul quotes Psalm 2:7 to prove Christ's deity: "'You are my Son; today I have become your Father'" (Acts 13:33), and Isaiah 55:3 and Psalm 16:10 to confirm that the resurrection was prophesied: "'I will give you the holy and sure > blessings promised to David.' So it is stated elsewhere: 'You will not let your Holy One see decay'" (vv. 34-35).

At the end of his sermon in Acts 13, Paul warns of the dangers of unbelief, citing Habakkuk 1:5 ("I am going to do something in your days that you would never believe," v. 41), and announcing that even his proclamation of the gospel to a mixed audience of Jews and Gentiles had been prophesied in Isaiah 49:6 ("I have made you a light for the Gentiles, that you may bring salvation to the ends of the earth," v. 47).

We find this same reference to Old Testament teachings elsewhere. When we are told of Paul's first preaching at Thessalonica, we read, "As his custom was, Paul went into the synagogue, and on three Sabbath days he reasoned with them from the Scriptures, explaining and proving that the Christ had to suffer and rise from the dead" (Acts 17:2-3). Paul also uses this approach in Romans 4, proving the gospel he has explained in Romans 3 on the basis of Old Testament texts about Abraham and King David.

2. The preaching of Philip. When we go back a few chapters in Acts and thus to a slightly earlier period in the history of the church, we come to the ministry of the deacon Philip. God used Philip to preach the gospel to an Ethiopian official, and the way he did it was by announcing the fulfillment of Isaiah 53:7-8, which the Ethiopian was reading aloud but did not understand:

> "He was led like a sheep to the slaughter, and as a lamb > before the shearer is silent, so he did not open his mouth.
> In his humiliation he was deprived of justice.
> Who can speak of his descendants?
> For his life was taken from the earth."
>
> Acts 8:32-33

The story relates that "Philip began with that very passage of Scripture and told him the good news about Jesus" (v. 35).

3. The preaching of Peter. In the early chapters of Acts we have two examples of Peter's early preaching. The first was at Pentecost, when Peter gave a sermon that was roughly half quotations from the Old Testament; these were explained in the other half of the message. In this sermon

Peter quoted Joel 2:28-32 (his chief text, prophesying Pentecost itself), Psalm 16:8-11 (which Paul later quoted in part in his sermon recorded in Acts 13), and Psalm 110:1 (the Old Testament verse most cited in the New). In Peter's sermon (Acts 2:14-36) there are eleven verses of Old Testament quotation and twelve verses of introduction, explanation, and application.

It is recorded in Acts 4:8-12 that Peter also preached on Psalm 118:22, showing that the Old Testament prophesied Jesus' rejection by Israel and his ultimate glorification by God. "He is," said Peter, "the stone you builders rejected, which has become the capstone" (v. 11). This was a favorite text for Peter. He used it again in his first letter, in conjunction with Isaiah 8:14 and 28:16.

4. The preaching of Jesus Christ. Where did the apostles get this important Old Testament approach to the gospel, particularly since none of their contemporaries seem to have read the Old Testament books in this fashion? There is only one answer. They got it from the Lord Jesus Christ, their master, who saw his life as a fulfillment of Scripture and also taught his disciples to view it in that way. We remember that after the resurrection, when Jesus was walking to Emmaus with two of his followers, he chided them on their slowness to believe what the Old Testament writers had spoken: "How foolish you are, and how slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken! Did not the Christ have to suffer these things and then enter his glory?" The text continues: "And beginning with Moses and all the Prophets, he explained to them what was said in all the Scriptures concerning himself (Luke 24:25-27).

Let me emphasize this point. The gospel is good news, of course. But not only that; it is the good news God has been announcing from the very beginning of his dealings with the human race, up to and including the end of the Old Testament—from Genesis 3:15 (the first announcement of the gospel) to Malachi 4:5 (which speaks of the coming of Elijah as Christ's forerunner).

This is the key to understanding the entire Old Testament. It is the key to understanding the New Testament. It is the key to understanding all history—God's saving men and women through the work of his Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, as he announced "beforehand through his prophets in the Holy Scriptures."

"The Holy Scriptures"

Moreover, it is in the Holy Scriptures that this announcement has been made. This phrase is of tremendous importance because it identifies the place at which the announcement of God's great good news may be found and highlights its very essence.

First, the announcement of God's good news is in writing, the writings of the prophets. This means that we are not to look elsewhere for it, as if God had chosen to reveal this news by mystical visions, through inward intimations, or in some other nonbiblical or nonobjective way. We have documents to study and words to ponder and understand. Second, the books of the Bible are special, holy writings, which means they are not mere human compositions but are the very words of God. They are God's revelation to mankind. As Peter, himself one of the human instruments for God's giving of the New Testament, wrote: "... no prophecy of Scripture came about by the prophet's own interpretation. For prophecy never had its origin in the will of man, but men spoke from God as they were carried along by the Holy Spirit" (2 Peter 1:20-21). We should be drawn to the Word in faithful study and meditation—if we really believe the Bible to be God's Holy Scriptures.

I think of how John Wesley expressed his yearning for the Word in that well-known introduction to his sermons:

I am a creature of a day, passing through life as an arrow through the air. I am a spirit come from God and returning to God, just hovering over the great gulf, till, a few moments hence, I am no more seen; I drop into an unchangeable eternity. I want to know one thing—the way to heaven, how to land safe on that happy shore. God himself has condescended to teach me the way. For this very end he came from heaven. He ha[s] written it down in a book. O give me that book! At any price, give me the book of God! I have it. Here is knowledge enough for me. Let me be homo unius libri ("a man of one book"). Here then I am, far from the busy ways of men. I sit down alone. Only God is here. In his presence I open, I read his book—for this end, to find the way to heaven.

I note, as John Murray does in his study of Romans, that the great Karl Barth, usually so perceptive in his exegetical comments, passes over the words Holy Scripture without notice in his commentary. Barth valued the gospel, but he did not fully appreciate the nature of the documents in which this gospel is disclosed. It is a flaw in his theology.

Do not let it be a flaw with you. Recognize, as Paul did, that God has spoken to us in the Bible, and therefore determine to study it carefully and obediently. You should do with it what Francis Bacon said we should do with even the greatest of human books: "taste," "chew," "swallow," and "digest" it, and read it "wholly, and with diligence and attention."

God's Gospel

The final point about the gospel made by Paul in these two verses of Romans is the one with which Paul actually starts, namely, that it is God's gospel. It is something God announced and accomplished and what he sent his apostles to proclaim. It is something God blesses and through which he saves men and women. The grammatical way of stating this is that the genitive ("of God") is a subjective, rather than an objective genitive. It means that God creates and announces the gospel rather than that he is the object of its proclamation.

Note how prominent this point is in these early verses of Romans. God the Father has "promised [the gospel] beforehand through his prophets in the Holy Scriptures" (v. 2). He has sent his Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, to accomplish the work thus promised, with the result that the gospel, then as now, is "regarding" him (v. 3). Finally, it is "through him and for his name's sake" that Paul and the other apostles, exercising a calling received by them from God, were in the process of proclaiming the gospel to men and women everywhere (v. 5).

If God is concerned about his gospel to this extent, will he not bless it fully wherever these great truths are proclaimed?

Let me tell you one story of such a blessing. In the year 1816 a Scotsman by the name of Robert Haldane went to Switzerland. Haldane was a godly layman who, with his brother James Alexander, had been much used of the Lord in Scotland. In Geneva, on this particular occasion, he was sitting on a park bench in a garden in the open air and heard a group of young men talking. As he listened he realized two things. First, these were theological students. Second, they were ignorant of true Christianity. As a result of this encounter and after a few encouraging conversations, Haldane invited the students to his room and began to teach them the Book of Romans, going through it verse by verse, as we will be doing in these studies. God honored this work, and the Holy Spirit blessed it by the conversions of these young men. They were converted one by one, and in turn they were instrumental in a religious revival that not only affected Switzerland but spread to France and the Netherlands.

One of these students was Merle d'Aubigné, who became famous for his classic History of the Reformation of the Sixteenth Century. We know it in an abbreviated form as The Life and Times of Martin Luther. Another of these men was Louis Gaussen, the author of Theopneustia, a book on the inspiration of the Scriptures. The company of those converted through Haldane's exposition of Romans included: Frédéric Monod, the chief architect and founder of the Free Churches in France; Bonifas, who became a great and distinguished theologian; and César Malan, another important religious leader. All were converted as a result of Haldane's exposition of the truths of the Romans epistle.

Why should it be any different today? If it were our gospel, we could expect nothing. But it is not our gospel. It is "the gospel of God," that grand old gospel that was "promised beforehand through his prophets in the Holy Scriptures" and achieved for us by the Lord Jesus Christ through his substitutionary death and resurrection. We should proclaim it fearlessly and with zeal, as did Paul.

Chapter 3.
The Gospel of Jesus Christ

Romans 1:2-4

In the previous study I tried to show that Christianity, the religion being explained by the apostle Paul in Romans, is a unique religion, and I gave a number of reasons for saying that. In this chapter we come to the chief reason: Christianity is unique because it is founded upon a unique person, the Lord Jesus Christ.

Yet it is more than this. Not only is Christianity unique because its founder is unique, it is unique because it is uniquely linked to him, in the sense that you simply cannot have Christianity without the Lord Jesus Christ! J. N.D. Anderson, director of the Institute of Advanced Legal Studies at the University of London, has noted that other religions are quite different:

In Confucianism and Buddhism it is the teaching and principles of Confucius and the Buddha which represent the essence of the religion, rather than the teacher who first enunciated them or the facts of his life and death. Even in Islam, the towering figure of Muhammad finds its paramount importance in the divine revelation which it believes was given to mankind through him. It is the ipsissima verba of the Almighty, communicated to the prophet by the Archangel Gabriel and subsequently recorded in the Qur'ân, together with that further teaching provided by the inspired sunna or practice of the prophet, which constitute the essence of the faith; and a Muslim would point to the Book and the Traditions, rather than to Muhammad himself, as the media of revelation.

By contrast, Christianity is Jesus Christ. John R. W. Stott wrote: "The person and work of Christ are the rock upon which the Christian religion is built. If he is not who he said he was, and if he did not do what he said he had come to do, the foundation is undermined and the whole superstructure will collapse. Take Christ from Christianity, and you disembowel it; there is practically nothing left. Christ is the center of Christianity; all else is circumference."

Who Is Jesus Christ?

Obviously this causes us to ask who Jesus Christ is, and, as soon as we do, we find Paul's answer in the words "his Son"—Jesus of Nazareth is the Son of God.

Today, largely as a result of the religious liberalism of the last century, the term "son of God" is understood in a nearly generic sense, usually meaning only "a human being." Liberal theology holds that we are all sons or daughters of God. But this is a rather new heresy and one that none of the New Testament writers would have understood. When they used the words "Son of God" they were not referring to any supposed divine characteristics of human beings or even of some special relationship that we are all supposed to have to God. They meant deity itself. They meant that he who was being called Son of God was uniquely divine; that is, he was and always had been God.

Take the great confession of the apostle Peter, recorded in Matthew 16. Jesus had asked the disciples who the people were saying he was. They gave answers that had been making the rounds: John the Baptist, Elijah, Jeremiah, one of the prophets.

"But what about you?" Jesus asked. "Who do you say I am?"

Peter answered for the rest: "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God" (Matt. 16:16). This answer set Jesus apart from the category of those human figures the people were suggesting. It identified him as the divine Messiah. Moreover, Jesus accepted the designation, assuring Peter and the others that this insight had come not as the result of simple human observation but as a special revelation from God the Father. It was God who had given Peter this great discernment.

Jesus explicitly taught who he was: "I and the Father are one" (John 10:30). He had also said, "Before Abraham was born, I am!" (John 8:58).

When Thomas fell down to worship Jesus after his resurrection, confessing him "My Lord and my God" (John 20:28), Jesus accepted the designation. Then he gently chided Thomas, not for his worship but for his earlier unbelief.

This is the sense in which Paul begins to unfold the content of the Christian message. Already he has called it "the gospel of God," meaning that God is the source of this great plan of salvation. Now he adds that the gospel concerns "his [God's] Son." This means that Jesus is the unique Son of God and that the person and work of this divine Jesus are the gospel's substance. This is where we start. We do not countenance any modern nonsense about a "Christless Christianity." We begin with the eternal Son of God, and we confess that everything we believe and are as Christians centers in the person and work of that unique individual.

The God-Man

Jesus is not only unique in his divine nature, however. He is also unique in that he became man at a specific point in human history and now remains the God-man eternally. No one else is like that. No one can ever be.

This brings us to a remarkable section of Paul's introduction in which every word is so precisely chosen and of such significance that, even apart from Paul's claims to be writing as an apostle, we ought to think of Romans as more than a "merely human" composition. To begin with, there is an obvious contrast between the two natures of the historical, earthly Jesus. The first is his human nature. In the Greek text the word is sarx, translated "flesh." But the term is not limited to describing only the fleshly parts of our body, as the word is in English. It means "the whole man." The translators of the New International Version are therefore right on target when they translate "as to his human nature." This "nature" is contrasted with Christ's divine nature, which is described as "the Spirit of holiness." That phrase does not refer to the Holy Spirit (though many have interpreted it this way), but to Christ's own spiritual or divine nature, which is holy. In other words, the first important thing about this section is its clear recognition of both the human and divine natures of Jesus.

Note also the contrast between "descendant of David" and "Son of God." This corresponds to the aforementioned distinction, because "descendant of David" speaks of Jesus' human nature (it is as a man that he was born into David's family tree), while "Son of God" is linked to his divinity.

The really interesting point is the contrast between the word was, the verb used in the first part of this descriptive sentence, and declared, which is the verb in part two. However, I need to point out that "was" is a weak rendering of the word Paul actually used. In Greek the word is ginomai, which means "become," "take place," "happen" or, in some cases "be born" or even "come into being." "Was" describes a past state or condition, but it can be a timeless state. "Became" shows that something came into existence that was not in existence previously. And, of course, this is precisely what happened in our Lord's incarnation. Before his birth to Mary at what we call the beginning of the Christian era, Jesus was God and always had been God. (That is why the other verb is "declared." He was declared to be God.) But he became man at a particular past point in history by the incarnation.

In verses 3 and 4, a brief message of only twenty-eight Greek words (forty-one in English), Paul has provided us with an entire Christology.

Great David's Greater Son

There is a debate among those who have studied Romans as to whether the church to which Paul was writing was predominantly Jewish or predominantly Gentile or a mixture of the two. I believe that it was a predominantly Gentile church and that the epistle should be understood in that light. But, as previously mentioned, it is nevertheless also true that Paul saw the gospel as growing out of its Jewish roots and makes that point frequently.

An example occurs in the words "descendant of David" in verse 3. We have noted that this phrase appears in the long sentence describing the two natures of the Lord Jesus Christ, but it goes beyond what we might have thought necessary for the apostle to say. In contrasting Christ's human nature with his divine nature, it would have been possible for Paul merely to say, "who as to his human nature was a man [or a true man]." That is indeed the chief point of the passage.

But instead of this, he says, "was a descendant of David," thus bringing in the whole matter of Jesus' Jewish ancestry.

Why does Paul do this? There are several reasons.

1. By referring to Jesus as a "descendant of David," Paul gives substance to his main contention, namely, that Jesus was a true human being. It is not that Jesus was merely a man in some vague, mystical way, but that he became a specific man whose existence was grounded in a particular human ancestry. Although we do not have any pictures of Jesus, if we had lived in his day and had possessed a camera then, we could have taken one. His eyes and hair had a certain color. He weighed so many pounds. Furthermore, we could have talked to him as well as to his mother and father, brothers and sisters and friends. He would have had stories to tell about his human relatives.

2. By referring to Jesus as a "descendant of David," Paul gives a specific example of the things "promised beforehand" by God "in the Holy Scriptures." There were many things prophesied concerning the Christ—where he would be born, how he would be treated by his people, the nature of his death, the fact of his resurrection. But one of the chief promises was that he would be born of David's line and would therefore be eligible to sit on David's throne and reign forever as the true king of Israel. Isaiah said, "A shoot will come up from the stump of Jesse [David's father]; From his roots a Branch will bear fruit" (Isa. 11:1).

Jeremiah was even more explicit:

> "The days are coming," declares the LORD,
> "when I will raise up to David a righteous Branch, a King who will reign wisely and do what is just and right in the land.
> In his days Judah will be saved and Israel will live in safety.
> This is the name by which he will be called: The LORD Our Righteousness."
>
> Jeremiah 23:5-6

The way in which these prophecies were fulfilled is quite remarkable, because there seemed to be a problem regarding the family from which a claimant to the throne of David might come. The difficulty was that there were two lines of descendency from King David. One was the line of Solomon, who had reigned on David's throne after the death of his father. Normally, there would be no question but that an elder son of a family descended from King Solomon would reign. But in Jeremiah 22:30, in the chapter just before the one prophesying "a righteous Branch" that would arise in David's line, a harsh curse is pronounced on a king named Jehoiachin, the last of the actual reigning kings descended from King Solomon: "Record this man as if childless, a man who will not prosper in his lifetime: for none of his offspring will prosper, none will sit on the throne of David or rule anymore in Judah." Because of God's curse, no king descended in that line could reign legitimately.

There was another strong line of descent, however. King Solomon had an older brother, Nathan, who would have been king if God had not given the throne to Solomon. Nathan had also produced descendants, but any descendant of this line who claimed inheritance of the promises made to King David would have been challenged immediately by descendants in the line that had actually reigned. How could such a dilemma be solved? There was a lack of reigning kings in one line and a curse on the other.

The way God solved the issue was so simple that it confounds the wisest skeptics. The line of Solomon ran on through the centuries until it eventually produced Joseph, who was betrothed to the Virgin Mary and eventually became her husband, though not until after she had conceived and given birth to the Lord Jesus Christ. Jesus was not descended from Joseph; otherwise he would have inherited the curse on that line. But when Joseph took Mary under his protection and thus became the adoptive father of her divine child, he passed the right of royalty to him. And since Jesus was also descended from Mary—who, as it turns out, was a descendant of David through the line of Nathan—Jesus combined the claims of the two lines in his unique personhood and thereby eliminated the possibility of there ever being any other legitimate claimant to the throne. In other words, if Jesus is not the Messiah who has descended from David according to the Old Testament prophecies, there will never be a Messiah. For Jesus had no human children, and each of his brothers (who are the only other possibilities through whom another Messiah might descend) had the curse on him and would have passed it on to his children.

Paul's reference to Jesus' descent from David in Romans 1:3 is quite brief, of course. But these details of his ancestry, as I have given them, would undoubtedly have formed the substance of much longer expositions by Paul in many teaching situations.

3. By referring to Jesus as a "descendant of David," Paul prepares the way for the exalted title he is going to give him at the end of this great sentence, namely, "Lord." One of the problems the apostle faced in his missionary work among the Gentiles is that in the eyes of many people the Jesus he preached was only a common criminal, properly executed, and therefore hardly to be extolled. But Jesus is actually a descendant of the great King David, says Paul. And what is even more important, he is the king announced in prophecy—the king who was also the Son of God. He is, therefore, not merely the King of the Jews, but the King of all men. He is the Lord Jesus Christ, the very essence of Christianity.

The Sovereign Son

This brings me to the last point of these verses, based on something Paul says about Jesus in the second half of his long descriptive sentence regarding the Lord's two natures. He says that Jesus "was declared with power to be the Son of God by his resurrection from the dead." How are we to understand that? Particularly, how are we to understand the phrase "with power"?

The most common way of understanding these words is to relate "with power" to "his resurrection," as if Paul was thinking of the resurrection as a striking revelation of God's power. Using this approach, the words "Spirit of holiness" would be seen as referring to the Holy Spirit, viewed as the agent of the resurrection; and this powerful resurrection, accomplished by the Spirit, would be seen as a proof of Christ's deity. It is true, of course, that the resurrection was accomplished by God's power and is itself proof of Christ's claims. But the Bible does not actually speak of the Holy Spirit's raising Jesus from the dead. The Father is the One who is said to have done that. Even more significantly, we have already seen that the words "Spirit of holiness" refer to Christ's divine nature—the words kata pneuma ("according to spirit") parallel the words kata sarka ("according to flesh")—and not to the third person of the Trinity. That alone seems to exclude the most popular interpretation of "with power."

A second understanding links "with power" to the declaration of Christ's deity. That is, it views Paul as thinking of a powerful or effective declaration, one that accomplishes its ends. Charles Hodge and F. Godet held this interpretation.

It is significant, however, that in the Greek text the words "with power" follow immediately after the words "Son of God" so that the text literally reads: "... declared the Son of God with power according to a spirit of holiness by the resurrection from the dead." This gives us a third understanding of what is going on in this sentence. In this view the words "with power" are linked to "Son of God," so that we might more properly understand Paul to be speaking of "the Son of God with power" or "the powerful Son of God," which he is declared to be by the resurrection. D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones takes this view, rightly I think, and explains it like this:

The Lord Jesus Christ... was the Son of God before. He is always the Son of God. He was the Son of God before the incarnation and from all eternity.... Where then is the variation?... It is in the form that he assumes; and what we have been told in verse 3 is that when he came into this world he did not come as the Son of God with power. No! He came as a helpless babe.... He was Son of God—yes; but not Son of God with power. In other words, when he came as a babe, the power of the Son of God was veiled in the flesh.... But what the apostle says is, that in the resurrection he is "declared to be the Son of God with power." It is there that we realize how powerful he is.

The point of this should be clear to everyone. It is not merely a case of Paul's declaring that the resurrection was a demonstration of the great power of God or even that the resurrection was a powerful demonstration of the validity of Christ's claims. It is not that at all. Rather, it is actually a strong declaration about the Lord's own person—precisely the purpose of this entire section and the point on which Paul will end. It is a declaration that Jesus is the sovereign Son of God and therefore rightly the "Lord" of all men as well as the Savior.

The conclusion of this, which in this study comes at the end instead of being scattered through the chapter, is that Jesus Christ, the very essence of Christianity, is your Lord and that you ought rightly to turn from all sin and worship him. You may dispute his claims. But if they are true, if Jesus is who the apostle Paul declares him to be in this epistle and others, there is no other reasonable or right option open to you than total and heart-deep allegiance. Colonel Robert Ingersoll, the famous agnostic of the last century, was no friend of Christianity. But he saw certain things clearly; and he said on one occasion, though in a critical vein, "Christianity cannot live in peace with any other form of faith. If that religion be true, there is but one Savior, one inspired book and but one little narrow... path that leads to heaven. Such a religion is necessarily uncompromising."

That statement is true because the Lord Jesus Christ is himself uncompromising. He is uncompromising because of who he is. Is he the eternal Son of God now made man for your salvation? Is he the Lord? If he is, you ought to heed his call—the call of the gospel—and follow him.

Chapter 4.
Jesus Christ Our Lord

Romans 1:4b

One of the excellencies of the New International Version is the way it handles the word order of the opening verses of Romans, reserving the words "Jesus Christ our Lord" until the end of verse 4, where they appear as a natural and effective climax. This is an improvement over the King James Version, which does not follow the Greek at this point and inserts the words earlier.

I emphasize this because the words "Jesus is Lord" constituted the earliest Christian creed and were therefore of the greatest possible importance to the early church. From the earliest days it was recognized that if a person confessed "Jesus is Lord," he or she was to be received for baptism. This is because, on the one hand, "No one can say, 'Jesus is Lord,' except by the Holy Spirit" (1 Cor. 12:3) and because, on the other hand, "If you confess with your mouth, 'Jesus is Lord,' and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved" (Rom. 10:9). To us, reading these records at a later date, it may seem strange that "Jesus is Lord" (Kyrios ’Iēsous, Greek) could be so important to our spiritual predecessors, but the reason is that they simply overflow with meaning.

To say that Jesus is Lord implies two things. First, it implies that Jesus is God. Second, it implies that Jesus is the Savior.

"Lord"

The first of these implications is due to the fact that in the Greek version of the Old Testament (the Septuagint), which was well known to the Jewish community of the first century and from which most of the New Testament writers quoted when citing Scripture, kyrios ("Lord") is used to translate the Hebrew name for God: Yahweh, or Jehovah. This is why most of our English Bibles do not use the name Yahweh but have Lord instead. The disciples of Christ knew that this word was repeatedly used to translate this great name for God. Yet, knowing this, they did not hesitate to transfer the title to Jesus, thereby indicating that in their view Jesus is Jehovah.

We need to be careful at this point, of course, because not all uses of "Lord" in the New Testament imply divinity. "Lord" was a bit like our English word sir. On the lowest level it could be used merely as a form of polite address. That is why, according to the Gospels, apparent unbelievers frequently called Jesus "Lord." This does not mean that they had received a sudden revelation of who he was but only that they were treating him with the respect due a distinguished rabbi; they were being polite. On the other hand, "Lord" could mean more. When we speak of Sir Winston Churchill we are using "sir" as a title. Similarly, those who called Jesus "Lord" were sometimes confessing that he was their "Master" by this greeting. In the most exalted instances, as in Thomas's stirring post-resurrection confession, "My Lord and my God" (John 20:28), the word was linked to the early disciples' belief in Christ's divinity.

This is the meaning of kyrios in the Christological passages of the New Testament. Here are some examples.

1. 1 Corinthians 8:4-6. "... We know that an idol is nothing in the world and that there is no God but one. For even if there are so-called gods, whether in heaven or on earth (as indeed there are many 'gods' and many 'lords'), yet for us there is but one God, the Father, from whom all things came and for whom we live; and there is but one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom all things came and through whom we live." The background for this passage is the polytheism of the Greek world, which Paul is refuting here. He is arguing that there is but one God, who is one with Jesus. The parallelism between "from whom all things came and for whom we live" (applied to God the Father) and "through whom all things came and through whom we live" (applied to Jesus Christ) makes this identification plain.

2. Luke 2:11. A second example is from the Christmas story. In this verse the angel tells the shepherds, "Today in the town of David a Savior has been born to you; he is Christ the Lord." The important thing here is that "Lord" is in the nominative case, as is "Christ," rather than being in the genitive case. If the word had been a genitive, the announcement would have concerned "the Lord's Christ," which would have been perfectly correct but would have meant no more than that Jesus was a specially chosen man, like one of the Old Testament kings, priests, or prophets. Because the word is in the nominative case, the statement actually goes beyond this to mean

"Christ [who is] the Lord."

3. Psalm 110:1. On one occasion, recorded in Matthew 22:41-46, Jesus asked his enemies who they thought the Christ was to be. They replied, "The son of David." This was true as far as it went; but they were thinking of an earthly, human Messiah, and Jesus wanted them to see farther. So he referred them to this Old Testament text, asking, "How is it then that David, speaking by the Spirit, calls him 'Lord'? For he says, 'The Lord said to my Lord: "Sit at my right hand until I put your enemies under your feet.'" If then David calls him 'Lord,' how can he be his son?" (vv. 43-45). Jesus' point was that if David called the Messiah "Lord," it could only be because the Messiah was to be more than just one of his descendants. He would have to be a divine Messiah, which is what the title "Lord" indicates.

Peter had this text in mind when he told the Sanhedrin, "God exalted him [Jesus] to his own right hand as Prince and Savior..." (Acts 5:31).

Paul was also thinking of this when he wrote, "Since, then, you have been raised with Christ, set your heart on things above, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God" (Col. 3:1).

The author of Hebrews used the text early in his letter (and also at two later points): "After he [the Son] had provided purification for [our] sins, he sat down at the right hand of the Majesty in heaven" (Heb. 1:3; cf. 8:1; 12:2).

4. Philippians 2:5-11. The great Christological hymn of Philippians 2 is the clearest textual statement that "Jesus is Lord," that is, one with God.

> Your attitude should be the same as that of Christ Jesus:
> Who, being in very nature God, did not consider equality with God something to be grasped, but made himself nothing, taking the very nature of a servant, being made in human likeness.
> And being found in appearance as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient to death—even death on a cross!
> Therefore God exalted him to the highest place and gave him the name that is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

What is the "name that is above every name"? It is not the name "Jesus" itself, though the wording seems to suggest this to the English reader. It is the name "Lord"; for that is God's own name, and no name can be higher than that.

The meaning of this tide shows why the early Christians would not apply the name "Lord" to any other. If they had done so, they would have been repudiating Christ. One famous case is that of the aged Bishop of Smyrna, Polycarp, who was martyred on February 22, a.d. 156. As he was driven to the arena, two of the city officials, who had respect for him because of his age and reputation, tried to persuade him to comply with the demand to honor Caesar. "What harm is there in saying, 'Caesar is Lord,' and burning incense... and saving yourself?" they asked. Polycarp refused. Later, in the arena, he explained his position, saying, "For eighty-six years I have been [Christ's] slave, and he has done me no wrong; how can I blaspheme my king who saved me?" Polycarp refused to call Caesar "Lord," because "Lord" meant "God" and there can only be one God. If Polycarp had called Caesar "Lord," then Jesus could not have been "Lord" for Polycarp, and Polycarp could not have been a Christian.

Those who recorded Polycarp's story shared his convictions, for they concluded by saying: "He [Polycarp] was arrested by Herod, when Philip of Tralles was high priest, and Statius Quadratus was governor, but our Lord Jesus Christ was reigning forever. To him be glory, honor, majesty and eternal dominion from generation to generation. Amen."

Lord and Savior

The second implication of the title "Lord" is that Jesus is the Savior. This is linked to his lordship because, as John R. W. Stott writes:

The title "Lord" is a symbol of Christ's victory over the forces of evil. If Jesus has been exalted over all the principalities and powers of evil, as indeed he has, this is the reason why he has been called Lord. If Jesus has been proclaimed Lord, as he has, it is because these powers are under his feet. He has conquered them on the cross, and therefore our salvation—that is to say, our rescue from sin, Satan, fear and death—is due to that victory.

In recent years it has become customary in some parts of the evangelical world to distinguish between the lordship and the saviorhood of Christ in such a way that one is supposed to be able to have Jesus as Savior without having him as Lord. This is the view, for example, of Charles C. Ryrie, former Dean of Doctoral Studies and Professor of Systematic Theology at Dallas Theological Seminary. Reacting to statements by Arthur W. Pink, J. I. Packer and John R. W.

Stott in a variety of publications, Ryrie argues that any attempt to link "Jesus as Lord" to "Jesus as Savior" is the equivalent of adding "commitment" to "faith" in salvation. And since "the message of faith only and the message of faith plus commitment of life cannot both be the gospel... one of them is a false gospel and comes under the curse of perverting the gospel or preaching another gospel (Gal. 1:6-9)."

There are two serious mistakes at this point. One involves the meaning of faith, which Ryrie seems to detach from commitment. Is "faith" minus "commitment" a true biblical faith? Hardly! Biblical faith involves three elements: (1) knowledge, upon which it is based; (2) heart response, which results from the new birth; and (3) commitment, without which "faith" is no different from the assent of the demons, who only "believe that and shudder" (James 2:19). Faith without commitment is no true faith. It is a dead faith that will save no one.

The second mistake is even more serious, because it involves the person and work of Jesus himself. Who is this one who has saved us from our sins? He is, as Paul has it, "Jesus Christ our Lord." No true Christian will add anything to the finished work of Jesus. To do so is really to proclaim a false gospel. We direct people to the Lord Jesus Christ. Nevertheless, he is the Lord Jesus Christ. This Lord is the object of faith and its content. There is no other. Consequently, if faith is directed to one who is not Lord, it is directed to one who is a false Christ of the imagination. Such a one is not the Savior, and he will save no one.

Is He Our Lord?

At this point it is easy for some of us to sit back and congratulate ourselves on having a sound theology. Of course, we know that Jesus must be Lord to be Savior. Of course, we know that true faith involves commitment. But is Jesus really our Lord? Are we truly committed to him? In the study of Christ's lordship by John Stott, from which I quoted earlier, six implications are suggested:

1. An intellectual implication. If Jesus is our Lord, one thing he must be Lord of is our thinking. He must be Lord of our minds. On one occasion, when the Lord called disciples, he said, "Take my yoke upon you and learn from me..." (Matt. 11:29), meaning that he was to be the disciples' teacher. He is to be our teacher today.

How does Jesus do this, seeing that he is not with us physically as he was in the time of the disciples? The answer is that he teaches us through Scripture. That is why we must be men and women of the Book —if we truly are Christ's followers. Left to ourselves, we will stray into many kinds of false thinking just as the world does. But if we regularly read and study the Bible, asking the Holy Spirit to interpret it for us, and then try to live out what we understand, we will increasingly come to think as Christ thinks and discover that we have an entirely new outlook on the world. We will see people from God's perspective, and we will not be taken in by the world's false ideas.

2. An ethical implication. In the study I referred to earlier, Stott points out that Jesus is not just Lord of our minds. He is Lord of our wills and of our moral standards also.

It is not only what we believe that is to come under the lordship of Jesus but also how we behave. Discipleship implies obedience, and obedience implies that there are absolute moral commands that we are required to obey. To refer to Jesus politely as "our Lord" is not enough.
He still says to us, "Why do you call me Lord and do not the things that I say?" In today's miasma of relativity we need to maintain unashamedly the absolute moral standards of the Lord. Further, we need to go on and teach that the yoke of Jesus is easy and his burden is light, and that under the yoke of Jesus we have not bondage but freedom and rest.

3. A vocational implication. If Jesus is Lord, then he is not only Lord of our minds, wills, and morals, but he is also Lord of our time;

this means that he is Lord of our professions, jobs, careers, and ambitions. We cannot plan our lives as if our relationship to Jesus is somehow detached from those plans and irrelevant to them.

Paul is an example at this point. Before he met Christ on the road to Damascus and bowed before him, Paul was pursuing a vocation of his own choice. He was a Pharisee and intent on rising high in the intellectual and ruling structures of Judaism. He knew where he was going. When he met Jesus all this was redirected. The first words Jesus uttered after he had stopped Paul cold by asking, "Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?" (Acts 9:4) and by identifying himself as Jesus, were: "Now get up and go into the city, and you will be told what you must do" (v. 6). Paul obeyed Jesus and was indeed told what he was to do. He was to be Christ's apostle to the Gentiles. Later, when Paul gave a defense of his activities before King Agrippa, he quoted the Lord as saying to him, "I have appeared to you to appoint you as a servant and as a witness of what you have seen of me and what I will show you. I will rescue you from your own people and from the Gentiles. I am sending you to them to open their eyes and turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God..." (Acts 26:16-18). Paul concluded, "So then, King Agrippa, I was not disobedient to the vision from heaven" (v. 19).

This is precisely the way we must regard our vocations. We may not be called to be apostles, as Paul was. Only a few are called to what we term "religious work." But whether we work in a church or a factory, in a hospital, a law firm, or our own small business, whether we are homemakers or builders of homes—whatever our calling, we must regard it as a form of Christian service and know that we are obeying our Lord Jesus Christ as we pursue it.

4. An ecclesiastical implication. Jesus is also head of the church. This truth can deliver us from two banes. One is disorder. It occurs when those who are members of the church pursue their own course—including what they wish their church to be—without regard to the guidelines for church life laid down in the Bible or without proper consideration for those who are their brothers and sisters in the Lord. The second is clericalism. It occurs when laypeople abandon their God-given roles in the church or when pastors tyrannize the church without acknowledging that they are servants of the people as well as servants of Christ and that they must serve the church as Jesus served it.

5. A political implication. Today, when we talk about the lordship of Christ, we face a battle on two fronts. One is an intra-mural contest, which goes on within the Christian fellowship. It is the battle I was speaking about earlier when I repudiated certain attempts to separate the saving work of Christ from his lordship.

But there is another battle also, and it is extra-mural. That is, it is outside the church's fellowship. It comes from those who, in a certain sense, may be quite tolerant of religion, but who insist that religion must be kept in its place—"on the reservation"—and that, above all, it must not intrude into our national life. We are fighting this battle every day. And we are saying—I hope we are saying—that Jesus is not only our own personal Lord and not only Lord of the church that he founded; he is also Lord of all life, the life of nations included. He is not merely our King; he is the King of kings. He is not merely our Lord; he is the Lord of lords. Therefore, we who are Christians stand as his representatives in history to call this world to account. We are here to remind the world that this same Jesus Christ whom we serve has spoken from heaven to reveal what true righteousness is, both for individuals and nations, and that those who disregard him do so at their own peril and must one day give an account.

Yet this must be done correctly. First, it must be done humbly. For none of us is perfect—we, too, must appear before Jesus—and those we speak to are ultimately answerable to him and not to us. Second, we must know that our mission is to be by example and word and not by force. Otherwise we will become triumphalists. We must remember that the Lord did not come to set up an army or even a political organization, but rather a witnessing fellowship. Whenever the church has departed from the Lord's pattern in this area, it has always done so to its harm.

6. A global implication. If Jesus is our Lord, the final implication flows from the Great Commission by which, on the basis of his own authority, the Lord sent disciples into the entire world to make and disciple Christians everywhere (Matt. 28:18-20). The lordship of Jesus is the most powerful of missionary incentives. It is as Lord of our lives that he tells us to go; because we know him as Lord, this is exactly what we do. Because we love him, we want everyone to become his disciples.

I close with the questions I asked at the beginning of this list. Is Jesus your Lord? Are you truly committed to him? If you are, your life can never be what it would be otherwise. If he is your Lord, no other can ever take his place.

Chapter 5.
The Obedience of Faith

Romans 1:5

It is a puzzle to me that whenever I write about the lordship of Jesus Christ, as I did in the previous chapter, stressing that one must follow Jesus and submit to him to be a Christian, some people always object that an emphasis like this destroys the gospel. If Jesus must be Lord, then salvation cannot be by "simple" faith, they argue. If we insist that one must follow Christ, we must be mingling works with faith as a means of salvation, which is "another gospel."

No matter that I show what true biblical faith is! No matter that I explain how obedience and faith both necessarily follow from regeneration!

I suppose that Paul had this problem, too, if for no other reason than that the human mind seems to work much the same way in all people. I believe Paul had these difficulties because of the way he develops his thoughts in the opening verses of Romans. In the Greek text the first seven verses of the book are one long sentence, not an unusual form for one writing in good Greek style. Nevertheless, there has been a natural and significant climax at the end of verse 4 in the words "Jesus Christ our Lord." This is the point to which the earlier verses have been leading, and it would have been quite proper, as well as good Greek, if Paul had ended his sentence there.

Why does he not do this? Why does he add the thoughts in verse 5 before the wrap-up to the introduction in verses 6 and 7? The answer is along the lines I am describing. The apostle has spoken of Jesus Christ as "Lord." Now, knowing how people think when confronted with that idea, he feels the need to amplify his statement.

Must Jesus be Lord if one is to be saved by him? If he must, this will have an effect on the way we understand the gospel and obey Christ's command to evangelize the world.

Disobedience and Obedience

The key words of verse 5 are those the New International Version translates as "to the obedience that comes from faith" (literally, "unto obedience of faith"). There are two ways this phrase can be interpreted. First, it can be interpreted as referring to the obedience which faith produces or in which it results. I think this is not the true meaning. But it is worth noting that, even if this is the correct interpretation, the point I have been making is still plain, since Paul would be saying that true biblical faith must produce obedience. If the "faith" one has does not lead to obedience, it is not the faith the Bible is talking about when it calls us to faith in Jesus Christ. It may be intellectual assent of a very high order. But it is not a living faith. It does not join us to Jesus Christ, and it will save no one.

Yet the case is even stronger than this, because a proper interpretation of the phrase is not "unto the obedience to which faith leads" (the first interpretation) but rather "unto obedience, the very nature of which is faith" (the second interpretation). Or, to turn it around, we could say, "faith, which is obedience."

This is such an important point that I want to establish it a bit more fully before going on to show why it is important. The way I want to do this is to show that it is the view of the most important commentators. Let me cite a few, starting with the most recent and moving backwards.

1. D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones: "The Apostle says... 'the obedience of faith' in order to bring out this point—that he is talking about an obedience which consists in faith, or, if you like, an obedience of which faith is the central principle."

2. John Murray: "It is... intelligible and suitable to take 'faith' as in apposition to 'obedience' and understand it as the obedience which consists in faith. Faith is regarded as an act of obedience, or commitment to the gospel of Christ."

3. Charles Hodge: "The obedience of faith is that obedience which consists in faith, or of which faith is the controlling principle."

4. Robert Haldane: "The gospel reforms those who believe it; but it would be presenting an imperfect view of the subject to say that it was given to reform the world. It was given that men might believe and be saved. The obedience, then, here referred to, signifies submission to the doctrine of the gospel."

5. F. Godet: "The only possible meaning is: the obedience which consists of faith itself."

6. Martin Luther (contrasting Paul's demand with human arguments): "Paul here speaks of

'obedience to the faith' and not of obedience to such wisdom as first must be proved by arguments of reason and experience. It is not at all his intention to prove what he says, but he demands of his readers implicit trust in him as one having divine authority."

7. John Calvin: "By stating the purpose of his call Paul again reminds the Romans of his office, as though he were saying, 'It is my duty to discharge the responsibility entrusted to me, which is > to preach the word. It is your responsibility to hear the word and wholly obey it, unless you want to make void the calling which the Lord has bestowed on me.' We deduce from this that those who irreverently and contemptuously reject the preaching of the gospel, the design of which is to bring us into obedience to God, are stubbornly resisting the power of God and perverting the whole of his order."

I have taken several pages to make this point because, as I said at the beginning, it is an extremely important matter. It is important because it affects how we understand the gospel and how we seek to obey Christ's command to evangelize. How is it that most of today's evangelism is conducted? It is true, is it not, that for the most part the gospel is offered to people as something that (in our opinion) is good for them and will make them happy but that they are at perfect liberty to refuse! "The Holy Spirit is a gentleman," we are sometimes told. "He would never coerce anybody." With a framework like this, sin becomes little more than bad choices and faith only means beginning to see the issues clearly.

What is missing in this contemporary approach is the recognition that sin primarily is disobedience and that God commands us to repent and repudiate it. As D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones says, "Sin is not just that which I do that is wrong and which makes me feel miserable afterwards... not just that which spoils my life and makes me feel miserable and unhappy... not just that thing which gets me down and which I would like to overcome." It is that, but it is also much more. Primarily, sin is rebellion against God. "Sin is refusal to listen to the voice of God. Sin is a turning of your back upon God and doing what you think." So, when the gospel is preached, it must be preached not merely as an invitation to experience life to the full or even to accept God's invitation. It must be preached as a command. (This is why Paul is so concerned to stress his role as an apostle, as one called and commissioned to be God's ambassador.) We are commanded to turn from our sinful disobedience to God and instead obey him by believing in and following the Lord Jesus Christ as our Savior.

This is the way Paul himself preached the gospel, though we frequently overlook it because of our own weak methods. Do you remember how Paul concluded his great sermon to the Athenians? "In the past God overlooked such ignorance, but now he commands all people everywhere to repent. For he has set a day when he will judge the world with justice by the man he has appointed..." (Acts 17:30-31, italics mine). In God's name, Paul commanded the Greeks to repent of their sin and turn to Jesus.

It is the same in Romans. In Romans 6:17 Paul summarizes the response of the Roman Christians to the gospel by saying, "Thanks be to God that, though you used to be slaves to sin, you wholeheartedly obeyed the form of teaching to which you were entrusted" (italics mine, here and in the subsequent citations). In Romans 10 he argues that the Jews "did not submit to God's righteousness" (v. 3); in verse 16 he says, "But they have not all obeyed the gospel..." (KJV). At the end of the letter the idea appears again in a great benediction: "Now to him who is able to establish you by my gospel and the proclamation of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery hidden for long ages past, but now revealed and made known through the prophetic writings by the command of the eternal God, so that all nations might believe and obey him—to the only wise God be glory forever through Jesus Christ! Amen" (Rom. 16:25-27).

In my opinion, the weakness of much of our contemporary Christianity can be traced to a deficiency at precisely this point. By failing to present the gospel as a command to be obeyed we minimize sin, trivialize discipleship, rob God of his glory, and delude some into thinking that all is well with their souls when actually they are without Christ and are perishing.

Pelagius and Jonathan Edwards

But there may be an objection at this point. It comes from those who know theology and are aware that, according to Paul's later teaching in Romans, everyone is so deeply ensnared by sin that even though the gospel may be preached to us, apart from the grace of God we are not able to repent and obey God's commands. This was the point that bothered Pelagius and led to his deviant theology and the resulting clash with Saint Augustine. Pelagius felt that if we are commanded to do something, we must be able to do it. "Ought" implies "can." But instead of throwing out the command (which is what most people seem to want to do today), Pelagius threw out the inability, arguing that we can turn from sin, believe on Christ, and pursue obedience in our own strength, entirely unaided by the Holy Spirit.

The problem here is that Pelagius was overlooking the nature of our inability, which he would have understood better had he paid more attention to the command for obedience. The inability of man in his fallen state is not a physical inability, as if God were demanding that a paralyzed person get up and walk to him. A person so impaired really would have an excuse for failing to do that, but that is not the right analogy. The inability we have is not a physical inability but a moral one. That is, we do not obey God, not because we cannot obey him physically, but because we will not obey God. It is this that makes the command to obey so important and our disobedience so reprehensible.

Let me give you one illustration. Jonathan Edwards, who is probably the greatest theologian America has produced, wrote his most impressive treatise on the "Freedom of the Will," and at one point toward the end of the treatise he had this answer for those who think the biblical doctrines unreasonable:

Let common sense determine whether there be not a great difference between these two cases: the one, that of a man who has offended his prince, and is cast into prison; and after he has lain there a while, the king comes to him, calls him to come forth; and tells him, that if he will do so, and will fall down before him and humbly beg his pardon, he shall be forgiven, and set at liberty, and also be greatly enriched, and advanced to honor: the prisoner heartily repents of the folly and wickedness of his offense against his prince, is thoroughly disposed to abase himself, and accept the king's offer; but is confined by strong walls, with gates of brass, and bars of iron. The other case is, that of a man who is of a very unreasonable spirit, of a haughty, ungrateful, willful disposition; and moreover, has been brought up in traitorous principles; and has his heart possessed with an extreme and inveterate enmity to his lawful sovereign; and for his rebellion is cast into prison, and lies long there, loaded with heavy chains, and in miserable circumstances. At length the compassionate prince comes to the prison, orders his chains to be knocked off, and his prison doors to be set wide open; calls to him and tells him, if he will come forth to him, and fall down before him, acknowledge that he has treated him unworthily, and ask his forgiveness; he shall be forgiven, set at liberty, and set in a place of great dignity and profit in his court. But he is so stout, and full of haughty malignity, that he cannot be willing to accept the offer; his rooted strong pride and malice have perfect power over him, and as it were bind him, by binding his heart: the opposition of his heart has the mastery over him, having an influence on his mind far superior to the king's grace and condescension, and to all his kind offers and promises. Now, is it agreeable to common sense, to assert and stand to it, that there is no difference between these two cases, as to any worthiness of blame in the prisoners?

When we first come upon an illustration like that, our reaction is to say that it is not an accurate description of our case, that we are not like the stubborn prisoner. But that is precisely what the Bible teaches we are like. Consequently, it is important for the gospel to be presented to the unsaved as a command and to have it stressed that God will hold us accountable if we persist in sin and refuse to bow before our rightful Lord.

Apostle of God's Grace

Yet, as I draw toward the end of this chapter, I must add that although the demand that we repent of sin and turn to the Lord Jesus Christ is a command, it is nevertheless a command that comes to us in the context of the gospel. And, remember, the gospel is not bad news; it is good news. Above all, it is the good news of God's grace.

I suppose that is why the word grace appears in verse 5—for the first time in the letter. It will occur again; it occurs just two verses later, in verse 7. In fact, it will be found a total of twentytwo times in the course of the epistle. "Grace" is one of the great words of Romans and a wonderful concept. In my opinion, the word occurs here because even though Paul is stressing the Lordship of Christ and the necessity of obeying God in response to the demands of the gospel, at the same time he is also keenly aware that those who respond to the gospel do so only because God is already graciously at work in them and because the gospel is itself the means by which the unmerited favor of God toward us is made operative.

What is this "grace"? Grace is often defined as God's favor toward the undeserving, but it is more than that. If we have understood Jonathan Edwards's illustration of the stubborn, rebellious prisoner, we know that it is actually God's favor toward those who deserve the precise opposite. What we deserve is hell. We do not even deserve a chance to hear the gospel, let alone experience the regenerating work of God within, by which we are enabled to turn from sin and obey Jesus. We deserve God's wrath. We deserve his fierce condemnation. But instead of wrath, we find grace. Instead of condemnation, we find the One who in our place bore God's judgment and now lives to rule over us.

I do not know what went through the mind of Paul as he wrote these words. I know only what I read in the text. But I suspect that Paul was thinking of his own experience of God's grace as he mentions the matter of his apostleship again in verse 5, saying that it was through Christ that he "received grace and apostleship to call people from among all the Gentiles."

There is a passage in 1 Corinthians that gives a clue to what is going on. Paul had been writing of Christ's resurrection appearances and had added that after appearing to James and all the other apostles, Jesus had appeared to him as to one "abnormally born." Then he added, in words that were not demanded by the context but which undoubtedly flowed from Paul's acute sense of God's rich grace toward him, "For I am the least of the apostles and do not even deserve to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God. But by the grace of God I am what I am, and his grace to me was not without effect..." (1 Cor. 15:9-10).

Like all who have been truly converted, Paul could never forget what he had been apart from God's grace.

He had been self-righteous.

He had been cruel.

He had been fighting against the goads of God in his conscience.

He had been trying to destroy God's work by his persecution of the infant church.

But God had stopped him and had brought him to a right mind. Up to that point he had been disobeying God. But when Jesus revealed himself to him on the road to Damascus, the rebellious will of the future apostle to the Gentiles was broken and Paul became Jesus' obedient servant and disciple. How could that be? How could one so rebellious be brought to his knees before Jesus? There is only one answer. It was the grace of God. Only the grace of God can produce such changes. Only a gracious God would want to.

Why is it that we so easily fall into either of two wrong emphases when we present the gospel? Either we present the gospel as something so easy and simplistic that it fails to deal with sin and does not really produce conversions. Or else we present a harsh gospel, forgetting that it is only the love of God and not the condemnation of the law that wins anybody.

And there is one more point to be made. It is only the gracious love of God that motivates us to be his ambassadors. We are not apostles, as Paul was, but we have a corresponding function. We are God's witnesses in this world, and, like Paul, we are to take the gospel to the nations. What will motivate us to do that and will actually keep us at it when the going gets hard? There is only one thing: remembrance of the grace of God, which we have first received. Paul said this in 2 Corinthians: "For Christ's love compels us, because we are convinced that one died for all, and therefore all died. And he died for all, that those who live should no longer live for themselves but for him who died for them and was raised again.... All this is from God, who reconciled us to himself through Christ and gave us the ministry of reconciliation" (2 Cor. 5:14-15, 18).

Chapter 6.
Those Roman Christians

Romans 1:6-7

Perhaps you have at some time picked up a letter, begun to read it, been confused by what was being said, and then flipped to the end—perhaps through several pages of nearly undecipherable handwriting—looking for the signature while you asked yourself, "Who in the world is writing this?" I have done that many times, and I have thought that it would be a lot easier if we began our letters like most ancient writers did.

Writers of old started their letters with three elements: (1) the name of the writer, (2) the name of those to whom he or she was writing, and (3) a greeting. A typical ancient letter might begin like this one from the commander of the Roman garrison at Jerusalem, recorded in Acts 23: "Claudius Lysias, To His Excellency, Governor Felix: Greetings" (v. 26). "Claudius Lysias," the first element in the introduction, is the name of the garrison commander. The second element is "His Excellency, Governor Felix," the name of the person to whom he is writing. Finally, there is the salutation, which in this case is merely "Greetings." The whole is a bit like the start of one of today's inner-office memos. After these formal elements, the commander gets down to the body of the letter, which explains why he is writing it.

Paul's letter to the Romans is styled like this, yet Paul is so filled with his basic theme—the gospel of God centered in Jesus Christ—that he inevitably adds a lot more to the introduction. He begins simply enough: "Paul, a servant of Christ Jesus...." But as he begins to explain a bit further just who he is ("called to be an apostle and set apart for the gospel of God"), the word gospel sets him off explaining what that gospel of God is about. It is a gospel "promised beforehand... in the Holy Scriptures," concerning God's Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, "who as to his human nature was a descendant of David, and who through the Spirit of holiness was declared with power to be the Son of God by his resurrection from the dead." If we did not know him better, we might think that Paul is already well into his letter at this point. But Paul now brings the description of the gospel back to himself and his apostleship, the point with which he began: "Through him and for his name's sake, we received grace and apostleship to call people from among all the Gentiles to the obedience that comes from faith." Then, having returned to his starting point, he proceeds to the next two elements of the classical introduction: "And you also are among those who are called to belong to Jesus Christ. To all in Rome who are loved by God and called to be saints: Grace and peace to you from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ."

This introduction is like a sine wave in mathematics. It begins low, swells to a great peak, and then falls back to an emotional low point again: Paul's reference to the Roman Christians and his greeting to them.

Where Did They Come From?

Yet this wrap-up is not uninteresting. In the first place, it is noteworthy because of the church at Rome itself. Even at this early date—Paul is writing about a.d. 58 or 59, less than thirty years after the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ—the faith of this church was being spoken of "all over the world" (Rom. 1:8). Later, as we know, the church at Rome became increasingly strong, influential, and powerful—eventually corrupt. Even today the church of Rome is a powerful force in Christendom.

Where did this church come from? How did it get started? One thing we can say is that Paul himself did not found it. God had called him to be the apostle to the Gentiles. Rome was a Gentile city. Yet, as he himself says in verse 13, although Paul had wanted to come to Rome many times, he was prevented from doing so, presumably by pressing missionary concerns. Paul got to Rome later, and Luke tells us about it in Acts. But this was many years after the church in Rome had been founded.

Catholic tradition holds that the Roman church was founded by the apostle Peter and that he was the first pope. I do not think it is necessary to argue, as some Protestants have, that Peter was never in Rome. On the contrary, I think an early church document, "The First Letter of Clement to the Corinthians," implies, though it does not prove, that he was there. But that is not the same thing as saying that Peter founded the Roman church, and the evidence on that point is quite the other way. We know from the long list of names in the last chapter of Romans that Paul knew a great deal about the Roman church, even though he had not been there, yet nowhere in that chapter or elsewhere does he mention Peter, which is nearly inconceivable if Peter was in Rome or if he had founded the Roman church. Indeed, Paul says that it had always been his ambition "to preach the gospel where Christ was not known, so that I would not be building on someone else's foundation" (Rom. 15:20). It is hard to see how Paul could have written this in a doctrinal letter to the Roman church if it had already been founded by Peter and received its early teaching from him.

So how did the church become established? The truth is, we do not know. But there is a suggestion in the second chapter of Acts of what may have happened. That chapter tells about Pentecost, and it gives a list of the many nations that were represented in Jerusalem that day, including "visitors from Rome (both Jews and converts to Judaism)" (vv. 10-11). Since the text specifically speaks of "visitors from Rome," we are probably right in supposing that most of these visitors returned to their capital city after the Jewish feast days and established the first churches in Italy there. If this is the case, the Roman church existed from the very earliest days of the Christian mission.

Moreover, this is a pattern that would have continued. There was a great deal of travel in the ancient world, much more than we might suppose. Rome was the center of these comings and goings. Undoubtedly, people who had been brought to Christ as a result of Paul's Gentile mission went to and from Rome, and many undoubtedly settled there. This would explain how Paul came to know as many of the Roman Christians as the last chapter shows he did, and it would explain why Paul was not hesitant to write to this church to seek its prayer support for his trip to Jerusalem as well as its financial backing for his projected missionary excursion to Spain (Rom. 15:24, 30-31).

It would also explain why, although the church was undoubtedly composed of both Jews and Gentiles, Paul writes to these believers largely as Gentiles. We see this as early as verse 6, where the phrase "and you also" most naturally picks up from the description of Paul's commission in verse 5: "to call people from among all the Gentiles."

So the first interesting information is that a body of genuine followers of Jesus Christ, whether large or small (we do not know), existed in the capital city of the Roman empire—of all places! We usually think of Rome as the imperial city of the Caesars, glorious in its palaces, marble monuments, and treasures. It was that. But it was also a terrible city, full of horrible sins and gross licentiousness. Vice was everywhere. Yet in this city of gross sin there was a fellowship of people who rejected Rome's sin and instead lived an entirely different kind of life. It was a life marked by holiness, a mutual sharing of burdens, love, and compassion for those who were abused or downtrodden. It was nothing less than a new humanity planted by God atop the deteriorating carcass of the old.

That is what Christianity always is. It is not an outgrowth, not even a quantum leap upward from the world's decaying civilization. It is something utterly new. It is what you are, if you are a Christian—"a new creation" in Christ (2 Cor. 5:17). It is what your church is, if it is composed of true believers.

How Did They Become Different?

Another interesting thing about the second and third parts of the letter's introduction is what they tell us about the spiritual origins of these people. Here is a group of people who were in the midst of a corrupt pagan society, yet were entirely different from the mainstream. How did they get to be different? How did they become Christians? In these verses Paul tells us four important things about the early church at Rome.

1. The Christians at Rome, like all Christians, were called to belong to Jesus Christ. This is a general description of Christians, which is different from the similar phrase "called to be saints" that occurs in the next verse. What does it mean? Some people have read verse 6 as if it were describing Christians as people "called by Jesus Christ," because the Greek can be translated that way. But here the New International Version is undoubtedly correct when it inserts the words "to belong to." The sense is not that Jesus has called Christians—that is a work usually attributed to God the Father—but rather that, as a result of God's calling, Christians are attached to Jesus and have their true life in that relationship. Before, as Paul writes in Ephesians 2:1-3, they were "dead in [their] transgressions and sins" and were "by nature objects of wrath." Now, as a result of God's calling, they have been "made alive with Christ" and given "good works" to do (vv. 5, 10).

This is the essential definition of a Christian (a "Christ one"). A Christian is one who belongs to Jesus Christ. This is what makes him or her different and why such a one inevitably seeks the company of others who also belong to Jesus. Nothing is more important than this in a believer's life.

Does this describe you? Do you belong to Jesus Christ? If you do, you will live like it. If you do not, you are no true Christian, regardless of your outward profession.

2. The Christians at Rome, like all Christians, were loved by God the Father. This is no bland statement, as if Paul were only declaring that it is God's nature to love and that these citizens of Rome, like all persons, were therefore loved by him. That is not the way the Bible speaks of God's love. This love is an electing, saving love. So the statement "loved by God" actually describes how those who are Christians come to belong to the Lord Jesus Christ in the first place.

How indeed? Some think that people become believers by their own unaided choice, as if all we have to do is decide to trust Jesus. But how could we possibly do that if, as we have seen Paul say, each of us is "dead in... transgressions and sins"? How can a dead man decide anything? Some have supposed that we become Christians because God in his omniscience sees some small bit of good in us, even if that "good" is only a tiny seed of faith. But how could God see good in us if, as Paul will later remind us: "All have turned away, they have together become worthless; there is no one who does good, not even one" (Rom. 3:12; cf. Ps. 14:3)? Why, then, does God love us? The answer is "because he loves us." There is just nothing to be said beyond that.

Do you remember how God put it in reference to Israel in the days of Moses? "The LORD did not set his affection on you and choose you because you were more numerous than other peoples, for you were the fewest of all peoples. But it was because the LORD loved you..." (Deut. 7:7-8). The only explanation of why the Lord loved them was that he loved them. It is love and love only.

This is a tremendous thing, if we are Christians. It is something so great we can hardly begin to take it in. D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones says:

We are Christians for one reason only and that is that God has set his love upon us. That is the thing that brings us out of the world and out of the dominion of Satan.... And therefore it is not surprising that the apostle here should remind these Christians of this wonderful thing. The world hated them; it persecuted them. They might be arrested at any moment, at the whim of any cruel tyrant who happened to be the emperor, and they might be condemned to death and thrown to the lions in the arena. They were oftentimes hated of all men, so Paul is anxious that they should realize this, that they are the beloved of God; that they are in Christ and that God loves them in the same way as he loves Christ.... Do not rush on to chapters six, seven and eight, saying, 'I want to know about the doctrine of sanctification.' My dear friend, if you only realized, as you should, that you are loved by God as he loved his own Son, you would learn the most important thing with respect to your sanctification without going any further.

The most important thing is that God has loved us. Therefore, we should love and serve him.

3. The Christians at Rome, like all Christians, were called to be believers by God. Here is the same idea that occurs earlier in the phrase "called to belong to Jesus Christ"; but although the meaning of the verb is the same, the emphasis here is different. In the earlier phrase the emphasis was on what it means to be a Christian. A Christian is one who belongs to Jesus Christ; this is his identity. Here the emphasis is on the call itself, and it is a follow-up to the truth that Christians have been loved by God. First, loved. Then, called. The calling is what theologians term "effectual calling."

There are two kinds of calling in any presentation of the gospel. The first is a general calling, which means that all who hear are called to turn from their sin to Jesus Christ. This calling corresponds to the demand for obedience that I was talking about in the previous chapter. Not all who hear will respond to this call. Not all will obey. Nevertheless, when we call in Christ's words, "Come to me, all you who are weary and burdened.... Take my yoke upon you and learn from me" (Matt. 11:28-29a), it is a genuine calling. From God's side no barrier is erected. Nothing stands in the way. At the same time, as we also saw, human beings do not obey God if left to themselves. No one responds to God's offer. None want to. So, that some might be saved, God adds to the general call (conveyed to the lost by his servants), a specific call by which God's chosen ones inwardly hear and respond, becoming Christians. The situation is similar to Jesus' call to dead Lazarus. Left to ourselves, we are all spiritual corpses. We cannot do anything. But when God calls savingly, some of these spiritual corpses come to spiritual life and do God's bidding. Anyone who has been saved by God has heard this call in some way and has responded to it.

It may have been—it often is—through preaching. The Word is declared, and somewhere in the church, sitting in a pew with only God looking on, the person involved hears God himself speak. He or she says, "That preacher is describing me. That is my need. It is what I must do." And the person believes! For another it is the quiet witness of a friend who says, "Don't you want to become a Christian? Why don't we pray, and why don't you receive Jesus?" It can be through the quiet reading of the Bible. It can be through a Christian movie, book, or tract. What is common to all these experiences is that God has called and the person has heard him and believed on Jesus Christ.

My good friend R. C. Sproul tells of his conversion during his first year in college. He and a college buddy were exposed to the gospel one night and both "accepted" Jesus. For R. C., life was never the same. He was and remains an entirely different person. But his friend came down from his room the next morning and said, "Wasn't that crazy, what we did last night? I guess I just got carried away. You won't tell anybody about it, will you?" The friend had heard only the call of the preacher. But God had called R. C., and this call, being from God himself, had produced a new man through the new birth or regeneration.

4. The Christians at Rome, like all Christians, are called saints. Here "saint" does not mean what it has come to mean in large sectors of the Christian church: one who has attained a certain level of holiness and is therefore worthy of some special veneration or even hearing human prayers. In the Bible, being a saint or being sanctified always means being separated to God and his work, precisely what Paul said of himself in verse 1 in the words "set apart for the gospel of God." Having been loved by God and called by him, the Christians at Rome, like all Christians, were then also set apart to him, to live for him and work for him in this world.

This is why the faith of the Roman Christians was "being reported all over the world," as Paul says it was in verse 8. Because they had been called by God and were separated to him, these believers were different from the culture around them. And people noticed it!

Do people today notice the difference in those who profess to be Christians? There is no simple answer to this question, because the answer is often relative and because it is Yes in one situation and No in another. But notice the connective relationship between the terms in these two verses. Robert Haldane speaks of the believers being loved by God, called by God and being saints, saying rightly, "They were saints because they were called, and they were called because they were beloved of God." That is, their being saints was not the cause but the result of their election. Being elect, they were saints; that is, they were separated to God. So, if it is ever the case that one who professes to have been called by God is not actually separated unto him—I do not mean "not perfect" but "not headed in God's direction"—that person is not saved. He or she is no Christian. The one who has been loved and called by God does obey God and does follow after him.

Grace for the Rugged Upward Way

Yet this involves struggle. It requires the grace and peace of God each step of the rugged upward way.

When Paul closes his introduction with the wish that the believers at Rome might experience "grace and peace... from God our Father and from the Lord Jesus Christ," he is not merely passing on a traditional (would we say "hackneyed"?) Christian greeting. He is wishing them what they, and we also, need every day we remain on this planet. We have been saved by grace. We must live by grace also. Just as we live moment by moment by drawing breaths of God's good air, so we must live spiritually moment by moment by drawing on his favor. Jesus said, "Apart from me you can do nothing" (John 15:5b). A man who is going through a shattering crisis in his business told me just a short time ago, "The only way I get through it is by spending solid blocks of time with God each morning." And he is doing it! What is more, the crisis is deepening his sense of God's presence and strengthening him, rather than doing the opposite.

And peace? We always need peace, for these are not peaceful times. Only fools think them peaceful. These are troublesome times. But those who are in Christ and are drawing on him for their strength live peacefully in the midst of them.

I close with Paul's own prayer for those great Roman Christians: "Grace and peace to you from God our Father and from the Lord Jesus Christ." What great gifts these are! How needed! What a wonderful and inexhaustible source of supply!

Chapter 7.
A Reputation Worth Having

Romans 1:8

In the well-known Shakespearean speech "All the world's a stage, and all the men and women merely players," the melancholy Lord Jaques speaks of a soldier as one "seeking the bubble reputation even in the cannon's mouth" (As You Like It, Act II, Scene 7). In this speech "reputation" is depicted as worthless, unimportant. How different in Othello! Othello, who is also a soldier but who acted foolishly and tragically, says, "I have lost my reputation! I have lost the immortal part, sir, of myself, and what remains is bestial!" (Act II, Scene 3).

How are we to think of reputation? Is it a fragile bubble, or is it immortal? Is it worth having, or is it better for us not even to be concerned with such matters? The answer is that it depends on what we have a reputation for.

In the first chapter of Romans, in a section that is the second, informal introduction to his letter (vv. 8-15), the apostle Paul speaks about a reputation that the Christians at Rome had acquired, and the important point is that he thanks God for it. Their reputation was for faith, and what Paul tells us is that their faith was being spoken about all over the world. This does not mean that every individual in every remote hamlet of the globe had heard of the faith of the Roman Christians, of course, but it does mean that their faith was becoming widely known—no doubt because other Christians were talking about it. "Do you know that there is a group of believers in Rome?" they were asking. "Have you heard how strong their faith is, how faithfully they are trying to serve Jesus Christ in that wicked city?" Since Paul begins his comment by thanking God for this reputation, it is apparent that however worthless some worldly reputations of some worldly persons may be, this reputation at least was worth having.

Why is a reputation for faith worth having? The text suggests four reasons.

A Genuine Faith

The first reason that the reputation of the Christians at Rome was worth having is that the faith on which it was based was genuine. It was a true faith. This is an important place to begin, because there is much so-called faith that is nonbiblical faith and is therefore a flawed and invalid basis for any reputation.

In some people's minds, faith is thought of chiefly as a subjective religious feeling, entirely divorced from God's written revelation. I once talked with a young man who thought of faith in this way. When I had asked him if he was a Christian, he said he was. But as we talked I soon discovered that he did not believe in the deity of Jesus Christ, his bodily resurrection, his sacrificial death for our sin, and many other cardinal Christian doctrines. When I asked the young man how he could reject doctrines central to Christian belief and still call himself a Christian, he replied that he did not know how to answer that question but that nevertheless, deep in his heart, he believed he was a Christian. Clearly this was no true faith. It was only a certain variable outlook on life based on his feelings.

Another substitute for true faith is credulity. This is the attitude of people who will accept something as true only because they strongly wish it to be true. Sometimes a faith like this is fixed upon a miraculous cure for some terminal disease, like congenital heart failure, AIDS, or cancer. But credulity does not make a cure happen. Wishful thinking is not genuine faith.

A third false faith is optimism. Norman Vincent Peale has popularized this substitute faith through his best-selling book The Power of Positive Thinking. He suggests that we collect strong New Testament texts about faith, memorize them, let them sink down into our subconscious, and then recall them and recite them whenever we find faith in ourselves wavering. "Everything is possible for him who believes" (Mark 9:23). "If you have faith as small as a mustard seed, you can say to this mountain, 'Move from here to there' and it will move. Nothing will be impossible for you" (Matt. 17:20). Peale says, "According to your faith in yourself, according to your faith in your job, according to your faith in God, this far will you get and no further."

In this statement, however, faith in yourself, faith in your job, and faith in God are all apparently the same thing, and what this means is that the object of one's faith is irrelevant. John Stott challenges this distortion accurately: "He [Peale] recommends as part of his 'worry-breaking formula' that the first thing every morning before we get up we should say out loud 'I believe' three times, but he does not tell us in what we are so confidently and repeatedly to affirm our belief. The last words of his book are simply 'so believe and live successfully.' But believe what? Believe whom? To Dr. Peale faith is really another word for self-confidence, for a largely ungrounded optimism." There is some value in a positive outlook on life, of course, just as there is some value in a positive self-image. But this is not the same thing as biblical faith, and it is not the faith for which the apostle Paul thanked God on behalf of the Roman Christians.

Why do I say that the faith of the believers at Rome was a genuine faith in contrast to these other, mistaken views of faith? There are two reasons. First, their faith was in Jesus Christ and in the gospel, which centers in him. Surely this is unmistakable from the context. In the first seven verses of this letter Paul has spoken at length of the gospel, defining it as the gospel "he [God] promised beforehand through his prophets in the Holy Scriptures regarding his Son [Jesus Christ]" and concluding that it had been Paul's task "to call people from among all the Gentiles to the obedience that comes from faith" (vv. 2, 3, 5). Then

Paul praises God for the faith of the Roman Christians, and it is evident that it is precisely that kind of faith he has in mind. Their reputation for faith was worth having because theirs was a true faith in Jesus Christ as God's Son and our Savior. As far as salvation is concerned, all other "faiths" are worthless. They will save no one.

Second, this is a faith that God himself brought into being and not something that welled up unaided in the heart of mere human beings. This is why Paul begins by thanking God for these Christians and not by praising them for their commitment. If faith were a human achievement, then Paul should have praised the Roman Christians. He should have said, "First, I thank you for believing in Jesus Christ" or "I praise you for your faith." But Paul does not do this. Faith is worked in us by God as a result of the new birth. Therefore, Paul praises God, not man, for the Roman Christians.

Robert Haldane wrote that in thanking God for the faith of those to whom he is writing "Paul... thus acknowledges God as the author of the Gospel, not only on account of his causing it to be preached to them, but because he had actually given them grace to believe."

Calvin said of this verse, "Faith is a gift of God."

This is the point to ask whether your faith is like that. Not faith in some nebulous subjective experience or something that you are able to work up by yourself, but a faith worked in you by God, as a result of which you have believed on his Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, as your Savior. If your faith is like that, then yours is a reputation worth having, because it will bring praise to God himself, who is the author of that faith.

A Contagious Faith

The second reason why the reputation for faith that the Christians at Rome had was worth having is that it was a contagious faith. I mean by this that it was a faith not merely heard of and talked about throughout the known world, but that it was also a faith picked up by and communicated to others. Because of this faith, the Roman church grew and the gospel of the Roman congregation spread.

I think this is suggested by verse 17, even though I know the phrase I am referring to can be interpreted in two ways. In Greek the verse contains a repetition of the word faith in a phrase that literally reads "from faith to faith" (ek pisteōs eis pistin). This can be understood, as the New International Version apparently does understand it, as meaning "by faith from first to last." But it can also mean—and a more literal translation suggests it does mean—"from the faith of one who has believed in Christ to another who comes to believe as a result of the first Christian's testimony."

As I say, the phrase "from faith to faith" does not necessarily mean this, since both translations are possible. But I think it does, and whether or not this is the correct meaning, there is no doubt that this is the way the gospel spread in the first Christian centuries, undoubtedly (at least in part) from the strategically located and growing church in the capital city of the Roman empire.

And the church had no modern media at its disposal to "get the message out"! There were no Christian magazines, no inspirational books, no television preachers. How do you suppose these early believers succeeded, as we know they did, without the tools of modern communication? D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones has the answer:

A revival never needs to be advertised; it always advertises itself.... Read the history of the church. When revival breaks out in a little group, it does not matter how small, the news spreads and curiosity is awakened and people come and say, 'What is this? Can we partake in this? How can we get hold of this?' Man does not need to advertise it; it becomes known; it spreads throughout the whole world. It had happened here. This is revival! This is Pentecost! This is the work of the Holy Spirit, and the news had spread like wildfire in that ancient world with its poor means of communication, and its absence and lack of advertising media. Isn't it time we began to think in New Testament terms?

If we think in New Testament terms, we will be concerned with both the quality of our faith and with its contagious nature. We will be concerned that people talk about Christianity and inquire after Christ as the result of our lives and those of our fellow believers.

Faith That Encourages Others

There is a third reason why the reputation for faith that the church at Rome had was worth having: it was an encouragement to other believers elsewhere, including even the apostle Paul himself. In verse 12 Paul speaks of this as an anticipated outcome of his proposed trip to Rome: "that you and I may be mutually encouraged by each other's faith." That expectation was still future. But Paul could look forward to it and speak so confidently of its happening because reports of the Roman Christians' faith had undoubtedly already been a source of encouragement to him.

Did Paul need encouragement? We can be sure he did. Paul was an apostle, of course, a man of great faith. But he is the first to tell us that he was often adversely afflicted by the trials and burdens of his work. In 1 Corinthians he admits that when he came to Corinth it was "in weakness and fear, and with much trembling" (1 Cor. 2:3). In his second letter to Corinth he writes, "We are hard pressed on every side, but not crushed; perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not abandoned; struck down, but not destroyed" (2 Cor. 4:8-9). Yet he concludes, "All this is for your benefit, so that the grace that is reaching more and more people may cause thanksgiving to overflow to the glory of God" (v. 15). Later in the same book, after a lengthy passage listing the many persecutions, hardships, and dangers he endured as Christ's ambassador, he concludes, "Besides everything else, I face daily the pressure of my concern for all the churches" (2 Cor. 11:28).

Everyone needs encouragement, particularly those who are engaged in spiritual warfare against Satan. But what is to encourage them? God, of course. But God also works through human instruments, and one great means of God's encouraging Christian workers is the report of genuine, growing faith on the part of others elsewhere.

This is an encouragement to me. Is it not an encouragement to you?

Doesn't your heart respond thankfully when you hear of thriving churches in formerly Communist nations such as Romania, even when believers there have been harassed and sometimes beaten by the civil authorities? Doesn't your spirit rise when you hear of the courageous stand against apartheid by many believers in South Africa?

Isn't your load made lighter when you are told of those in high levels of our own government, in the legislative, executive, and judicial branches, who regularly meet for prayer and Bible study, asking God to lead them as they seek to direct the affairs of the United States of America?

Aren't you also encouraged by the reports of those who are working for Christ in the tough neighborhoods of our cities?

Don't you rejoice when you hear of even one person who has become a Christian?

Let me interject this additional thought. The thing that distinguishes Paul's words to the believers in Rome from what he says elsewhere—to believers in Corinth, Galatia, Ephesus, Philippi or some other city he had visited—is that he had not founded the church in Rome. Although he was planning to visit Rome and be encouraged by a mutual sharing of faith with the Roman Christians, up to this point he had not done so, and I would suppose that for that reason alone he was especially encouraged.

Let me speak personally. I am encouraged when some message or word of mine is used by God to bring another person to faith in Christ, as often happens. I am encouraged when something I do for Christ prospers. But notice: I am especially encouraged, doubly heartened, when the blessing of God occurs elsewhere as the result of someone else's work. Why? Because it means that I am not alone in the work. It means that there are other soldiers in this spiritual warfare and that victory is in the strong hands of our one true commander. I am sure this was true for the apostle Paul and that it was one reason why he thought so buoyantly of the Roman Christians. In hard times it must have cheered him just to know of these Christians and to be aware that their faith was being spoken of "all over the world."

Faith: The Central Item

The last reason why the reputation of the Christians at Rome was worth having is that faith, and not some other attainment or virtue, is the essential item in life. Faith in Jesus Christ is what matters. Knowledge is good; Christianity considers knowledge quite important. Good works are necessary; without them we have no valid reason for believing that an individual is saved. The fruit of the Spirit—love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, and self-control (Gal. 5:22-23)—is what we want to see. But faith alone—faith in Christ as Lord and Savior—is essential. For "without faith it is impossible to please God" (Heb. 11:6a). Without faith no one can be justified.

I wonder if we have the spirit of the apostle at this point. Is this the way we actually evaluate other Christian works and testimony?

Here is what I think we do. I think we evaluate other works first on the basis of size. When we hear of a church that has ten thousand members, we are ten times more impressed than if we learn of a church that has only a thousand members. What of a church with a congregation of ten? Let me be clear. I am not against large churches. I am glad for them. I have often said that large churches can do things smaller churches cannot do—launch specialized Christian ministries, for example, or have prospering subgroups that focus on the specific concerns of only some members. Moreover, large churches are often the result of a strong expository ministry, as are some of the largest churches in Southern California, or of strong faith and piety on the part of their members, like the exceedingly large Korean churches. But we must not think, just because the blessing of numbers is good, that a small church is therefore not as favored by God or is not bearing as faithful or strong a testimony. What about the house churches in China, for example? Or the struggling church in North Africa? We may thank God for numerical growth, but what we should be especially thankful for is strong faith.

Is that what we modern Christians are known for? Strong faith? Is our faith, like the faith of the Roman church of Paul's day, spoken of throughout the world?

Another thing we do is evaluate Christian work on the basis of programs. The more the better!
Or, the more original the better, particularly if the people involved can write a book about it! Again, I am not against programs. Right programs are for the sake of people and rightly minister to them. But is this the proper way to evaluate churches? Do programs prove God's blessing? You know the answer to that. I do not think the fledgling, first-century church at Rome had many programs, certainly not the kind of things we mean by programs. But it was a famous church— and rightly so. For it was known for what was essential, which is faith.

Is that what we are known for? Do people say of us, "How strong is their faith in God and in Jesus Christ"?

I think we are also impressed—perhaps we are most to be pitied here—by big budgets and big buildings. Again, I am not against either budgets or buildings. Without adequate financing many worthwhile Christian works cannot be done, and without adequate meeting spaces much important activity is hindered. Even in countries like Romania, a chief concern of the thriving Christian congregations has been the repeated attempts of the Communist government to destroy the church structures. Still, a proper concern for budgets and buildings is quite different from evaluating a work on the basis of how large the budget is or how spacious and modern the church structure has become. The Roman church of Paul's day probably just met in people's houses. Yet it was a church whose faith was known throughout the world.

Are we known for that? Or is the best thing that other Christians can say about us is that we have a seven-figure budget or impressive church structures?

Faith really is the essential thing, not numbers or programs, not budgets or buildings. It is by faith that we "demolish arguments and every pretension that sets itself up against the knowledge of God, and we take captive every thought to make it obedient to Christ" (2 Cor. 10:5). The apostle John said, "This is the victory that has overcome the world, even our faith" (1 John 5:4).

I will tell you the kind of reputation I pray we might have at Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia. I pray that Tenth Presbyterian might be known as a church where people believe what God has told us in the Bible and then actually try to live by what they find there. I want Tenth to be a church known for strong faith in Jesus Christ, where people speak often, lovingly, and fearlessly of him. I want our church to be known for faith where God has placed us, not in some theoretical time or setting, but in the city of Philadelphia, demonstrating that Jesus is the answer to the city's problems and the problems of those who live here. I want Tenth to be rock hard in faith, in adversity as well as in prosperity, when praised as well as when persecuted.

Is that too much to ask? I think not. I think that is a reasonable goal and a reputation worth having.

Chapter 8.
Prayed for Constantly

Romans 1:9-12

About the time I was beginning to prepare for these studies in Romans, I was asked to speak at an anniversary service in a nearby church, and I was given the title: "Passing On the Reformation from Generation to Generation." It was a topic I had never addressed before, and I was not sure how to tackle it. As I thought about the matter, God led me to two sentences, one from the end of the second chapter of the Gospel of Luke and the other from the second chapter of Acts. The first is about Jesus. It says, "And Jesus grew in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and men" (Luke 2:52). The second is about the early Christian church.

It says, "They broke bread in their homes and ate together with glad and sincere hearts, praising God and enjoying the favor of all the people..." (Acts 2:46b-47).

What struck me about those two sentences is the word favor, for it is an insight into how Christianity must be passed on. Our word for it is "modeling." Jesus so modeled faith that those who looked to him saw he was genuine and therefore favored him and followed him. It was the same with the early church. The early Christians so modeled their profession that those who looked on were attracted to them. We are not surprised to read, immediately after the sentence in Acts 2, that "the Lord added to their number daily those who were being saved" (v. 47b).

That is the way God trains ministers. They see ministry modeled by some other minister before them, and they copy that example.

That is the way God makes evangelists. They learn from others who are already in the work.

That is the way God develops churches. One church models an effective ministry, and other churches learn from it and do the same things themselves.

I begin this way because our subject here is prayer, and the most significant thing to note about it is that our text is a prayer model. Yet this is not a treatise on prayer. It is not a "how-to" for an effective prayer ministry. Rather, it is a glimpse into the apostle Paul's own prayer life—into his pattern of prayer for Christians in the growing church at Rome—and is therefore a model for us as we think about our own prayer patterns, or lack of them.

Work and Pray

There are a number of things I want you to see about this passage, and the first is this: A strong prayer life is not the least bit inconsistent with vigorous and fervent service for the Lord.

It should be unnecessary to say this, of course, but we often divorce the two in our thinking.

Some are called to pray, we reason. Some are called to work. When we think of what we call "prayer warriors," we often picture old ladies who are strong in faith but unable to "do" much, or we think of people who are hospitalized or bedridden and who can therefore "only" pray. I do not want to be misunderstood at this point, of course. So let me acknowledge that some people are given a special ministry of prayer, perhaps because of precisely these circumstances. Moreover, if you are bedridden or otherwise unable to be outwardly active in Christ's service, I encourage you to spend much prayer time for others. Many who are incapacitated pray for me. I think of a woman named Cherrio Gridley who was crippled through an industrial accident years ago. She listens to The Bible Study Hour and prays regularly for me and my family, the church, and our ministry. Prayer warriors are needed. But this does not mean that those who are active in Christian work (or any kind of work) do not also need to be strong in praying for God's direction and blessing.

Here is where the example of Paul is so helpful. We know of his life from the account of it in Acts, and we have additional insights from what Paul says about himself in his letters. We know that he was a pioneer missionary, taking the gospel of Jesus Christ to places it had not previously been known. In doing this he covered much of the Roman world.

His labors stretched from Syria to Rome.

He crossed deserts and traversed mountain passes.

He traveled by foot and by sea.

He was frequently beaten, once stoned, often imprisoned.

He was shipwrecked.

Everywhere Paul established churches, and after he had established them he constantly kept in touch with the believers, helping them work through their problems. In one place he speaks of the "daily pressure" of his concern for them.

No harried pastor has ever been more pressed for time than Paul.

No busy executive ever carried a greater burden of responsibility.

Yet Paul was a model of a strong and consistent prayer ministry. In our text he says that he remembered the church at Rome—only one of the many churches of a growing Christian movement, and one he had not even visited—"constantly" and "at all times." Do you think Paul was exaggerating? I do not think he was exaggerating at all. I think he really did pray all the time, just as Martin Luther, John Calvin, Jonathan Edwards, and other effective Christian workers did. Luther once said that he had so much to do in a day that he could not get through it without spending at least three or four hours on his knees before God each morning.

Prayer is not inconsistent with fervent service. On the contrary, as Robert Haldane said, "Prayer and labor ought to go together. To pray without laboring is to mock God; to labor without prayer is to rob God of his glory. Until these are conjoined, the gospel will not be extensively successful."

Prayer and God-Directed Service

So we see from Paul's example, as well as from the lives of others, that prayer is not the least bit inconsistent with vigorous Christian activity. On the contrary, and this is the second point:

Prayer directs Christian service properly.

Again the apostle Paul is our model. We can think of examples of people who are engaged in Christian work but who do not seem to be going about it in the right way. Either they use the world's methods, which produce only the world's results. Or else their goals seem to be secular rather than truly Christian. As we read what Paul says about his prayer life in this chapter, we see that this was not the case with him. He prayed about his work, and as a result God directed it to be done in a spiritual way and for spiritual ends. He says several things about it.

1. Paul's service was sincere, or wholehearted. The older versions of verse 9 say, "whom I serve with my spirit," a literal rendering of the Greek. But the New International Version is surely correct when it paraphrases the text to read, "whom I serve with my whole heart." The point is not that Paul served God by means of or by using his spirit, though one of our modern versions paraphrases the text in this way: "to whom I offer the humble service of my spirit" (NEB). It is rather that Paul served God from the depth of his being—wholeheartedly. What a valid point that is! Not all who profess to serve Christ serve him wholeheartedly. Many are lazy in their service. Many are trying to please other people rather than the Lord. Paul knew of people like this himself. He called them "detestable, disobedient and unfit for doing anything good" (Titus 1:16b). But he was not like them.

What kept Paul from falling into these traps? Clearly it was his relationship to God, sustained by consistent and fervent prayer. As he sought God in prayer, God enabled him to serve the Lord Jesus Christ wholeheartedly.

2. Paul's service was gospel-centered. This is the second thing Paul says about his service. It was carried out by his "preaching the gospel of his [God's] Son" (v. 9). We know about the gospel, of course. We know that it is our task to make the gospel known. But it is surprising how many other things squeeze in as a substitute for this one essential thing, and as a result our service is not gospel-centered. We do not mean to let this happen. Other agendas are usually seen as ways to get the gospel out or to make it known, at least at first. But they take on a character and schedule of their own, and they become ends in themselves. What can keep us from this deviation? The answer is prayer. Prayer focuses our attention on God and his gospel, which was clearly Paul's case, as is evident in the opening verses of this letter.

It is this more than anything else that I have found prayer to do for me personally. It has redirected my focus so that I have begun to see things in God's perspective. When that has happened, some of the things in my life that have been most distressing have faded in importance.

3. Paul's service was for others. This is the point most evident in Paul's prayer for the Roman Christians, for he is saying that he had been praying to be with them in order that he might be a blessing in their lives. There is a sequence of three important ideas here, and it begins with prayer. First, Paul prayed that he might be permitted to see the Roman Christians. Second, he prayed that he might see them in order to impart a spiritual blessing to them. Third, he prayed that he might see them and impart a spiritual blessing to them so that they might be strengthened in their Christianity. How did Paul propose to do that? The answer is clear. It was by preaching the gospel to them with his whole heart, just as he had preached it to other people.

We need to see the importance of prayer here also, and the best way to see it is to realize that Christians frequently lose the desire to serve others. They lose it in different ways. Criticism will lessen our zeal for service. It is much harder to serve those who criticize us than to serve those who praise and think well of us. Fatigue will lessen it. We grow too tired to serve and thus inevitably think more of ourselves than other persons. Sin also destroys our desire to serve others. This is because sin breaks contact with God, who is the source of right motivation and desire, and because it focuses attention on ourselves. Sin is really self-centeredness rather than other-centeredness. These and other factors turn us from what we are to be as Christ's representatives.

What will keep us on target? The one thing that will keep us from falling to these temptations is prayer. Prayer will overcome an undue oppression from criticism. Prayer will redirect our energies, so we will not be so tired. Prayer will strengthen us for doing what needs to be done in spite of our tiredness. Prayer will keep us from temptation.

Have we trials and temptations?
Is there trouble anywhere?
We should never be discouraged:
Take it to the Lord in prayer!
Can we find a friend so faithful, Who will all our sorrows share?
Jesus knows our every weakness: Take it to the Lord in prayer!
Are we weak and heavy laden,
Cumbered with a load of care?
Precious Savior, still our refuge:
Take it to the Lord in prayer!
Do thy friends despise, forsake thee? Take it to the Lord in prayer!
In his arms he'll take and shield thee. Thou wilt find a solace there.

Joseph Scriven, 1855

Powerful and Effective Prayer

The third point of this passage is that prayer makes the service of the praying one effective.

A perceptive student may observe at this point that Paul had been praying to visit Rome, and yet, however noble that request may have been, obviously he had not received a favorable answer. Paul was far from Rome. He had not been able to visit the believers in Rome even though he "longed" to see them (v. 11) and had "planned many times to come" (v. 13). At this point he was not even on his way to Rome. Well and good! Our prayers are often the same. But if this is the case, how can we honestly talk about prayer being powerful or about prayer making the service of the praying one effective? There are a number of things to notice.

First, to come to Rome to serve the believers there personally was not the only thing Paul had been praying about. Indeed, what he says is that (1) he remembered them in his prayers at all times; and (2) he prayed that now at last the way might be opened for him to come to them. When he remembered them in his prayers at all times, what do you suppose Paul prayed for as regarding the Roman church? Certainly it was not only that he might have a safe journey to them. Most of his prayers probably had little to do with that. Rather, Paul would have prayed for their maturity in faith, for their safety against Satan's wiles and onslaughts, for their ability to bear an effective witness in the great capital of the empire, with its many perversions and vices. Were these prayers answered? We know they were, because Paul tells us that the faith of the Roman church was being reported all over the world.

If you are praying for someone, do not think your prayers are ineffective just because God is not using you to fulfill the request. God has infinite means at his disposal. He may be answering your prayers by others' service.

Second, when Paul prayed that the way might be opened for him to come to Rome, he prayed, as he tells us, that the door might be opened "by God's will" (v. 10). That is, Paul was praying first that the will of God might be done and only secondly that he might come to Rome. He wanted to come to Rome only if that was in God's plan for his life. Do we need proof of this? The proof is in the way Paul graciously submitted to what hindered his plans. We must remember that Paul was a very forceful man and that when he made plans he undoubtedly did everything in his power to stick to them. Moreover, the proposed trip to Rome was no passing fancy on Paul's part. Already we catch a glimpse of how seriously he took it. But in case we miss the point, we find him bringing it up again in chapter 15, saying in several places that his heart had been set on traveling to Rome and then, after being helped on his way by the Roman church, passing on to Spain to preach the Word of God there. Undoubtedly Paul wanted to preach the gospel from one end of the Roman world to the other, from Jerusalem to Tarshish. Nevertheless, when he was hindered in his plans, we do not catch any trace of agitation or frustration on his part. On the contrary, he graciously submitted to God's will for his life and recognized that there was value even in delays. If nothing else, delays gave him additional time to preach the gospel to those in Greece and Asia.

Third—we can hardly miss this—Paul did get to Rome eventually. It was not when he would have chosen, and it certainly was not in the manner he would have chosen. But he did get there, and God did use him to reach many in the capital. In Philippians he tells us that while he was in prison the gospel spread throughout the Praetorian guard. And we know from other sources that eventually the message of the cross reached even the highest levels of the government. Were Paul's prayers answered? Of course, they were. "The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much" (James 5:16b, KJV).

Does Prayer Change Things—Or People?

There is one last thing I want you to see in this section. Not only is prayer not inconsistent with a life of active service for Jesus Christ, and not only (on the contrary) does it direct that service and make it effective—Prayer also changes the one praying so that he or she increasingly becomes the kind of person through whom God can accomplish his purpose.

This was true of Paul. By temperament he was not a particularly gracious individual—at least, that is how it seems to me. In his early days he was cruel. He killed those who disagreed with him. Even after he became a Christian I am sure he had his bad moments. He quarreled with Barnabas over John Mark, for instance. Yet how gracious he is in this letter! Paul writes of his desire to visit Rome "so that I may impart to you some spiritual gift to make you strong" (v. 11). But no sooner has he said this than Paul, not desiring to set himself up above the believers at Rome as if he were somehow superior to them, immediately adds as an important qualification, "that is, that you and I may be mutually encouraged by each other's faith" (v. 12). That is an insight into the life of a man who had been changed by prayer and who was being used by God greatly.

Sometimes people ask, "Does prayer change things, or does prayer change people?" It is a good question, and the answer probably is "both." Prayer does change things, since God responds to prayer and frequently alters circumstances because of it. James points to this result when he says, "You do not have, because you do not ask God" (James 4:2b).

On the other hand, I am convinced that far more frequently God uses prayer to change us. Because by it he brings us into his presence, opens our eyes to spiritual realities, and makes his perspectives ours.

In Ray C. Stedman's book Talking to My Father, the well-known pastor of the Peninsula Bible Church of Palo Alto, California, tells the story of a missionary couple who were returning to the United States by ship after a lifetime of service in Africa. It was during the presidency of Teddy Roosevelt, and Roosevelt, as it happened, was sailing on the same ship. He had been game hunting in Africa, and when he came aboard there was a tremendous fanfare. Bands played.
Dignitaries appeared. Crowds of people stationed themselves to see and greet the president. When the ship arrived in America it was more of the same thing. Roosevelt was applauded, and many of the important people of the government came out to welcome him.

Nobody paid any attention to the missionary couple, and it greatly depressed the old man. The two were broken in health. They had no pension; no one had much in those days. They had nowhere to go. They were afraid. "It's not fair," he said to his wife. "We have served God all these years, and when we come home there is not even a single person here to welcome us. We have no money. We have nowhere to go. If God is running the world, why does he permit such injustice?"

His wife said, "You had better go into the bedroom and talk to God about it."

The missionary did, and when he came out a while later a great change had come over him. His wife said, "You feel better now, don't you, dear?"

"Yes," he said. "I began to pray and tell God how unjust the whole thing was. I told him how bitter I was that the president should receive a grand welcome and that we should receive nothing. There was not even a single person to welcome us home. But when I finished, it seemed as if the Lord just placed his hand on my shoulder and said in a quiet voice, 'But you're not home yet.' "

That is quite true, of course. That is the true perspective on what we are doing. But we will see it and live it only as we commune with God in prayer and learn to trust him and look forward to our homecoming.

Chapter 9.
Unanswered Prayer

Romans 1:13

There are very few churchgoers who have not heard the story of the little boy who was praying for a bicycle for Christmas. His was a poor family, so when Christmas morning came there was no bicycle. A friend of the family, who was not too sensitive about such things, said to the lad, "Well, I see God didn't answer your prayer for a bicycle."

The boy replied, "Yes, he did; he said No."

Most of us are aware that No is an answer every bit as much as Yes. But I have always felt that the story of the little boy's prayer does not quite get to the heart of the prayer problem. To receive a bicycle might be nice, but it is clearly not essential. Nor is it spiritual. Most of us understand that when we pray for things like bicycles—a better job, more money, success in a business deal, or the resolution of certain personal problems—there is no real reason why we should expect a Yes answer. God may give what we ask for, but again he may not. We accept that. But what about prayers that really are spiritual? What about prayers that are (or at least seem to be) unselfish? What happens when these prayers are not answered? This is where the real problem with prayer lies and why the people who have trouble with it are not the novices in prayer, as we might suspect—novices do not expect much from prayer anyway—but rather the church's mature believers. It is the saints who feel the burden of unanswered prayer. It is the godly who wrestle with it strenuously.

So what happens? Unfortunately, some persons become somewhat fatalistic about prayer. J. Oswald Sanders pointed to this problem when he wrote, "It is easy to become a fatalist in reference to prayer. It is easier to regard unanswered prayer as the will of God than to... reason out the causes of the defeat."

Prayer of an Apostle

In the case of Paul's prayer, recounted in Romans 1, we have a superb example of precisely this problem. Why is it such a good example?

First, it is a prayer by an apostle. The fact that Paul was an apostle does not mean that he was without sin, of course. Nor does it mean that all Paul's prayers were spiritual. Paul did not pray by inspiration, the way he wrote his epistles. In fact, I believe that there is an example of his praying out of the will of God in his prayers to visit Jerusalem with the gifts of the Gentile churches, which Luke tells us about in Acts. God warned Paul not to go to Jerusalem, and even after he went the Lord appeared to him to say, "Leave Jerusalem immediately..." (Acts 22:18). Yet Paul did not leave and was eventually imprisoned.

Paul was not without sin as an apostle. Yet he was an apostle, and that says something. It is significant that such a one did not have his prayers answered positively, or at least at once.

Second, Paul's prayer was a proper prayer. I wrote in the previous study that Romans 1:8-12 is not a treatise on prayer in the sense of providing a theological explanation of prayer. It is a prayer model, an example. Still, it is a proper prayer. It is to the Father on the basis of the atoning work of Jesus Christ and, although Paul does not say so explicitly, it was undoubtedly also in the Holy Spirit. Paul puts all three persons of the Godhead together in reference to prayer in one sentence in Ephesians 2:18: "For through him [that is, Jesus Christ] we both [that is, Jews and Gentiles] have access to the Father by one Spirit."

There is one more important thing to see about this prayer, the third item: It was a prayer for right things. Paul might have prayed for something that would only have enhanced his prestige or personal comfort; that is, he might have prayed selfishly. But that was not the case here at all. Paul was praying to come to Rome in order that (1) he might "impart some spiritual gift" to the end that (2) the believers in Rome might be made "strong" (v. 11). In other words, he wanted to assist in the spiritual growth and fruitfulness of the Roman believers.

This was an entirely worthy and quite spiritual motive. Yet, as I have said, Paul was prevented from coming. His prayer was not answered positively.

Paul does not give an explanation of why his proposed visit to Rome was hindered, at least not here. He only says, "I do not want you to be unaware, brothers, that I planned many times to come to you (but have been prevented from doing so until now) in order that I might have a harvest among you, just as I have had among the other Gentiles." I do not doubt that Paul could have suggested a reason why his prayers were unanswered, perhaps a number of reasons. But he does not, and the fact that he does not opens the door for us to reflect on why prayers like his — including the best of our own prayers—go unanswered.

Not As Necessary As We Think

I want to suggest a number of reasons why perfectly proper prayers may go unanswered and what we may learn from this. The first is: Unanswered prayer may be God's way of teaching that we are not as necessary to the work we are praying for as we think we are. That is so important it is worth saying again. Unanswered prayer may be God's way of teaching that we are not as necessary to the work we are praying for as we think we are.

This is clear in Paul's case, is it not? Paul had been praying that he might be permitted to travel to Rome to serve and strengthen the Roman Christians. But noble as this desire may have been, it is also clear that the believers in Rome were doing quite well without him. Indeed, they were doing well without any apostle or noteworthy teacher. Paul testifies to this when he records that their strong faith was being reported on all over the world (v. 8). I do not want to be misunderstood at this point, of course. I have no doubt that if Paul had been allowed to go to Rome, he would have been a blessing to the Christians. Moreover, they apparently did need his teaching, since God directed him to write them the letter we are studying. We, too, need pastors, teachers, and other church leaders. The point is not that Paul could not have been then or eventually a blessing to these Christians, but only that he was not essential to it. God was perfectly able to bless and prosper this church without Paul's personal ministrations.

I do not say that this is something Paul himself necessarily learned by God's refusal to send him to Rome, though it may have been. But it is certainly something we frequently need to learn. I say this because, as I suspect, most of our good prayers—not our selfish or ignorant or carnal prayers, but our good prayers—have ourselves at the center and assume that, if God is to answer them, he must do so through us as his agents.

One thing unanswered prayer may do for us is teach us to pray for blessing on God's work through other people. Years ago, at a management training session for the Servicemaster company, I was taught that good management is "getting the right things done through other people." That is not a bad definition for some prayers. It is at least something we need to practice more frequently.

The great pioneer missionary to China, Hudson Taylor, learned this function of prayer early in his ministry. He had taken literally the verse "owe no man any thing" (Rom. 13:8 KJV) and believed that Christians should never incur debt, even in Christian work. So, when a financial need occurred, he prayed for God to meet it, a lesson he had learned from George Mueller, the founder of the faith orphanages in England. Not long after Taylor had been in China he was moved to pray for two missionaries for each of China's eleven provinces plus Mongolia, twentyfour in all. He had no means of supporting them, so he had to pray for sufficient funds as well. There was not even a society to send them out. But Taylor prayed for this, and God answered— first with the original twenty-four missionaries, then with the thousands who later went to China under the auspices of the China Inland Mission. The growth of the China Inland Mission in those days is a great story.

Was Taylor necessary for this work? Yes, in a way. His prayers were necessary. But he was not the means of conveying the blessing of God to these many provinces of China personally.

Other Things to Do

The second reason why perfectly proper prayers of ours may be unanswered is that God may have other work for us to do. This seems to have been the chief (perhaps the only) reason why God did not send the great apostle to Rome earlier. In the fifteenth chapter of Romans, Paul speaks of his ministry among the remote cities of the Gentiles as a fulfillment of Isaiah 52:15— "Those who were not told about him [that is, Jesus] will see, and those who have not heard will understand." Then he adds, somewhat unexpectedly, "This is why I have often been hindered from coming to you" (v. 22). It was his ministry among the people of Asia and Greece that had kept him from the Roman Christians, and that is why he did not chafe under the hindrances God sent. He recognized that delay in reaching Rome was for the sake of the Christian mission elsewhere. We need to learn this, too, and be content through learning it. Let me give some examples.

Here is a man who is in an unrewarding job and who would very much prefer another line of work. He tells the Lord that he is not being fulfilled in his present employment, that he is not using the gifts he believes God has given him, that he is not getting ahead, that he is accomplishing little. Each of those points may be true. The work may be unusually frustrating. But God does not give him a new job. Why? We cannot say why for certain, but it may be that God still has work for this man in the job he has, even though he cannot see it or believe it is happening. There may be another worker to help. There may be a moral issue to be faced. There may be a person who needs to hear the gospel and be led to Jesus Christ.

Here is a woman who is not married but who wants to be. She tells God that she would be much happier married, that she is not really interested in pursuing a career (though many other women are), that she does not want to grow old alone. Those are perfectly valid desires. Still, God does not answer her prayers positively. Why? It may be that God simply has work for her to do as a single person. He may need her as a single Christian executive, nurse, teacher, businesswoman, secretary, or whatever.

If you are praying for something and God is not answering your request with a Yes, ask what you can accomplish in the meantime and give yourself to that. It does not mean that God may not give you what you are asking for eventually, but in the meantime you will be doing good work.

Spiritual Warfare

The third reason why our prayers may go unanswered for a time is the hardest to understand: There may be spiritual warfare of which you and I are unaware. There are examples of this in Scripture. Paul spoke of "a thorn in my flesh, a messenger of Satan, to torment me" (2 Cor. 12:7), saying that he prayed three times for it to be removed but that God had replied, "My grace is sufficient for you, for my power is made perfect in weakness" (v. 9). A second example is Daniel, who prayed for something but did not receive an answer to his prayer for three weeks. When at last he did receive an answer, the angel who brought it explained that when Daniel had begun to pray he had started out with God's answer but that he had been resisted by a spiritual being called "the prince of the Persian kingdom." He was able to come through eventually only because the archangel Michael helped him (Dan. 10:1-14).

Spiritual battles are mysteries to us, because we cannot see the warfare. But there are spiritual battles, and we need to know about them. They are an important reason why some of our prayers go unanswered.

Does Prayer Change People?

In the previous study I asked the question, "Does prayer change things or change people?" I answered, "Both." Prayer changes things (or circumstances) because it is a God-ordained way of changing them. I based my view on James 4:2, which says, "You do not have, because you do not ask God." If prayer does not change things, then many of the promises that concern it are at best misrepresentations. Jacques Ellul is quite right, though very bold, when he says, "It is prayer, and prayer alone, which can make history.... To pray is to carry oneself toward the future. It is both to expect it as possible, and to will it as history."

But prayer also (perhaps chiefly) changes people, as I pointed out.

I want to return to that point now, because, in addition to all I have said so far, one important reason for God not answering prayer is deficiency in us. And so, prayer needs to change us before it changes circumstances. What are our deficiencies? What needs changing in us?

1. Unconfessed sin. There are more verses in the Bible saying that God will not answer prayers than there are verses that say he will, and one of the chief categories of verses that deal with unanswered prayer concerns sin. Isaiah wrote, "Surely the arm of the LORD is not too short to save, nor his ear too dull to hear. But your iniquities have separated you from your God; your sins have hidden his face from you, so that he will not hear" (Isa. 59:1-2). If God is not answering your prayers—particularly if he is not answering any of them—one thing you should do is ask whether you are cherishing some sin. If so, you need to confess it for full forgiveness and cleansing.

2. Wrong motives. James spoke of this when he said, "When you ask, you do not receive, because you ask with wrong motives, that you may spend what you get on your pleasures" (James 4:3). Can a person pray for even spiritual things wrongly? Yes, of course. A woman may pray for the conversion of her husband, but with wrong motives—not for his good, that he may be saved from hell and enjoy fellowship with God in this life—but because it would be much more pleasant for her to have a Christian husband or because other Christians would think better of her.

A pastor may pray with wrong motives—for revival, for instance. How? By praying not chiefly so that people may be saved, but that his church might begin to grow and other pastors might look up to him as an effective teacher and evangelist. In The Power of Prayer and the Prayer of Power, R. A. Torrey tells of one minister who was praying for revival so he would not lose his church, and of another who was praying to be baptized with the Holy Spirit because he thought he would be paid more if he was.

If we are praying with wrong motives, we need to be changed by God through prayer so we might pray properly.

3. Laziness. It is said of Elijah that he prayed "earnestly" that it would not rain and that it did not rain for three and a half years (James 5:17). Prayer was a serious business with him. One reason our prayers are not answered is that we are not really serious about them.

4. We are too busy. Sometimes we are too busy to pray "earnestly." But, as someone has said, "If we are too busy to pray, we are too busy." Each of us has exactly the same amount of time in a day as every other person. If we say we are too busy to pray, what we are really saying is that we consider the things we are doing to be more important than praying. This is a theological misunderstanding.

5. Idols in the heart. Some of the elders of Israel once came to Ezekiel to pray with him. But the Lord said to Ezekiel, "These men have set up idols in their hearts and put wicked stumbling blocks before their faces. Should I let them inquire of me at all?" (Ezek. 14:3). Is an idol keeping you from having your prayers answered? Is that idol a person? A boyfriend? A girlfriend? A wife? A husband? Your children? Is it your job? Is it your lifestyle? Your social position? Your worldly reputation? Is it your image of yourself? Are you determined above all else to be "successful"? To place anything ahead of God is idolatry. It is a categorical prayer hindrance.

6. Stinginess in our giving. Proverbs 21:13 says, "If a man shuts his ears to the cry of the poor, he too will cry out and not be answered." In other words, if you do not give to the needy, God will not give to you when you ask him for something. Or again, Jesus says, "Give, and it will be given to you. A good measure, pressed down, shaken together and running over, will be poured into your lap. For with the measure you use, it will be measured to you" (Luke 6:38). This is quite clear. Torrey writes, "Here God distinctly tells us that he measures out his benefactions to us in exactly the same measure that we measure out our benefactions to others. And some of us use such [tiny] pint cup measures in our giving that God can only give us a pint cup blessing." The spiritual life of many Christians can be written in just this one word: stinginess. They began with generous hearts, recognizing that God had been generous to them in salvation. But then they became critical of what God was doing in their lives, or critical of other believers or of the way things were being done in their church—and their generosity dried up. They kept their money for themselves. And God stopped giving! Their abundance leveled off. They plateaued because they could not be trusted with more assets.

7. Unbelief. The greatest cause of failure in our prayer, and the area in which we most need to be changed, is unbelief. James told those of his day to "believe and not doubt, because he who doubts is like a wave of the sea, blown and tossed by the wind. That man should not think he will receive anything from the Lord..." (James 1:6-7). If we do not believe God's Word unquestioningly, why should we get what we pray for? Is it a surprise that our prayers are unanswered?

Pray and Do Not Give Up

I close with a hypothetical situation. Here you are, someone who has been praying earnestly for something for a long time and has not had an answer. As we have seen, there are numerous reasons why a positive answer may have been delayed, all the way from spiritual warfare in the heavenlies to our sin or unbelief. What are you to do? Should you keep on battering the brass doors of heaven with ineffectual petitions? Or should you accept God's rejection? Should you quit praying?

The answer is in Jesus' parable of the importunate widow, which, Luke tells us, teaches that we "should always pray and not give up" (Luke 18:1). Prayer may change us. It may change history. But whatever the case, we must keep praying.

Paul kept praying, and he got to Rome eventually.

George Mueller kept praying, too. When Mueller was a young man he had three friends who were not Christians. He began to pray for them. He prayed every day for more than sixty years. It seemed as if his prayers would never be answered. But they were. Two of those men were converted shortly before Mueller's death, one at what was probably the last service Mueller held. The other was converted within a year of Mueller's funeral. Unanswered prayer? How do we ever know it will remain unanswered? Since we do not, we ought always to pray and not give up.

Chapter 10.
The Whole Gospel for the Whole World

Romans 1:14-15

The title of this chapter has two parts: (1) the whole gospel, and (2) the whole world, but I am going to spend most of it on the second part. The reason is that "the whole world," rather than "the whole gospel," is the new idea at this point in the exposition. As far as the gospel goes, we have already learned a great deal about it in the opening verses of Paul's letter, and we will learn more as our study proceeds. Indeed, the letter of Paul to the Romans is the best treatment of "the whole gospel" in all Scripture. The point I want to emphasize in this study is that this full-orbed gospel is for everybody.

Our text expresses it from the perspective of Paul's personal experience: "I am obligated both to Greeks and non-Greeks, both to the wise and the foolish. That is why I am so eager to preach the gospel also to you who are at Rome."

Actually, the gospel has always been for everybody. Thom Hopler in his excellent book on cross-cultural evangelism, A World of Difference: Following Christ Beyond Your Cultural Walls, shows this from the Bible as a whole. As early as Genesis 3, we see that the gospel is for both male and female, the first announcement of the gospel being made both to Adam and to Eve (Gen. 3:15). In Daniel we find that it is for the dreaded Babylonians as well as for the persecuted Jews. In the ministry of Jesus Christ the gospel was taught to "publicans and sinners" as well as to those who had the privileges of education and high birth, like Nicodemus. It was disclosed to the Samaritan woman of John 4. Later, at the time of the expanding apostolic ministry, God reminded Peter that the gospel was for Roman military officers, like Cornelius, as well as for those who, like the Jews, were ceremonially "clean." On that occasion Peter made the point by declaring, "I now realize how true it is that God does not show favoritism but accepts men from every nation who fear him" (Acts 10:34-35). Jesus showed the geographical scope of the gospel's proclamation in Acts' version of the Great Commission: "You will receive power when the Holy Spirit comes on you; and you will be my witnesses in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth" (Acts 1:8).

How easily we forget this! Christians forget, or at least willfully ignore, that the gospel is for people other than themselves. Unbelievers argue, as an excuse, that the gospel is for other types of people.

To Wise People Everywhere

In Romans 1:14 the first persons to whom Paul says he is obligated as an ambassador of the gospel are Greeks, whom he contrasts with "non-Greeks" or, as some of our more literal versions say, "barbarians."

There is a second contrast in this sentence, "the wise" and the "foolish" (or "unwise"), which indicates how the first category is to be understood. If Paul had contrasted Greeks with Romans—which he could have done, since he was writing to Romans, we would have to understand the distinction between Greeks and non-Greeks in terms of nationality. If he had let the comparison end with "Greeks" and "non-Greeks," not mentioning "wise" and "unwise," the distinction would have been primarily an ethnic one. However, Paul adds the words wise and foolish, and by doing this he shows that what he is chiefly thinking of is culture or education. Because of their language, long-established Greeks had access to the great historical, epic, dramatic and, above all, philosophical writings of the past. Even the powerful Romans got the bulk of their education through this channel. Apart from the Greek language, others—people of all kinds—could never be considered learned or wise by Greek standards.

So Paul's first claim is that the gospel God sent him to proclaim is for the learned of this world. It is for the wise, whether they are Greeks or Romans or Americans or even the elite among university professors.

The gospel is for you if you are among the educated of our world. You need this ancient Christian gospel. Whatever your educational attainments, however wise you may be, you are still a sinful man or woman and are cut off from the God who made you and to whom you must one day give account for your many sins. You are mortal. One day you will die. You will enter eternity with or without the Lord Jesus Christ—just as surely as any other man or woman.

I know the evasions you might make, because I have been to the same schools and have taken the same courses. I have heard the arguments. You can say, "I was taught in my sociology courses that religions are all relative. They are to be understood by the cultural forces that give them birth. You are a Christian only because you have been born in the West and are the product of an historical stream descending from the Reformation. If you had been born elsewhere, you might as well have been a Buddhist or a Muslim." That is quite true, of course; at least the last part of it is true. But the issue is not where you or I have been privileged (or not privileged) to be born, but whether there is a God and whether or not he is as Christianity presents him. If there is a God, he obviously has some character. He is not everything and nothing all at the same time. Is he the Bible's God? Did God send his Son Jesus Christ to bring us salvation? You cannot escape those questions by mere sociological comparisons.

The Greeks tried to do that even in Paul's day. When he traveled to Athens, the intellectual capital of the world, and spoke of Jesus Christ there, the Greek intellectuals were politely amused by this religious novelty. They thought Paul a proclaimer of "foreign gods." None of this daunted Paul, however. He proclaimed the true God anyway. "Now what you worship as something unknown I am going to proclaim to you," he said (Acts 17:23). He finished his address by speaking of the final judgment and commanding his listeners to repent of their sins.

So also must you.

Perhaps you have another method by which you are trying to evade the gospel's implications. You consider the details of Christianity to be magical or absurd and therefore easy to reject, just as some of the Athenians did. "Who can believe in miracles today?" you protest. "No intelligent person can believe in divine-human beings, people walking on water, resurrections, and such things. We have to reject those old superstitions."

But intelligent people do believe these things. They do today, and they always have. What is more, they are convinced that it is those who reject the supernatural who are really the unintelligent.

Let me echo one other "educated" objection. There are people who have taken religion courses in college or graduate school and who now know enough to turn a rather superficial knowledge of biblical studies against the Bible itself. They can speak of "Pauline" verses and "Petrine" theology. They can speak of first and second Isaiah. They think, just because they have a slight acquaintance with such things, that they can sit in judgment on the Bible rather than having it the other way around. "After all, Paul was just a male chauvinist," they say. Or, "If Moses lived when the Bible says he lived, he couldn't even have known how to write—least of all have given us the Pentateuch."

These critical theories have been answered well by conservative, believing scholars, some quite conclusively. Besides, if you honestly want to learn about Christianity, why go to an unbelieving professor to learn about it? Is that not in itself an evasion? Would you not learn more about true piety from that believing pastor who once wanted to help you come to Christ? Or from your believing mother or grandmother who has been praying for you all these many years? Has your skepticism really made your life more comprehensible?

Let me make this first important point again: the gospel is for you—however well educated or intellectually endowed you may be. Your intellect and education are great gifts. But it is God who has given them to you. And if you do not thank him for these gifts and use them in ways that honor him, you are more deserving of judgment than those who are unintelligent. You need a Savior.

The apostle Paul had one of the best educations of his day, having been taught in the wisdom of the Greeks as well as in the religious traditions of Israel. He was a Roman citizen, too! But Paul learned that the gospel of the crucified Son of God alone was true wisdom. It was to people in an important Greek city that he wrote:

Where is the wise man? Where is the scholar? Where is the philosopher of this age? Has not God made foolish the wisdom of the world? For since in the wisdom of God the world through its wisdom did not know him, God was pleased through the foolishness of what was preached to save those who believe. Jews demand miraculous signs and Greeks look for wisdom, but we preach Christ crucified: a stumbling block to Jews and foolishness to Gentiles, but to those whom God has called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God. For the foolishness of God is wiser than man's wisdom, and the weakness of God is stronger than man's strength.

1 Corinthians 1:20-25

To "Ordinary" People Everywhere

The Greeks called "barbarians" all who were not Greek, the next category of people to whom Paul says he was obliged to preach the gospel.

"Barbarian" did not have quite the negative overtones to the Greeks as it has for us. The word actually had to do with speech patterns, for when the Greeks heard "foreigners" speak, what they said sounded like babbling, or stammering: bar, bar bar. (The Greek word barbaros also is linked to the Sanskrit barbera, which referred to inarticulate speech.) So barbarians were people who did not speak Greek. But although the word did not have quite the negative overtones it has for us—some of the "barbarians" were quite cultured people—it nevertheless had some. Greek was the language of the educated. Since the histories, epics, and plays were in Greek, to be a barbarian was to be cut off from this cultural storehouse.

Perhaps you are a person who feels yourself similarly disadvantaged. I suppose there are more people today who feel themselves to be cut off from the mainstream of society than there are people who feel a part of it.

You may feel cut off because of a lack of educational opportunities. So many people have been to college. You have not. You have not read the books they have read and talk about. You are not at ease with the buzz words of the intellectual establishment—terms like, well, "buzz word" itself or "interface" or "existential." You do not speak as educated people do. Perhaps you have regional patterns to your speech or make mistakes in grammar.

You may feel cut off because of your race. No matter that others of your race have made it; they are exceptions, you think. You have not, and those who belong to other races, or who belong to your race and have made it to the top, never seem to let you forget your place.

You may feel cut off because of your low income, which shows in the clothes you wear, the neighborhood you live in, the car you drive, and many other distinctions.

For those and other reasons you feel left out. So you look at what the world calls "Christian people" and say, "Those are not my people. I don't belong in their company. Christianity is their religion. It is not mine."

Here I must ask forgiveness for what has become a terrible sin of the twentieth-century church. Somehow many people feel cut off from the fellowship of believers. As the gospel has succeeded in reaching people and transforming them, bringing them to new levels of opportunity and achievement, it has often taken on these new cultural overtones—just as you have seen. Christians too often forget that Jesus Christ did not go first to the wise, wealthy, or influential citizens of his day, but to the everyday people, whoever and wherever they were. The important people did not like him for it! They called him a friend of drunkards and sinners. Nevertheless, that is where he went. His friends were carpenters, fishermen, tax collectors, and others who worked hard for a living. After his death and resurrection, when the gospel began to spread beyond the geographical borders of Israel, it was among the working people—often among slaves—that it advanced most readily.

I apologize on behalf of any Christian who has given the impression that Christianity is only for the educated, influential, or wealthy. At the same time I urge you not to miss believing on Jesus Christ because of that sadly wrong impression.

In Paul's day there were not many who had the advantages of what we would call a university education, but Paul wrote to the others to say that God had chosen them to expose the foolishness of merely human wisdom:

Brothers, think of what you were when you were called. Not many of you were wise by human standards; not many were influential; not many were of noble birth. But God chose the foolish things of the world to shame the wise; God chose the weak things of the world to shame the strong. He chose the lowly things of this world and the despised things —and the things that are not—to nullify the things that are, so that no one may boast before him.... Therefore, as it is written: "Let him who boasts boast in the Lord."

1 Corinthians 1:26-29, 31

To Religious People Everywhere

In our text, Romans 1:14-15, Paul limits his "categories" of those who need the gospel to Greeks and non-Greeks, the wise and the foolish. I do not know why he stopped at that point. But it is significant that in the very next verse Paul adds another important category, when he distinguishes between the Jew and the Gentile (v. 16). In the first instance he was probably thinking of the Romans, who were largely Gentiles. But when he gives the full statement of his thesis in verse 16, he adds this additional category to indicate that the gospel is indeed for the entire world.

Isn't it surprising that Paul feels a need to mention Jews specifically? The gospel is about a Jew, Jesus of Nazareth. It was taught, at least in the early days, exclusively from the Jewish Scriptures. The Old Testament is a Jewish book. The apostles and the early preachers of the gospel were all Jews. Why, then, should Jews specifically be mentioned?

The answer is that Jews as a whole, even more than Gentiles, resisted the gospel. Why? Because it did not fit their strong religious traditions. It is true that the gospel had been promised to Jews in the very Scriptures they defended. But they had imposed their own expectations on those Scriptures and handled them so as to build their own feelings of self-righteousness rather than as a way to recognize sin and their need for the Savior whom God had promised to send. As a result, when God sent Jesus they resented his "independent" spirit and fought him when his moral perfection exposed their own deep sin.

It is the same today, in the sense that the gospel of salvation by Jesus Christ is resisted most by those who are "religious." Of all persons, religious people often have the least sense of personal need. Above all others, they especially think themselves to have achieved God's standards and deserve commendation by him. They resent being taught that they, too, are sinners, that they, too, need a Savior, that they, too, must come to God through simple faith—just as others. Yet they desperately need Jesus.

Are you one of those people? Do you feel secure in your religion—apart from Jesus? If so, you need to learn that no religion, even Christianity, can save you. Only God can save you. He has made provision for that through the work of Jesus Christ, his own Son, who died for you. That is the gospel. That is what you need. It is needed by everybody.

To Everybody Everywhere

At the close of his statement of obligation to the Greeks and non-Greeks, the wise and unwise, Paul explains his views by declaring, "That is why I am so eager to preach the gospel also to you who are at Rome." When he mentions "you who are at Rome" Paul is not adding a new category, for the Romans fit within the earlier Greek or non-Greek, wise or foolish groupings. The church at Rome included every conceivable type of man or woman and was therefore itself allembracing. So I think that when Paul says that the gospel is for those at Rome "also" he is actually saying, "The gospel is for you, whoever you may be and wherever you may find yourself."

I present it to you in that way.

You may be a very young person with your whole life stretching before you. You have great plans, and you may have very little place for God in those plans. If so, I tell you that the gospel is for you and that you need it, just as others do. Charles Haddon Spurgeon once said in a talk to children, "You may be young; but you are old enough to sin, and you are old enough to die." As long as that is true, you need a Savior.

You may be an older person, perhaps very along in years. You are thinking that life is almost over for you and that decisions of this scope are for young people. You may be thinking that it is too late to make changes. But you especially need the gospel. Soon you will stand before God, your Maker, and you will have to give an account for your many long years of sinning. You have heard the gospel. Will you have to tell God that you rejected it, that you spurned the offer of grace through his crucified Son, the Lord Jesus? It is not too late. Today can be the day of your salvation. If you turn to him now, you will find that the last years of your life will be the most important and precious of all.

Perhaps you are from a non-Western, non-English-speaking country. You may be reading these words in part because you are a guest in the United States or because you want to learn about America. You may think that what you are reading is something uniquely American, that it is not for you, not for one from your country or from your background. I tell you that it is for you. It is the gospel of the one God and of the one Savior. It is a gospel that has already permeated the entire world. It has come to you now. It is time for you to trust Jesus.

Perhaps you are an American, and you think that you already are a Christian—just because you have been born in a so-called Christian country. Being an American will not save you. Having a Christian tradition or even Christian parents will not save you. Belonging to a church will not save you. You need the gospel. You need to believe in Jesus Christ as your Savior.

The gospel is for those who live in Philadelphia. It is for those in New York. It is for those in Paris or Bombay or Beijing or Mombassa or Bogota. Whoever you are, you need the gospel. The whole world needs the gospel, and the gospel it needs is the whole gospel of God's grace to sinners through the atoning death of Jesus Christ.

If you are not a Christian, you need to hear this and come to the Lord Jesus Christ as your Savior.

If you are a Christian, you need to make this great good news known to other people, as Paul did.

Part Two.

The Heart of Biblical Religion

Chapter 11.
The Theme of the Epistle

Romans 1:16-17

In the sixteenth and seventeenth verses of Romans 1, we come to sentences that are the most important in the letter and perhaps in all literature. They are the theme of this epistle and the essence of Christianity. They are the heart of biblical religion.

The reason this is so is that they tell how a man or woman may become right with God. We are not right with God in ourselves. This is what the doctrine of original sin is all about. We are in rebellion against God; and if we are in rebellion against God, we cannot be right with him. On the contrary, we are to be judged by him. What is more, we are polluted by our sin. We are as filthy in God's sight as the most disease infected, loathsome individual could be in ours, and in that state we must be banished from his presence forever when we die.

What is to be done? On our side, nothing can be done. Yet in these sentences Paul tells us that God has done something. In fact, he has done precisely what needs to be done. He has provided a righteousness that is exactly what we need. It is a divine righteousness, a perfect righteousness. And it is received, not by doing righteous things (which we can never do in sufficient quantity anyway), but by simple faith. It is received merely by believing what God tells us.

No One Righteous

In the next chapter, continuing our study of this very important section of the letter to the Roman church, I will show why Paul was not ashamed of this gospel. Here, however, I want to concentrate on the chief idea in these two verses, namely, that in the gospel a righteousness from God is revealed and that this righteousness is received (and has always been received) by faith. The place to begin is with the fact that in ourselves we do not possess this righteousness.

There can be little objection to the statement that we do not possess true righteousness, because this is the point with which Paul begins his formal argument. That is, immediately after having stated his thesis in verses 16 and 17, Paul launches into a section extending from 1:18 to 3:20, in which he shows that far from being righteous before God, men and women are actually very corrupt and are all therefore naturally objects of God's just wrath and condemnation.

I make the point in this way. Notice that in verse 17 (our text here), Paul says that "a righteousness from God is revealed." Then notice that in 3:21, he says virtually the same thing once again: "But now a righteousness from God, apart from law, has been made known to which the Law and the Prophets testify." The words "is made known" mean "is revealed," and the reference to "the Law and the Prophets" corresponds to Paul's citation of a specific statement of the prophet Habakkuk in the earlier verse: "just as it is written: 'the righteous will live by faith.'" So the full exposition of what Paul introduces in 1:17 begins only at 3:21.

So what occupies the intervening verses? They are a statement of the need for this righteousness, introduced by a parallel but deliberate contrast with these two statements. At the start of this section, instead of speaking of any revelation of righteousness, Paul declares: "The wrath of God is being revealed from heaven against all the godlessness and wickedness of men who suppress the truth by their wickedness" (v. 18, italics mine).

What Paul says in Romans 1:18 through 3:20 embraces all persons. But he develops his thoughts progressively, moving from a description of those who are openly hostile to God and wicked to those who consider themselves to be either moral, and therefore acceptable to God on the basis of their own good works, or else religious, and therefore acceptable on the basis of their religious practices.

One thing is true of everyone. Left to ourselves, we use either our heathen lifestyle, our claims to moral superiority, or our religion to resist the true God. Paul says that certain facts about God have been revealed to all people in nature. But instead of allowing that revelation to point us to God and then attempting to seek him out as a result of it, we actually suppress the revelation God has given in order to continue in our own wicked ways. This is the real grounds of God's just wrath against us—not that we have failed to do something that we could not do or refused to believe something that we did not even know about, but that we have rejected the knowledge we have in order to pursue wickedness. When he gets to the end of this section Paul is therefore quite right in concluding, quoting from many Old Testament texts:

As it is written:

> "There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God.
> All have turned away, they have together become worthless;
> there is no one who does good, not even one."
> "Their throats are open graves; their tongues practice deceit."
> "The poison of vipers is on their lips."
> "Their mouths are full of cursing and bitterness."
> "Their feet are swift to shed blood; ruin and misery mark their ways, > and the way of peace they do not know."
> "There is no fear of God before their eyes."
>
> Romans 3:10-18

We may not like this description of ourselves (who would?), but it is God's accurate assessment of our depraved lives and civilization.

A Righteousness from God

In all literature there is no portrait of the human race so realistic, grim, or hopeless as this summation of Paul's. Yet it makes the wonder of the gospel all the more glorious, for it is against this background that "a righteousness from God" is made known.

We need to see several important things about it.

1. This righteousness from God is the righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ. In 1:17 and 3:21, Paul says that righteousness "comes through faith in Jesus Christ." But it is surely right to add, in view of what Paul said in the opening section of this letter (and says elsewhere), that this is the very righteousness of Christ, which God gives to us. Righteousness is revealed in the gospel— Paul says so—but the gospel concerns Jesus Christ (1:2-3). So it is Christ who has this righteousness, and it is from him that we both learn about it and receive it.

Jesus possesses righteousness in two senses, both important. First, Jesus is intrinsically righteous.
That is, being God, he is utterly holy and without sin. That is why he could say during the days of his flesh, "I always do what pleases him [that is, God]" (John 8:29b) or, as he said to his enemies on another occasion, "Can any of you prove me guilty of sin?" (John 8:46a). His words left them speechless.

Jesus is also righteous in that he achieved a perfect righteousness by his obedience to the law of God while on earth. When John the Baptist resisted Jesus' call for baptism, saying, "I need to be baptized by you, and do you come to me?" Jesus replied, "Let it be so now; it is proper for us to do this to fulfill all righteousness" (Matt. 3:14-15). By saying that it was proper for him to be baptized in order "to fulfill all righteousness," Jesus showed that he intended to fulfill the demands of the law while he lived among us. And he did. D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones has written:

He rendered a perfect obedience to the law; he kept it in every jot and tittle. He failed in no respect. He fulfilled God's law completely, perfectly, and absolutely. Not only that! He has dealt with the penalty meted out by the law upon all sin and upon all sins. He took your guilt and mine upon himself, and he bore its punishment. The penalty of the law was meted out upon him, and so he has honored the law completely, positively and negatively, actively and passively. There is nothing further the law can demand; he has satisfied it all.

When Paul says that righteousness from God is revealed in the gospel, he means that the gospel shows how we can acquire the righteousness we need. But this does not exclude the truth that the existence and nature of this righteousness are also revealed to us in Christ's person. In Christ we can see that righteousness truly exists and can be offered to us by God.

2. God offers this righteousness of Jesus Christ freely, apart from any need to work for it on our part. This is the heart of the Good News, of course. For unless God were willing to give this righteousness to us and actually does give it, the mere existence of a perfect righteousness would not be good news at all. On the contrary, it would be very bad news, for it would increase our sense of condemnation.

It was the discovery of this truth that transformed Martin Luther and through him launched the Reformation. Luther was aware that Jesus exhibited a perfect righteousness and that this was a standard of character rightly demanded from all human beings by God. But Luther did not have this righteousness. In fact, the more he tried to achieve this righteousness, the more elusive it became. It was Luther's very piety that created the problem. He wanted to be righteous. He wanted to please God. But the more he worked at pleasing God, the more he knew that pleasing God involved more than merely doing certain things and refusing to do others. He knew that pleasing God involved even the very attitudes in which he did or did not do these things. Basically he needed to love God, and he knew he did not love God. He actually hated God for making the standard of righteousness so impossible.

As I pointed out in the introductory chapter of this book, Luther wrote, "I had no love for that holy and just God who punishes sinners. I was filled with secret anger against him."

But then Luther discovered that he had misunderstood God's intention in revealing the nature and existence of this righteousness. It was not revealed so that men and women like Luther might strive toward it and inevitably fail desperately, as Luther did. It was revealed as God's free gift in Christ, so that those who came to know Christ might stop their fruitless striving and instead rest in him. They could rest in his atoning death on their behalf, since he took the punishment of their sins upon himself and paid for them fully so that their sins might never rise up to haunt them again. They could rest in righteousness, knowing that God had given it to them and that they could thereafter stand before God, not in their own self-righteousness, which is no righteousness at all, but in the very righteousness of Christ.

The term for the application of the righteousness of Christ to the sinner is "imputation." It is like putting the infinite moral capital of the Lord Jesus Christ in our empty bank account. It is having the riches of heaven at our disposal. When Luther saw this, it was as if the doors of heaven had been opened and he was able to pass through "the true gate of Paradise."

3. Faith is the channel by which sinners receive Christ's righteousness. Paul lived many centuries before the Reformation, but he seems to have anticipated the sixteenth-century battles over the role of faith in salvation by the way he emphasizes faith both in this initial statement of his thesis and in his fuller development of the role of faith in receiving the gospel in 3:21-31. In Romans 1:17, he speaks of "a righteousness that is by faith from first to last, just as it is written: 'The righteous will live by faith,'" quoting Habakkuk 2:4 (italics mine). In 3:21-31 he refers to "faith" eight times.

What is faith? Initially Luther thought of faith as a work and therefore grimly regarded it as something else to be attained. But faith is not a work. It is believing God. It is opening a hand to receive the righteousness of Christ that God offers.

Faith consists of three elements. First, it consists of knowledge. It is no mere attitude of mind; it involves content. We must have faith in "something." In the case of salvation that content (and the object of our knowledge) is the revelation of what God has done for us in Jesus Christ.

Second, faith consists of a heart response to the gospel. This is because faith is not assent to some principle that is true but nevertheless has little relationship to us. It involves the love of God for us in saving us through the death of Jesus Christ, his Son. Unless this touches our hearts and moves them, we do not really understand the gospel.

Finally, faith consists of commitment, commitment to Christ. At this point, Jesus becomes not merely a Savior in some abstract sense or even someone else's Savior, but my Savior. Like Thomas, I now gladly confess him to be "My Lord and my God" (John 20:28, italics mine).

In an excellent little book entitled All of Grace, the great Baptist preacher Charles Haddon Spurgeon wrote, "Faith is not a blind thing; for faith begins with knowledge. It is not a speculative thing; for faith believes facts of which it is sure. It is not an unpractical, dreamy thing; for faith trusts, and stakes its destiny upon the truth of revelation.... Faith... is the eye which looks.... Faith is the hand which grasps... Faith is the mouth which feeds upon Christ."

One person who read Romans 10:8 (" 'The word is near you; it is in your mouth and in your heart' ") exclaimed, "Give me a knife and a fork and a chance." He had the idea. He was prepared to receive the gospel personally.

Another who had the idea was Count Zinzendorf. His great hymn about justification through the righteousness of Christ received by faith comes to us through the translation of John Wesley:

> Jesus, thy blood and righteousness
> My beauty are, my glorious dress; 'Midst flaming worlds, in these arrayed, With joy shall I lift up my head.
> Bold shall I stand in thy great day,

For who aught to my charge shall lay? Fully absolved through these I am,
From sin and fear, from guilt and shame.

O let the dead now hear thy voice;
Now bid thy banished ones rejoice;
Their beauty this, their glorious dress, Jesus, thy blood and righteousness.

It was by faith in the completed work of Christ and God's gift of Christ's righteousness to believing men and women that Zinzendorf expected to stand before God in the day of judgment and be accepted by him.

"Nothing in My Hands"

This was Paul's expectation and experience, too. He tells of his experience of God's grace in Philippians.

Paul had been an exceedingly moral man: ".... If anyone else thinks he has reasons to put confidence in the flesh, I have more: circumcised on the eighth day, of the people of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew of Hebrews; in regard to the law, a Pharisee; as for zeal, persecuting the church; as for legalistic righteousness, faultless" (Phil. 3:4-6). But Paul learned to count his attainments as nothing in order to have Christ "and be found in him, not having a righteousness of my own that comes from the law, but that which is through faith in Christ—the righteousness that comes from God and is by faith" (v. 9). This is a vivid, personal statement of what he also declares at the beginning of Romans.

In Philippians, Paul uses a helpful metaphor, saying that before he met Christ his thoughts about religion involved something like a lifelong balance sheet showing assets and liabilities. He had thought that being saved meant having more in the column of assets than in the column of liabilities. And since he had considerable assets, he felt that he was very well off indeed.

Some assets he had inherited. Among them were the facts that he had been born into a Jewish family and had been circumcised according to Jewish law on the eighth day of life. He was neither a proselyte who had been circumcised later in life, nor an Ishmaelite who was circumcised when he was thirteen years of age. He was a pure-blooded Jew, having been born of two Jewish parents ("a Hebrew of Hebrews"). As an Israelite he was a member of God's covenant people. He was of the tribe of Benjamin. Moreover, Paul had assets he had earned for himself. He was a Pharisee, the strictest and most faithful of the Jewish religious orders. He was a zealous Pharisee, proved by his persecution of the church. And, as far as the law was concerned, Paul reckoned himself to be blameless, for he had kept the law in all its particulars so far as he had understood it.

These were great assets from a human point of view. But the day came when God revealed his own righteousness to Paul in the person of Jesus Christ. When Paul saw Jesus he understood for the first time what real righteousness was. Moreover, he saw that what he had been calling righteousness, his own righteousness, was not righteousness at all but only filthy rags. It was no asset. It was actually a liability, because it had been keeping him from Jesus, where alone true righteousness could be found.

Mentally Paul moved his long list of cherished assets to the column of liabilities—for that is what they really were—and under assets he wrote "Jesus Christ alone." Augustus M. Toplady had it right in the hymn "Rock of Ages":

> Nothing in my hand I bring,
> Simply to thy cross I cling;
> Naked, come to thee for dress;
> Helpless, look to thee for grace;
> Foul, I to the fountain fly;
> Wash me, Saviour, or I die.
> Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
> Let me hide myself in thee.

When those who have been made alive by God turn from their own attempts at righteousness, which can only condemn them, and instead embrace the Lord Jesus Christ by saving faith, God declares their sins to have been punished in Christ and imputes his own perfect righteousness to their account.

Chapter 12.
Not Ashamed

Romans 1:16-17

At first glance it is an extraordinary thing that Paul should say that he is "not ashamed" of the gospel. For when we read that statement we ask, "But why should anybody be ashamed of the gospel? Why should the apostle even think that something so grand might be shameful?" Questions like that are not very deep or honest, since we have all been ashamed of the gospel at one time or another.

The reason is that the world is opposed to God's gospel and ridicules it, and we are all far more attuned to the world than we imagine. The gospel was despised in Paul's day. Robert Haldane has written accurately:

By the pagans it was branded as atheism, and by the Jews it was abhorred as subverting the law and tending to licentiousness, while both Jews and Gentiles united in denouncing the Christians as disturbers of the public peace, who, in their pride and presumption, separated themselves from the rest of mankind. Besides, a crucified Savior was to the one a stumbling-block, and to the other foolishness. This doctrine was everywhere spoken against, and the Christian fortitude of the apostle in acting on the avowal he here makes was as truly manifested in the calmness with which, for the name of the Lord Jesus, he confronted personal danger and even death itself. His courage was not more conspicuous when he was ready "not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem," than when he was enabled to enter Athens or Rome without being moved by the prospect of all that scorn and derision which in these great cities awaited him.

Is the situation different in our day? It is true that today's culture exhibits a certain veneer of religious tolerance, so that well-bred people are careful not to scorn Christians openly. But the world is still the world, and hostility to God is always present. If you have never been ashamed of the gospel, the probable reason, as D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones suggests, is not that you are "an exceptionally good Christian," but rather that "your understanding of the Christian message has never been clear."

Was Paul tempted to shame, as we are? Probably. We know that Timothy was, since Paul wrote him to tell him not to be (2 Tim. 1:8). However, in our text Paul writes that basically he was "not ashamed of the gospel," and the reason is that "it is the power of God for the salvation of everyone who believes: first for the Jew, then for the Gentile. For in the gospel a righteousness from God is revealed, a righteousness that is by faith from first to last, just as it is written: 'The righteous will live by faith.'"

In this study, following the treatment of D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones, I want to suggest eight reasons why we should not be ashamed of this gospel.

The Gospel Is "Good News"

The first reason why we should not be ashamed of the gospel is the meaning of the word gospel itself. It means "good news," and no rational person should be ashamed of a desirable proclamation.

We can understand why one might hesitate to convey bad news, of course. We can imagine a policeman who must tell a father that his son has been arrested for breaking into a neighbor's house and stealing her possessions. We can understand how he might be distressed at having to communicate this sad message. Or again, we can imagine how a doctor might be dismayed at having to tell a patient that tests have come out badly and that he or she does not have long to live, or how a person involved in some great moral lapse might be ashamed to confess it. But the gospel is not like this. It is the opposite. Instead of being bad news, it is good news about what God has done for us in Jesus Christ. It is the best news imaginable.

The Way of Salvation

The second reason why we should not be ashamed of the gospel is that it is about "salvation." And not just any salvation. It is about the saving of ourselves.

The background for this side of the Good News is that, left to ourselves, we are in desperate trouble. We are in trouble now because we are at odds with God, other people, and ourselves. We are also in trouble in regard to the future; for we are on a path of increasing frustration and despair, and at the end we must face God's just wrath and condemnation. We are like swimmers drowning in a vast ocean of cold water or explorers sinking in a deep bog of quicksand. We are like astronauts lost in the black hostile void of outer space. We are like prisoners awaiting execution.

But there is good news! God has intervened to rescue us through the work of his divine Son, Jesus Christ. First, he has reconciled us to himself; Christ has died for us, bearing our sins in his own body on the cross. Second, he has reconciled us to others; we are now set free to love them as Jesus loved us. Third, he has reconciled us to ourselves; in Jesus Christ (and by the power of the Holy Spirit) we are now able to become what God has always meant for us to be.

We can say this in yet other ways. Salvation delivers us from the guilt, power, and pollution of sin. We are brought back into communication with God, from whom our sins had separated us. And we are given a marvelous destiny, which Paul elsewhere describes as "the hope of the glory of God" (Rom. 5:2). In 1 Corinthians 1:30 Paul expresses these truths somewhat comprehensively when he writes that "Christ Jesus... has become for us wisdom from God—that is, our righteousness, holiness and redemption." Paul was not ashamed of the gospel, because it was about a real deliverance—from sin and its power—and about reconciliation to God.

God's Way of Salvation

The third reason why Paul was not ashamed of the gospel is that it is God's way of salvation and not man's way. How could Paul be proud of something that has its roots in the abilities of sinful men and women or is bounded by mere human ideas? The world does not lack such ideas. There are countless schemes for salvation, countless self-help programs. But these are all foolish and inadequate. What is needed is a way of salvation that comes not from man, but from God! That is what we have in Christianity! Christianity is God's reaching out to save perishing men and women, not sinners reaching out to seize God.

Paul speaks about this in two major ways, contrasting God's way of salvation with our own attempts to keep the law, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, with our attempts to know God by mere human wisdom.

As to the law, he says, "For what the law was powerless to do in that it was weakened by the sinful nature, God did by sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful man to be a sin offering. And so he condemned sin in sinful man, in order that the righteous requirements of the law might be fully met in us, who do not live according to the sinful nature but according to the Spirit" (Rom. 8:3-4). This means that, although we could not please God by keeping the law's demands, God enables us to please him, first, by condemning sin in us through the work of Jesus Christ and, then, by enabling us to live upright lives through the power of the Holy Spirit.

As to wisdom, Paul writes, "For since in the wisdom of God the world through its wisdom did not know him, God was pleased through the foolishness of what was preached to save those who believe" (1 Cor. 1:21).

The Power of God

This leads to the fourth reason why Paul was not ashamed of the gospel, the matter he chiefly emphasizes in our text: The gospel is powerful. That is, it is not only good news, not only a matter of salvation, not only a way of salvation from God; it is also powerful enough to accomplish God's purpose, which is to save us from sin's pollution.

It is important to understand what is involved here, for it is easy to misconstrue Paul's teaching. When Paul says that "the gospel... is the power of God for salvation," he is not saying that the gospel is about God's power, as if it were merely pointing us to a power beyond our own. Nor is Paul saying that the gospel is the source of a power we can get and use to save ourselves. Paul's statement is not that the gospel is about God's power or even a channel through which that power operates, but rather that the gospel is itself that power. That is, the gospel is powerful; it is the means by which God accomplishes salvation in those who are being saved.

Since Paul puts it this way, we are right to agree with John Calvin when he emphasizes that the gospel mentioned here is not merely the work done by God in Jesus Christ or the revelation to us of that work, but the actual "preaching" of the gospel "by word of mouth." He means that it is in the actual preaching of the gospel that the power of God is demonstrated in the saving of men and women.

In the previous section I quoted what the King James Version calls "the foolishness of preaching" (1 Cor. 1:21), and since that is Paul's own phrase, we can see it as proof that Paul was himself aware of how foolish the proclamation of the Christian message is if considered only from a human point of view. Some years ago I had the task of talking about "The Foolishness of Preaching" as one message of seven in a weekend conference on reformed theology. My address came after a break for lunch in the middle of what was a very long Saturday, and I began by saying that if there was anything more foolish than the foolishness of preaching, it was preaching about the foolishness of preaching after lunch on a day during which the listeners had already heard a number of other very distinguished preachers. It was a way of capturing what every preacher feels at one time or another as he rises to proclaim a message that to the natural mind is utter folly and that is as incapable of doing good in the hearers as preaching a message of moral reformation to the corpses in a cemetery—unless God works.

But that is just the point! God does work through the preaching of this gospel—not preaching for its own sake, but the faithful proclamation of God's work of salvation for sinful men and women in Jesus Christ.

Let me say this another way since it is so important. We read in the first chapter of Acts that when the Lord Jesus Christ dispatched his disciples to the world with his gospel, he told them: "... you will receive power when the Holy Spirit comes on you; and you will be my witnesses in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth" (v. 8). Earlier they had been asking about the kingdom of God, no doubt thinking of an earthly, political kingdom, which they highly valued and hoped for. But Jesus' reply pointed them to something far greater. His was a spiritual kingdom—not spiritual in the sense of being less than real, but a kingdom to be established in power by the very Spirit of God—and they were to be witnesses for him. Moreover, as they witnessed, the Holy Spirit, which was to come upon them, would bless their proclamation and lead many to faith.

And so it happened. Three thousand believed at Pentecost. Thousands more believed on other occasions.

So also today. The world does not understand this divine working, but it is nevertheless true that the most important thing happening in the world at any given time is the preaching of the gospel. For there the Spirit of God is at work. There men and women are delivered from the bondage of sin and set free spiritually. Lives are transformed—and it is all by God's power. As D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones says, "The thing to grasp is that the apostle is saying that he is not ashamed of the gospel, because it is of God's mighty working. It is God himself doing this thing—not simply telling us about it: doing it, and doing it in this way, through the gospel."

A Gospel for Everyone

The fifth reason why Paul was not ashamed of this gospel is that it is a gospel for everyone— "everyone who believes." It is "first for the Jew" and then also "for the Gentile."

Paul's phrase "first for the Jew, then for the Gentile" has led readers to think that he was saying something like "to the Jew above the Gentile" or "to the Jew simply because he is a Jew and therefore of greater importance than other people." But, of course, this is not what Paul intends. In this text Paul means exactly the same thing Jesus meant when he told the woman of Samaria that "salvation is from the Jews" (John 4:22). Both were speaking chronologically. Both meant that in the systematic disclosure of the gospel the Jews had occupied a first and important place. This was because, as Paul says later in Romans, theirs was "the adoption as sons; theirs the divine glory, the covenants, the receiving of the law, the temple worship and the promises. Theirs are the patriarchs, and from them is traced the human ancestry of Jesus Christ..." (Rom. 9:3-5). No one can fully understand the gospel if he or she neglects this historical preparation for it.

But this does not mean that Paul is setting the Jew above the Gentile in this text or, as some would desire by contrast, that he is setting the Gentile above the Jew. On the contrary, Paul's point is that the gospel is for Gentile and Jew alike. It is for everybody.

Why? Because it is the power of God, and God is no respecter of persons. If the gospel were of human power only, it would be limited by human interests and abilities. It would be for some and not others. It would be for the strong but not for the weak, or the weak but not for the strong. It would be for the intelligent but not the foolish, or the foolish but not the wise. It would be for the noble or the well-bred or the sensitive or the poor or the rich or whatever, to the exclusion of those who do not fit the categories. But this is not the way it is. The gospel is for everyone. John wrote, "For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life" (John 3:16, italics mine). At Pentecost Peter declared,

"Everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved" (Acts 2:21; cf. Joel 2:32). Indeed, the Bible ends on this note: "The Spirit and the bride say, 'Come!' And let him who hears say, 'Come!' Whoever is thirsty, let him come; and whoever wishes, let him take of the free gift of the water of life" (Rev. 22:17). (I have added italics to these passages to emphasize this important point.)

How can one be ashamed of a gospel which offers hope to the vilest, most desperate of men, as well as to the most respectable person? How can we be ashamed of anything so gloriously universal.

Salvation Revealed to Sinners

The sixth reason why Paul was not ashamed of the gospel is that God has revealed this way of salvation to us. The gospel would be wonderful even if God had not revealed it. But, of course, if he had not revealed it, we would not know of it and would be living with the same dreary outlook on life as the unsaved. But the gospel is revealed. Now we not only know about the Good News but are also enabled to proclaim God's revelation.

And there is this, too: When Paul says that the gospel of God "is revealed," he is saying that it is only by revelation that we can know it. It is not something we could ever have figured out for ourselves. How could we have invented such a thing? When human beings invent religion they either invent something that makes them self-righteous, imagining that they can save themselves by their own good works or wisdom—or they invent something that excuses their behavior so they can commit the evil they desire. In other words, they become either legalists or antinomians. The gospel produces neither. It does not produce legalists, because salvation is by the accomplishment of Christ, not the accomplishments of human beings.

Christians must always sing: "Nothing in my hand I bring, / Simply to thy cross I cling." But at the same time, simply because they have been saved by the Lord Jesus Christ and have his Spirit within them, Christians inevitably strive for and actually achieve a level of practical righteousness of which the world cannot even dream.

A Righteousness from God

The seventh reason why Paul was not ashamed of the gospel is the one we considered most fully in the previous chapter, namely, that it concerns a righteousness from God, which is what we need. In ourselves we are not the least bit righteous. On the contrary, we are corrupted by sin and are in rebellion against God. To be saved from wrath we need a righteousness that is of God's own nature, a righteousness that comes from God and fully satisfies God's demands. This is what we have! It is why Paul can begin his exposition of the Good News in chapter 3 by declaring, "But now a righteousness from God, apart from law, has been made known, to which the Law and the Prophets testify" (v. 21). (As previously mentioned, this verse is a repetition of the thesis presented first in Romans 1:17.)

By Faith from First to Last

The eighth and final reason why the apostle Paul was not ashamed of the gospel is that the means by which this glorious gift becomes ours is faith, which means that salvation is accessible to "everyone who believes."

What does Paul mean when he writes, ek pisteōs eis pistin (literally, "from faith to faith")? Does he mean, as the New International Version seems to imply, "by faith entirely" (that is, "by faith from first to last")? Does he mean "from the faith of the Old Testament to the faith of the New Testament" or, which may be almost the same thing, "from the faith of the Jew to the faith of the Gentile"? Does he mean "from weak faith to stronger faith," the view apparently of John Calvin? In my opinion, the quotation from Habakkuk throws light on how the words ek pisteōs are to be taken. They mean "by faith"; that is, they concern "a righteousness that is by faith." If this is so, if this is how the first "faith" should be taken, then, the meaning of the phrase is that the righteousness that is by faith (the first "faith") is revealed to the perceiving faith of the believer (the second "faith"). This means that the gospel is revealed to you and is for you—if you will have it.

Chapter 13.
Martin Luther's Text

Romans 1:17

In the year 1920 an English preacher by the name of Frank W. Boreham published a book of sermons on great Bible texts, in each case linking his text to the spiritual history of a great Christian man or woman. He called his book Texts That Made History. There was David Livingstone's text: Matthew 28:20 ("Surely I will be with you always, to the very end of the age"). There was John Wesley's text: Zechariah 3:2 ("Is not this man a burning stick snatched from the fire?"). There were twenty-three sermons in this book, and Boreham published four more similar books in his lifetime.

Of all the texts that are associated with the lives of great Christians, none is so clearly one man's text or so obviously a driving, molding force in that man's life as Roman 1:17. And, of course, the man whose text it was is Martin Luther.

I propose that we study Romans 1:17 from the standpoint of Luther's life. Already we have seen that Romans 1:16-17 are the theme verses of this important Bible book. We have studied them from two perspectives. The first study focused on the chief idea: that there is a righteousness from God, which God freely offers human beings and which alone is the basis of their justification before him. It is received by faith. The second study worked through these verses in detail, showing eight reasons why Paul could say (and all true believers today can continue to say) that they are not ashamed of God's gospel. In this study we want to see the outworking of that gospel in the life of just one man, Martin Luther.

In the Convent at Erfurt

Martin Luther began his academic life by studying law, which was his father's desire for him. But although he excelled in his studies and gave every promise of becoming successful in his profession, Luther was troubled in soul and greatly agitated at the thought that one day he would have to meet God and give an account before him. In his boyhood days he had looked at the frowning face of Jesus in the stained-glass window of the parish church at Mansfeld and had trembled. When friends died, as during his college days two of his closest friends did, Luther trembled more. One day he would die—he knew not when—and he knew that Jesus would judge him.

On August 17, 1505, Luther suddenly left the university and entered the monastery of the Augustinian hermits at Erfurt. He was twenty-one years old, and he entered the convent, as he later said, not to study theology but to save his soul.

In those days in the monastic orders there were ways by which the seeking soul was directed to find God, and Luther, with the determination and force that characterized his entire life, gave himself rigorously to the Augustinian plan. He fasted and prayed. He devoted himself to menial tasks. Above all he adhered to the sacrament of penance, confessing even the most trivial sins, for hours on end, until his superiors wearied of his exercise and ordered him to cease confession until he had committed some sin worth confessing. Luther's piety gained him a reputation of being the most exemplary of monks. Later he wrote to the Duke of Saxony:

I was indeed a pious monk and followed the rules of my order more strictly than I can express. If ever a monk could obtain heaven by his monkish works, I should certainly have been entitled to it. Of this all the friars who have known me can testify. If it had continued much longer, I should have carried my mortification even to death, by means of my watchings, prayers, reading and other labors.

Still, Luther found no peace through these exercises.

The monkish wisdom of the day instructed him to satisfy God's demand for righteousness by doing good works. "But what works?" thought Luther. "What works can come from a heart like mine? How can I stand before the holiness of my Judge with works polluted in their very source?"

In Luther's agony of soul, God sent him a wise spiritual father by the name of John Staupitz, the vicar-general of the congregation. Staupitz tried to uncover Luther's difficulties. "Why are you so sad, brother Martin?" Staupitz asked one day.

"I do not know what will become of me," replied Luther with a deep sigh.

"More than a thousand times have I sworn to our holy God to live piously, and I have never kept my vows," said Staupitz. "Now I swear no longer, for I know that I cannot keep my solemn promises. If God will not be merciful towards me for the love of Christ and grant me a happy departure when I must quit this world, I shall never with the aid of all my vows and all my good works stand before him. I must perish."

The thought of divine justice terrified Luther, and he opened up his fears to the vicar-general.

Staupitz knew where he himself had found peace and pointed it out to the young man: "Why do you torment yourself with all these speculations and these high thoughts?... Look at the wounds of Jesus Christ, to the blood that he has shed for you; it is there that the grace of God will appear to you. Instead of torturing yourself on account of your sins, throw yourself into the Redeemer's arms. Trust in him—in the righteousness of his life—in the atonement of his death. Do not shrink back. God is not angry with you; it is you who are angry with God. Listen to the Son of God."

But how could Luther do that? Where could he hear the Son of God speak to him as Staupitz said he would? "In the Bible," said the vicar-general. It was thus that Luther, who had only first seen a Bible in his college days shortly before entering the cloister, began to study Scripture.

He studied Romans, and as he pondered over the words of our text the truth began to dawn on him. The righteousness we need in order to stand before the holy God is not a righteousness we can attain. In fact, it is not human righteousness at all. It is divine righteousness, and it becomes ours as a result of God's free giving. Our part is merely to receive it by faith and to live by faith in God's promise. Guided by this new light, Luther began to compare Scripture with Scripture, and as he did he found that the passages of the Bible that formerly alarmed him now brought comfort.

In his sermon on Luther's text, Boreham describes a famous painting that represents Luther at this stage of his pilgrimage. The setting is early morning in the convent library at Erfurt, and the artist shows Luther as a young monk in his early twenties, poring over a copy of the Bible from which a bit of broken chain is hanging. The dawn is stealing through the lattice, illuminating both the open Bible and the face of its eager reader. On the page the young monk is so carefully studying are the words: "The just shall live by faith."

The Road to Rome

In 1510, five years after he had become a monk and two years after he had begun to teach the Bible at the new University of Wittenberg, Luther was sent by his order to Rome.

On the way, while being entertained at the Benedictine monastery at Bologna, Luther fell dangerously ill and relapsed into the gloomy dejection over spiritual matters that was so natural to him. "To die thus, far from Germany, in a foreign land—what a sad fate!" D'Aubigné wrote, "... the distress of mind that he had felt at Erfurt returned with renewed force. The sense of his sinfulness troubled him; the prospect of God's judgment filled him once more with dread. But at the very moment that these terrors had reached their highest pitch, the words of St. Paul, 'The just shall live by faith,' recurred forcibly to his memory and enlightened his soul like a ray from heaven." Luther was learning to live by faith, which was what the text was teaching. Comforted and eventually restored to health, he resumed his journey across the hot Italian plains to Rome.

"Thou Holy Rome, Thrice Holy"

Luther had been sent to Rome on church business. But, in spite of this, he approached the ancient imperial city as a pilgrim. When he first caught sight of Rome on his way south he raised his hands in ecstasy, exclaiming, "I greet thee, thou holy Rome, thrice holy from the blood of the martyrs." When he arrived, he began his rounds of the relics, shrines, and churches. He listened to the superstitious tales that were told him. At one chapel, when told of the benefits of saying Mass there, he thought that he could almost wish his parents were dead, because he could then have assured them against purgatory by his actions.

Yet Rome was not the center of light and piety Luther had imagined. At this time, the Mass—at which the body and blood of Jesus were thought to be offered up by the priests as a sacrifice for sins—was the center of Luther's devotion, and he often said Mass at Rome. Luther performed the ceremony with the solemnity and dignity it seemed to him to require. But not the Roman priests!

They laughed at the simplicity of the rustic German monk. Once, while he was repeating one

Mass, the priests at an adjoining altar rushed through seven of them, calling out in Latin to Luther, "Quick, quick, send our Lady back her Son." On another occasion, Luther had only reached the gospel portion of the Mass when the priest administering beside him terminated his. "Passa, passa," he cried to Luther. "Have done with it at once."

Luther was invited to meetings of distinguished ecclesiastics. There the priests often ridiculed and mocked Christian rites. Laughing and with apparent pride, they told how, when they were standing at the altar repeating the words that were to transform the bread and wine into the body and blood of the Lord, they said instead (no doubt with solemn intonation), "Panis es, et panis manebis; vinum es, et vinum manebis"

("Bread you are, and bread you will remain; wine you are, and wine you will remain"). Luther could hardly believe his ears. Later he wrote, "No one can imagine what sins and infamous actions are committed in Rome; they must be seen and heard to be believed. Thus, they are in the habit of saying, 'If there is a Hell, Rome is built over it; it is an abyss whence issues every kind of sin.'" He concluded, "The nearer we approach Rome, the greater number of bad Christians we meet with."

Then there occurred the famous incident told many years later by Luther's son, Dr. Paul Luther, and preserved in a manuscript in the library of Rudolfstadt. In the Church of St. John Lateran in Rome there is a set of medieval stone stairs said to have originally been the stairs leading up to Pilate's house in Jerusalem, once trod upon by the Lord. For this reason they were called the Scala Sancta or "Holy Stairs." It was the custom for pilgrims, like Luther, to ascend these steps on their knees, praying as they went. At certain intervals there were stains said to have been caused by the bleeding wounds of Christ. The worshiper would bend over and kiss these steps, praying a long time before ascending painfully to the next ones. Remission of years of punishment in purgatory was promised to all who would perform this pious exercise.

Luther began as the others had. But, as he ascended the staircase, the words of our text came forcefully to his mind: "The just shall live by faith."

They seemed to echo over and over again, growing louder with each repetition: "The just shall live by faith," "The just shall live by faith." But Luther was not living by faith. He was living by fear. The old superstitious doctrines and the new biblical theology wrestled within him.

"By fear," said Luther.

"By faith!" said St. Paul.

"By fear," said the scholastic fathers of medieval Catholicism.

"By faith!" said the Scriptures.

"By fear," said those who agonized beside him on the staircase.

"By faith!" said God the Father.

At last Luther rose in amazement from the steps up which he had been dragging himself and shuddered at his superstition and folly. Now he realized that God had saved him by the righteousness of Christ, received by faith; he was to exercise that faith, receive that righteousness, and live by trusting God. He had not been doing it. Slowly he turned on Pilate's staircase and returned to the bottom. He went back to Wittenberg, and in time, as Paul Luther said, "He took 'The just shall live by faith' as the foundation of all his doctrine."

This was the real beginning of the Reformation, for the reformation of Luther necessarily preceded the reformation of Christendom. The later began on October 31, 1517, with the posting of his "Ninety-Five Theses" on the door of the Castle Church at Wittenberg.

J. H. Merle D'Aubigné, the great nineteenth-century historian of the Reformation, wrote:

This powerful text had a mysterious influence on the life of Luther. It was a creative sentence both for the reformer and for the Reformation. It was in these words God then said, "Let there be light! and there was light."... When Luther rose from his knees on Pilate's Staircase, in agitation and amazement at those words which Paul had addressed fifteen centuries before to the inhabitants of that same metropolis—Truth, till then a melancholy captive, fettered in the church, rose also to fall no more.

"Here I Stand"

When Luther rose from his knees on the steps of the Scala Sancta, the high point of his long career—his refusal to recant his faith before the imperial diet at Worms—was still eleven years away. But Luther was already prepared for this challenge. He would be ready to defend his position, because he now saw that a man or woman is not enabled to stand before God by his or her own accomplishments, however devout, still less by the pronouncements of ecclesiastical councils or popes, however vigorously enforced, but by the grace and power of Almighty God alone. And if a person can stand before God by grace, he can certainly stand before men.

Luther was summoned before the diet by the newly elected emperor, Charles V. But it was really the Roman See that had summoned him, and the champions of Rome were present to secure his condemnation. Upon his arrival at the town hall assembly room at four o'clock on the afternoon of April 17, Luther was asked to acknowledge as his writings a large stack of books that had been gathered and placed in the room. He was also asked whether he would retract their contents, which called for reform of abuses rampant in the church, asserted the right of the individual Christian to be emancipated from priestly bondage, and reaffirmed the fundamental doctrine of justification by faith.

Luther asked that the titles might be read out. Then he responded, "Most gracious emperor! Gracious princes and lords! His imperial majesty has asked me two questions. As to the first, I acknowledge as mine the books that have just been named. I cannot deny them. As to the second, seeing that it is a question which concerns faith and the salvation of souls, and in which the Word of God, the greatest and most precious treasure either in heaven or earth, is interested, I should act imprudently were I to reply without reflection.... For this reason I entreat your imperial majesty, with all humility, to allow me time, that I may answer without offending against the Word of God."

It was a proper request in so grave a matter. Besides, by taking reasonable time to reflect on his answer, Luther would give stronger proof of the firmness of his stand when he made it. There was debate concerning this request, but at last Luther was given twenty-four hours to consider his response.

When he appeared the next day, the demand was the same: "Will you defend your books as a whole, or are you ready to disavow some of them?"

Luther replied by making distinctions between his writings, trying to draw the council into debate and thus have an opportunity to present the true gospel. Some of his books treated the Christian faith in language acceptable to all men. To repudiate these would be a denial of Jesus Christ. A second category attacked the errors and tyranny of the papacy. To deny these would lend additional strength to this tyranny, and thus be a sin against the German people. A third class of books concerned individuals and their teachings. Here Luther confessed that he may have spoken harshly or unwisely. But if so, it was necessary for his adversaries to bear witness of the evil done. Luther said he would be the first to throw his books into the fire if it could be proved that he had erred in these or any others of his writings.

"But you have not answered the question put to you," said the moderator. "Will you, or will you not, retract?"

Upon this, Luther replied without hesitation: "Since your most serene majesty and your high mightiness require from me a clear, simple, and precise answer, I will give you one, and it is this: I cannot submit my faith either to the pope or to the councils, because it is clear to me as the day that they have frequently erred and contradicted each other. Unless therefore I am convinced by the testimony of Scripture, or by the clearest reasoning—unless I am persuaded by means of the passages I have quoted—and unless they thus render my conscience bound by the Word of God, I cannot and I will not retract, for it is unsafe for a Christian to speak against his conscience."

Then looking around at those who held his life in their hands, Luther said: "Here I stand. I can do no other. May God help me. Amen." Thus did the German monk utter the words that still thrill our hearts after four and a half centuries.

The Master of All Doctrines

Later in life Luther was to write many things about the doctrine of justification by faith, which he had learned from Romans 1:17. He would call it "the chief article from which all our other doctrines have flowed." He called it "the master and prince, the lord, the ruler and the judge over all kinds of doctrines." He said, "If the article of justification is lost, all Christian doctrine is lost at the same time." He argued, "It alone begets, nourishes, builds, preserves, and defends the church of God, and without it the church of God cannot exist for one hour." What a heritage! What a rebuke against the weak state of present-day Christianity!

If justification by faith is the doctrine by which the church stands or falls, our contemporary declines are no doubt due to our failure to understand, appreciate, and live by this doctrine. The church of our day does not stand tall before the world. It bows to it. Christians are not fearless before ridicule. We flee from it. Is the reason not that we have never truly learned to stand before God in his righteousness? Is it not because we have never learned the truth: "If God is for us, who can be against us?" (Rom. 8:31b)? The church will never be strong unless it is united around faithful men and women who firmly hold this conviction.

Part Three. The Race in Ruin

Chapter 14.

The Angry God

Romans 1:18

Today's preaching is deficient at many points. But there is no point at which it is more evidently inadequate and even explicitly contrary to the teachings of the New Testament than in its neglect of "the wrath of God." God's wrath is a dominant Bible teaching and the point in Romans at which Paul begins his formal exposition of the gospel. Yet, to judge from most contemporary forms of Christianity, the wrath of God is either an unimportant doctrine, which is an embarrassment, or an entirely wrong notion, which any enlightened Christian should abandon.

Weakness of Contemporary Preaching

Where do most people begin when making a presentation of Christian truth, assuming that they even speak of it to others? Where does most of today's Christian "preaching" begin?

Many begin with what is often termed "a felt need," a lack or a longing that the listener will acknowledge. The need may involve feelings of inadequacy; a recognition of problems in the individual's personal relationships or work or aspirations; moods; fears; or simply bad habits. The basic issue may be loneliness, or it may be uncontrollable desires. According to this theory, preaching should begin with felt needs, because this alone establishes a point of contact with a listener and wins a hearing. But does it? Oh, it may establish a contact between the teacher and the listener. But this is not the same thing as establishing contact between the listener and God, which is what preaching is about. Nor is it even necessarily a contact between the listener and the truth, since felt needs are often anything but our real needs; rather, they can actually be a means of suppressing them.

Here is the way Paul speaks of a felt need in another letter: "For the time will come when men will not put up with sound doctrine. Instead, to suit their own desires, they will gather around them a great number of teachers to say what their itching ears want to hear" (2 Tim. 4:3). "What their itching ears want to hear" is a classic example of a felt need. In this passage the apostle warns Timothy not to cater to it. Obviously he himself did not structure the presentation of his gospel around such "needs."

Another way we present the gospel today is by promises. We offer them like a carrot, a reward to be given if only the listener accepts Jesus. Through this approach, becoming a Christian is basically presented as a means of getting something. Sometimes this is propounded in a frightfully unbiblical way, so that what emerges is a "prosperity gospel" in which God is supposed to be obliged to grant wealth, health, and success to the believer.

We also commonly offer the gospel by the route of personal experience, stressing what Jesus has done for us and commending it to the other person for that reason.

The point I am making is that Paul does not do this in Romans, and in this matter he rebukes us profitably. D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones puts it like this:

Why is he [Paul] ready to preach the gospel in Rome or anywhere else? He does not say it is because he knows that many of them [the Romans] are living defeated lives and that he has got something to tell them that will give them victory. He does not say to them, "I want to come and preach the gospel to you in Rome because I have had a marvelous experience and I want to tell you about it, in order that you may have the same experience—because you can if you want it; it is there for you."

This is not what Paul does.... There is no mention here of any experience. He is not talking in terms of their happiness or some particular state of mind, or something that might appeal to them, as certain possibilities do—but this staggering, amazing thing, the wrath of God! And he puts it first; it is the thing he says at once.

The reason, of course, is that Paul was God-centered, rather than man-centered, and he was concerned with that central focus. Most of us are weak, fuzzy, or wrong at this point. Paul knew that what matters in the final analysis is not whether we feel good or have our felt needs met or receive a meaningful experience. What matters is whether we come into a right relationship with God. And to have that happen we need to begin with the truth that we are not in a right relationship to him. On the contrary, we are under God's wrath and are in danger of everlasting condemnation at his hands.

Wrath: A Biblical Idea

There is a problem at this point, of course, and the problem is that most people think in human categories rather than in the terms of Scripture. When we do that, "wrath" inevitably suggests something like capricious human anger or malice. God's wrath is not the same thing as human anger, of course. But because we fail to appreciate this fact, we are uneasy with the very idea of God's wrath and think that it is somehow unworthy of God's character. So we steer away from the issue.

The biblical writers had no such reticence. They spoke of God's wrath frequently, obviously viewing it as one of God's great "perfections"—alongside his other attributes. Says J. I. Packer, "One of the most striking things about the Bible is the vigor with which both Testaments emphasize the reality and terror of God's wrath." Arthur W. Pink wrote, "A study of the concordance will show that there are more references in Scripture to the anger, fury, and wrath of God than there are to His love and tenderness."

In the Old Testament more than twenty words are used to refer to God's wrath. (Other, very different words relate to human anger.) There are nearly six hundred important passages on the subject. These passages are not isolated or unrelated, as if they had been added to the Old Testament at some later date by a particularly gloomy redactor. They are basic and are integrated with the most important themes and events of Scripture.

The earliest mentions of the wrath of God are in connection with the giving of the law at Sinai.
The first occurs just two chapters after the account of the giving of the Ten Commandments: "[The Lord said,] 'Do not take advantage of a widow or an orphan. If you do and they cry out to me, I will certainly hear their cry. My anger [wrath] will be aroused, and I will kill you with the sword; your wives will become widows and your children fatherless'" (Exod. 22:22-24).

Ten chapters later in Exodus, in a very important passage about the sin of Israel in making and worshiping the golden calf (a passage to which we will return), God and Moses discuss wrath. God says, "Now leave me alone so that my anger [wrath] may burn against them and that I may destroy them...." But Moses pleads, "Why should your anger burn against your people, whom you brought out of Egypt with great power and a mighty hand? Why should the Egyptians say, 'It was with evil intent that he brought them out, to kill them in the mountains and to wipe them off the face of the earth'? Turn from your fierce anger; relent and do not bring disaster on your people" (Exod. 32:10-12).

In this early and formative passage, Moses does not plead with God on the grounds of some supposed innocence of the people—they were not innocent, and Moses knew it—nor with the fantasy that wrath is somehow unworthy of God's character. Rather Moses appeals only on the grounds that God's judgment would be misunderstood and that his name would be dishonored by the heathen.

There are two main words for wrath in the New Testament. One is thymos, from a root that means "to rush along fiercely," "to be in a heat of violence," or "to breathe violently." We can capture this idea by the phrase "a panting rage." The other word is orgē which means "to grow ripe for something." It portrays wrath as something that builds up over a long period of time, like water collecting behind a great dam. In his study of The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross, Leon Morris notes that apart from the Book of Revelation, which describes the final outpouring of God's wrath in all its unleashed fury, thumos is used only once of God's anger. The word used in every other passage is orgē. Morris observes, "The biblical writers habitually use for the divine wrath a word which denotes not so much a sudden flaring up of passion which is soon over, as a strong and settled opposition to all that is evil arising out of God's very nature."

John Murray describes wrath in precisely this way when he writes in his classic definition: "Wrath is the holy revulsion of God's being against that which is the contradiction of his holiness."

We find this understanding of the wrath of God in Romans. In this letter Paul refers to wrath ten times. But in each instance the word he uses is orgē, and his point is not that God is suddenly flailing out in petulant anger against something that has offended him momentarily, but rather that God's firm, fearsome hatred of all wickedness is building up and will one day result in the eternal condemnation of all who are not justified by Christ's righteousness. Romans 1:17 says, on the basis of Habakkuk 2:4, that "the righteous will live by faith." But those who do not live by faith will not live; they will perish. Thus, in Romans 2:5 we find Paul writing, "Because of your stubbornness and your unrepentant heart, you are storing up wrath against yourself for the day of God's wrath, when his righteous judgment will be revealed."

Wrath Revealed

But it is not only a matter of God's wrath being "stored up" for a final great outpouring at the last day. There is also a present manifesting of this wrath, which is what Paul seems to be speaking of in our text when he says, using the present rather than the future tense of the verb, "The wrath of God is being revealed from heaven against all the godlessness and wickedness of men who suppress the truth by their wickedness." How is this so? In what way is the wrath of God currently being made manifest?

Commentators on Romans suggest a number of observations at this point, listing ways in which God's wrath against sin seems to be disclosed. Charles Hodge speaks of three such manifestations: "the actual punishment of sin," "the inherent tendency of moral evil to produce misery," and "the voice of conscience."

D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones lists "conscience," "disease and illness," "the state of creation," "the universality of death," "history," and (the matter he thinks Paul mainly had in view) "the cross" and "resurrection of Christ."

Robert Haldane has a comprehensive statement:

The wrath of God... was revealed when the sentence of death was first pronounced, the earth cursed and man driven out of the earthly paradise, and afterward by such examples of punishment as those of the deluge and the destruction of the cities of the plain by fire from heaven, but especially by the reign of death throughout the world. It was proclaimed by the curse of the law on every transgression and was intimated in the institution of sacrifice and in all the services of the Mosaic dispensation. In the eighth chapter of this epistle the apostle calls the attention of believers to the fact that the whole creation has become subject to vanity and groaneth and travaileth together in pain. This same creation which declares that there is a God, and publishes his glory, also proves that he is the enemy of sin and the avenger of the crimes of men.... But above all, the wrath of God was revealed from heaven when the Son of God came down to manifest the divine character, and when that wrath was displayed in his sufferings and death in a manner more awful than by all the tokens God had before given of his displeasure against sin.

Each of these explanations of the present revelation of the wrath of God is quite accurate. But in my opinion Paul has something much more specific in view here, the matter that Charles Hodge alone mentions specifically: "the inherent tendency of moral evil to produce misery." This is what Paul goes on to develop in Romans 1. In verses 21 through 32 Paul speaks of a downward inclination of the race by which the world, having rejected God and therefore being judicially abandoned by God, is given up to evil. It is set on a course that leads to perversions and ends in a debasement in which people call good evil and evil good. Human depravity and the misery involved are the revelation of God's anger.

A number of years ago, Ralph L. Keiper was speaking to a loose-living California hippie about the claims of God on his life. The man was denying the existence of God and the truths of Christianity, but he was neither dull nor unperceptive. So Keiper directed him to Romans 1, which he described as an analysis of the hippie's condition. The man read it carefully and then replied, "I think I see what you're driving at. You are saying that I am the verifying data of the revelation."

That is exactly it! The present revelation of God's wrath, though limited in its scope, should be proof to us that we are indeed children of wrath and that we need to turn from our present evil path to the Savior.

Turning Aside God's Wrath

Here I return to that great Old Testament story mentioned earlier. Moses had been on the mountain for forty days, receiving the law. As the days stretched into weeks, the people waiting below grew restless and prevailed upon Moses' brother Aaron to make a substitute god for them. It was a golden calf. Knowing what was going on in the valley, God interrupted his giving of the law to tell Moses what the people were doing and to send him back down to them.

It was an ironic situation. God had just given the Ten Commandments. They had begun: "I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of Egypt, out of the land of slavery. You shall have no other gods before me. You shall not make for yourself an idol in the form of anything in heaven above or on the earth beneath or in the waters below. You shall not bow down to them or worship them; for I, the LORD your God, am a jealous God, punishing the children for the sin of the fathers to the third and fourth generation of those who hate me, but showing love to thousands who love me and keep my commandments" (Exod. 20:2-6). While God was giving these words, the people whom he had saved from slavery were doing precisely what he was prohibiting. Not only that, they were lying, coveting, dishonoring their parents, committing adultery, and no doubt also breaking all the other commandments.

God declared his intention to judge the people immediately and totally, and Moses interceded for them in the words referred to earlier (Exod. 32:11-12).

At last Moses started down the mountain to deal with the people. Even on a human level, quite apart from any thought of God's grace, sin must be judged. So Moses dealt with the sin as best he knew how. First he rebuked Aaron publicly. Then he called for any who still remained on the side of the Lord to separate themselves from the others and stand beside him. The tribe of Levi responded. At Moses' command they were sent into the camp to execute the leaders of the rebellion. Three thousand men were killed, approximately one-half of one percent of the six hundred thousand who had left Egypt at the Exodus (Exod. 32:28; cf. 12:37—with women and children counted, the number may have been more than two million). Moses also destroyed the golden calf. He ground it up, mixed it with water, and made the people drink it.

From a human standpoint, Moses had dealt with the sin. The leaders were punished. Aaron was rebuked. The allegiance of the people was at least temporarily reclaimed. But Moses stood in a special relationship to God, as Israel's representative, as well as to the people as their leader. And God still waited in wrath on the mountain. What was Moses to do?

For theologians sitting in an ivory-tower armchair, the idea of the wrath of God may seem to be no more than an interesting speculation. But Moses was no armchair theologian. He had been talking with God. He had heard his voice. He had receive his law. Not all the law had been given by this time, but Moses had received enough of it to know something of the horror of sin and of the uncompromising nature of God's righteousness. Had God not said, "You shall have no other gods before me"? Had he not promised to punish sin to the third and fourth generation of those who disobey him? Who was Moses to think that the judgment he had imposed would satisfy a God of such holiness?

Night passed, and the morning came when Moses was to ascend the mountain again. He had been thinking, and during the night a way that might possibly divert the wrath of God had come to him. He remembered the sacrifices of the Hebrew patriarchs and the newly instituted rites of the Passover. God had shown by such sacrifices that he was prepared to accept an innocent substitute in place of the just death of the sinner. God's wrath could sometimes fall on the substitute. Moses thought, "Perhaps God would accept...."

When morning came, Moses ascended the mountain with great determination. Reaching the top, he began to speak to God. It must have been in great anguish, for the Hebrew text is uneven and Moses' second sentence breaks off without ending (indicated by a dash in the middle of Exod. 32:32). This is the strangled sob welling up from the heart of a man who is asking to be damned if his own judgment could mean the salvation of those he had come to love. The text reads: "So Moses went back to the LORD and said, 'Oh, what a great sin these people have committed! They have made themselves gods of gold. But now, please forgive their sin—but if not, then blot me out of the book you have written" (Exod. 32:31-32). Moses was offering to take the place of the people and accept judgment on their behalf.

On the preceding day, before Moses had come down from the mountain, God had said something that could have been a great temptation. If Moses would agree, God would destroy the people and start again to make a new Jewish nation from Moses (Exod. 32:10). Even then Moses had rejected the offer. But, after having been with his people and being reminded of his love for them, his answer, again negative, rises to even greater heights. God had said, "I will destroy the people and save you."

Now Moses replies, "Rather destroy me and save them."

Moses lived in the early years of God's revelation and at this point probably had a very limited understanding of God's plan. He did not know, as we know, that what he prayed for could not be. He had offered to go to hell for his people. But Moses could not save even himself, let alone Israel. He, too, was a sinner. He, too, needed a savior. He could not die for others.

But there is One who could. Thus, "But when the time had fully come, God sent his Son, born of a woman, born under law, to redeem those under law, that we might receive the full rights of sons" (Gal. 4:4-5). That person is Jesus, the Son of God. His death was for those who deserve God's wrath. And his death was fully adequate, because Jesus did not need to die for his own sins—he was sinless—and because, being God, his act was of infinite magnitude.

That is the message Paul will expound in this epistle. It is the Good News, the gospel. But the place to begin is not with your own good works, since you have none, but by knowing that you are an object of God's wrath and will perish in sin at last, unless you throw yourself upon the mercy of the One who died for sinners, even Jesus Christ.

Chapter 15.
Natural Revelation

Romans 1:18-20

No one likes to talk about the wrath of God, particularly if it is thought of in relation to ourselves. But if we have to think about it, as our study of Romans 1:18-20 obviously forces us to do, we find ourselves reacting generally in one of two ways. Either (1) we argue that wrath is somehow unworthy of God, a blotch on his character, and therefore a mistaken notion that should be abandoned at once by all right-thinking people; or (2) we reply by denying that we merit God's wrath, that we do not deserve it.

The second reaction is the more serious of the two. So it is the one Paul tackles in the development of his argument for the need we all have of the Christian gospel.

Romans 1:18-20 contains three important concepts, which together explain why the wrath of God against men and women is justified. The first is wrath itself. It is being revealed from heaven against the ungodly, Paul says. The second is the suppression of the truth about God by human beings, a point picked up and developed more fully in verses 21-23. The third idea is God's prior revelation of himself to those very people who suppress the truth about him. These concepts need to be studied in inverse order, however. For when they are considered in that order—revelation, suppression, and wrath—they teach that God has given a revelation of himself in nature sufficient to lead any right-thinking man or woman to seek him out and worship him, but that, instead of doing this, people suppress this revelation. They deny it so they do not have to follow where it leads them. It is because of this willful and immoral suppression of the truth about God by human beings that the wrath of God comes upon them.

Revelation of God in Nature

There has been so much debate about what theologians call "natural revelation" that it is important to begin a discussion of this subject with some important definitions and distinctions. First, a definition: natural revelation means what it sounds like, namely, the revelation of God in nature. It is sometimes called "general revelation," because it is available to everybody. Natural revelation is distinguished from "special revelation," which goes beyond it and is the kind of revelation we find in the life and ministry of Jesus Christ, the Bible, and the revelation of the Bible's meaning to the minds of those who read it by the Holy Spirit.

When Paul talks about a knowledge of God made plain to human beings, as he does in this text, it is the general or natural revelation, not a specific scriptural revelation, that he has in mind.

The second concept that needs to be defined here is "knowledge of God." This is necessary because we can use the words know or knowledge in different ways.

1. Awareness. To begin on the lowest level, when we say that we know something we can be saying only that we are aware of its existence. In this sense we can say that we know where somebody lives or that we know certain things are happening somewhere in the world. This is true knowledge, but it is not extensive knowledge. It is knowledge that affects us very little. It does not involve us personally.

2. Knowing about. Knowing about something goes a step further, because knowledge in this sense may be detailed, extensive, and important. This is the kind of knowledge a physicist would have of physics or a doctor of medical facts. To come more to the point, a theologian can have knowledge about God, a theology by which he might be called a very learned man—and still not be saved.

3. Experience. The word know can also be used to refer to knowledge acquired by experience. To go back to the two previous categories, we could have this kind of knowledge of where a person lives if, for example, we had actually lived in his or her home ourselves. Again, a doctor could have knowledge like this if he were actually to experience the diseases he treats or undergo the operations he performs. Knowledge of a disease by having it is obviously quite different from merely having read of its causes and symptoms and how to treat the ailment.

4. Personal. The last kind of knowledge is the highest and most important level. It is what we would call personal knowledge, the kind of knowing we can only have of God, of ourselves, or of another human being. When the Bible speaks of knowing God in a saving way, this is what it has in mind. It involves the knowledge of ourselves in our sin and of God in his holiness and grace. It involves the knowledge of what he has done for us in Christ for our salvation and an actual coming to know and love God through knowing Jesus Christ. It involves head knowledge, but it also involves heart knowledge. It expresses itself in piety, worship, and devotion. It is what Jesus was speaking of when he prayed, "This > is eternal life: that they may know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom you have sent" (John 17:3).

Some people grow impatient with definitions of this sort and wish that the teachers making them would just get on with explaining the Bible. But distinctions are necessary in this case, since they alone isolate the particular kind of knowledge of God available to men and women in nature for which God holds them accountable.

In the context of our text, this is not knowledge in the last of the four senses mentioned; if it were, all persons would be saved. Nor is it even (except in a very limited sense) knowledge about God or knowledge by experience. It is basically awareness. Nature reveals God is such a way that, even without the special revelation of God that we have in the Bible, all men and women are at least aware that God exists and that they should worship him. This awareness of God will not save them. But it is sufficient to condemn them if they fail to follow nature's leading, as they could and should do, and seek out the true God so revealed.

Eternal Power and Divine Nature

The apostle is precise here as he explains what the natural revelation involves. It consists of two elements: first, "God's eternal power" and, second, God's "divine nature" (v. 20). The second means quite simply that there is a God. In other words, people have no excuse for being atheists. The first means that the God, whom they know to exist, is all-powerful. People know this by definition, since a god who is not all-powerful is not really God. We can express these two ideas philosophically by the term "Supreme Being." "Being" (with a capital "B") refers to God's existence. "Supreme" denotes his ultimate power. What Paul is saying is that nature contains ample and entirely convincing evidence of the existence of a Supreme Being. God exists, and we know it. That is his argument. Therefore, when people subsequently refuse to acknowledge and worship God (as we do), the problem is not in God or in a lack of evidence for his existence but in our own irrational and resolute determination not to know him.

I need to add several more important things at this point, and the first concerns the extensiveness of this nevertheless incomplete revelation. I have pointed out that the revelation of God in nature is the limited disclosure of God's existence and supreme power. There is no revelation of his mercy, holiness, grace, love, or the many other things necessary for us to learn if we are to know God savingly. Still, we are not to think of this limited revelation as minimal, as if somehow its limited quality alone can excuse us. According to the Bible, this natural revelation of God, though limited, is nevertheless extensive and overwhelming in its force.

In the Old Testament the great counterpart to Romans 1:18-20 is the first half of Psalm 19 (vv. 16). It speaks of the revelation of God in the heavens:

> The heavens declare the glory of God;
> the skies proclaim the work of his hands.
> Day after day they pour forth speech;
> night after night they display knowledge.
> There is no speech or language where their voice is not heard.
> Their voice goes out into all the earth, > their words to the ends of the world.
> In the heavens he has pitched a tent for the sun, which is like a bridegroom coming forth from his pavilion, like a champion rejoicing to run his course.
> It rises at one end of the heavens and makes its circuit to the other; nothing is hidden from its heat.

In these verses it is the "glory" or majesty of God that is said to be revealed in nature. But the emphasis here is on the universal nature of the revelation rather than on its content. It is heard in every human "speech" and "language." It is known in "all the earth" and "to the ends of the world."

Another classic Old Testament passage about natural revelation is the interrogation of Job recorded in chapters 38 and 39 of that book. God is the interrogator, and his point is that Job is far too ignorant even to question God or presume to evaluate his ways. In the context of that negative argument—"See how little you know"—God unfolds an overwhelming list of evidences for his wisdom, power, and great glory, which Job (like all people everywhere) should know and before which he should marvel:

> "Where were you when I laid the earth's foundation?
> Tell me, if you understand.
> Who marked off its dimensions? Surely you know!
> Who stretched a measuring line across it?
> On what were its footings set, or who laid its cornerstone—> while the morning stars sang together and all the angels shouted for joy?
> "Who shut up the sea behind doors when it burst forth from the womb, > when I made the clouds its garment and wrapped it in thick darkness, > when I fixed limits for it and set its doors and bars in place, > when I said, 'This far you may come and no farther; here is where your proud waves halt'?"
>
> Job 38:4-11

God's interrogation of Job goes on in that fashion for two chapters. Then, after Job responds by a confession of his own ignorance, God launches into the same type of questioning for one chapter more. These chapters stress that God is all-powerful and all-wise, and the evidence they present for these divine attributes is nature.

Kindness in Nature

There may be one other matter to be mentioned, though I must be careful not to claim too much for it here. When Paul and Barnabas came to Lystra in Lycaonia on their first missionary journey, the people wanted to worship them because they thought they were gods as a result of a miracle they did. Paul rebuked their error and began to teach them better, in one place speaking of God's revelation of himself in nature in these words: "God... made heaven and earth and sea and everything in them. In the past, he let all nations go their own way. Yet he has not left himself without testimony: He has shown kindness by giving you rain from heaven and crops in their seasons; he provides you with plenty of food and fills your hearts with joy" (Acts 14:15b17).

If these words are to be taken at their face value—and why should we not take them that way?— they say that God has also revealed his kindness in nature. Theologians call this common grace. Instead of sending us all to hell at this instant, as he has every right to do, God takes care of us in a common, general way so that most of us have food to eat, clothes to wear, and places to live. True, the evidence for common grace is not unambiguous. There are bad things in this world, too: hurricanes, terrible diseases, and so on. But generally the world is a reasonably pleasant place. So it is not only God's glory, power, and wisdom that we see in nature, according to the Bible. We see God's goodness or kindness as well, and this attribute especially increases our guilt when we refuse to seek God so that we may thank and worship him.

Awareness Within

The second idea I need to add here is that God's revelation of himself in nature does not stop with the external evidence for his existence, power, wisdom, and kindness—the attributes I have mentioned—but it has what can be called an internal or subjective element as well. That is, not only has God given evidence for his existence; he has also given us the capacity to comprehend or receive it—though we refuse to do so. The text says, "What may be known about God is plain to them, because God has made it plain to them," and "God's invisible qualities—his eternal power and divine nature—have been clearly seen, being understood from what has been made" (vv. 19-20, italics mine).

Charles Hodge writes of these verses, "It is not of a mere external revelation of which the apostle is speaking, but of that evidence of the being and perfections of God which every man has in the constitution of his own nature, and in virtue of which he is competent to apprehend the manifestation of God in his works."

John Calvin says that we are "blind" to God's revelation but "not so blind that we can plead ignorance without being convicted of perversity."

Let me use an illustration. Suppose you are driving down the street and come to a sign that says, "Detour—Turn Left." But you ignore this and drive on. It happens that there is a police officer present, who stops you and begins to write out a ticket. What excuse might you have? You might argue that you didn't see the sign. But that would carry very little weight if the sign was well placed and in bright colors. Besides, it makes no difference. As long as you are driving the car, the responsibility for seeing the sign and obeying it is yours. What is more, you are accountable if, having ignored the sign, you recklessly race on and either harm yourself and your passengers or destroy property.

Paul's teaching fits this illustration. He is saying, first, that there is a sign. It is God's revelation of himself in nature. Second, you have "vision." Although blind to much, you can nevertheless see the revelation. Therefore, if you choose to ignore it, as we all do apart from the grace of God, the disaster that follows is your own fault. Your feelings of guilt are well founded.

Let me try this again. Paul is not saying that there is enough evidence about God in nature so that the scientist, who carefully probes nature's mysteries, can be aware of him. (Carl Sagan has done this as well as anybody, but he acknowledges no Supreme Being.) Paul is not saying that the sign is there but hidden, that we are only able to find it if we look carefully. He is saying that the sign is plain. It is a billboard. In fact, it is a world of billboards. No one, no matter how weak-minded or insignificant, can be excused for missing it.

There is enough evidence of God in a flower to lead a child as well as a scientist to worship him.

There is sufficient evidence in a tree, a pebble, a grain of sand, a fingerprint, to make us glorify God and thank him. This is the way to true knowledge. But people will not do this. They reject the revelation, substitute nature itself or parts of nature for God, and thereby find their hearts increasingly darkened.

John Calvin gives this just conclusion: "But although we lack the natural ability to mount up unto the pure and clear knowledge of God, all excuse is cut off because the fault of dullness is within us. And, indeed, we are not allowed thus to pretend ignorance without our conscience itself always convicting us of both baseness and ingratitude."

Suppressing the Truth

When Calvin speaks of baseness and ingratitude, he brings us to the second point of Paul's argument in this section of Romans, the point that justifies and leads to God's wrath. We have already been talking about this. It is human rejection of the revelation God has given.

Paul's description of what people have done in regard to natural revelation is in the phrase "who suppress the truth by their wickedness" (v. 18). In Greek the word translated "suppress" is katechein, which means "take," "hold," "hold fast," "hold back," "keep," "restrain," or "repress." In a positive sense the word can be used to mean holding to something that is good, as when Paul speaks of holding on to the word of life (cf. Phil. 2:16). In a negative sense it means wrongly to suppress something or hold it down. This is the way Paul is using it here. Thus, the newer translations of the Bible speak in Romans 1:18 of those who "suppress the truth in unrighteousness" (NASB), "keep truth imprisoned in their wickedness" (Jerusalem Bible) or "stifle" truth (NEB). Why do we do this? It is because of our wickedness, because we prefer sin to that to which the revelation of God would take us.

This leads to the matter we are going to study in the next chapter, what R. C. Sproul has called "the psychology of atheism." It leads to an explanation of why natural revelation by itself does not work, in the sense of actually bringing us to God.

But before we turn to that topic, I need to say that if, as Paul maintains, the revelation of God in nature is fully adequate to condemn people who do not allow it to bring them to worship and serve this true God, how much more terrible and awful is the case of the vast numbers of people, particularly in our country, who have not only the natural revelation to lead them to God but also have the Bible and the proclamation of its truths in virtually every town and hamlet of our land and (by means of radio and television) at almost any hour. "Without excuse"? The people of Rome were without excuse, and they had nothing but nature. No Bible! No churches! No preachers! What about us who have everything? If we reject what God tells us, we are a thousand times more guilty.

No excuse! "How shall we escape if we ignore such a great salvation?" (Heb. 2:3).

Chapter 16.
The Psychology of Atheism

Romans 1:18-20

In 1974 theologian R. C. Sproul produced a book from which I have drawn the title of this study:
The Psychology of Atheism. Sproul's book (later reissued as If There Is a God, Why Are There Atheists?) is an attempt to understand why people reject God either philosophically, becoming philosophical atheists, or practically, becoming practical atheists. (Practical atheists may say that they believe in God, but they "act as if" God does not exist.) Sproul's answer is that atheism has nothing to do with man's supposed ignorance of God—since all people know God, according to Romans 1—but rather with mankind's dislike of him. People do not "know" God, because they do not want to know him.

Sproul writes:

The New Testament maintains that unbelief is generated not so much by intellectual causes as by moral and psychological ones. The problem is not that there is insufficient evidence to convince rational beings that there is a God, but that rational beings have a natural antipathy to the being of God. In a word, the nature of God (at least the Christian God) is repugnant to man and is not the focus of desire or wish projection. Man's desire is not that Yahweh exists, but that he doesn't.

The Sovereign God

But why are people so determined to reject God? Up to this point we have looked at three great ideas in our study of Romans 1:18-20: (1) the wrath of God, which is directed against all the godlessness and wickedness of men; (2) the suppression by human beings of the truth about God revealed in nature; and (3) the prior revelation of God's eternal power and divine nature through what God has made. But we have seen that the historical sequence of these ideas is the reverse of the above listing. First, God has revealed himself. Second, people have rejected the truth thus revealed. Third, the wrath of God is released upon them because of this rejection.

Still, the question remains: Why do so-called rational beings react in what is clearly such an irrational manner? If the truth about God is as plainly understood as Romans 1:18-20 maintains it is, why should anyone suppress it? The answer, of course, is what I began to talk about in the previous chapter and am now to carry further in terms of Sproul's thesis. Men and women reject God because they do not like him. They may like a god of their own imagining, a god like themselves, and therefore say that they like God. But the truth is that they do not like the God who really is.

Paul's words for this universal dislike of God are "godlessness" and "wickedness" (v. 18).

"Godlessness" means that people are opposed to God. They are not like God and do not like him. "Wickedness" refers to what people do because of this determined opposition. They reject the truth about God, thereby trying to force God away.

What is it that people do not like about God? The answer is, nearly everything. Let me show this by a look at some of the most important of God's attributes.

The first thing men and women dislike about God is his sovereignty, his most basic attribute. For if God is not sovereign, God is not God. Sovereignty refers to rule; in the case of God, it refers to the Being who is ruler over all. Sovereignty is what David was speaking about in his great prayer recorded in 1 Chronicles 29:10-13.

Praise be to you, O LORD, God of our father Israel, from everlasting to everlasting.
Yours, O LORD, is the greatness and the power and the glory and the majesty and the splendor, for everything in heaven and earth is yours.
Yours, O LORD, is the kingdom; you are exalted as head over all.
Wealth and honor come from you; you are the ruler of all things.
In your hands are strength and power to exalt and give strength to all.
Now, our God, we give you thanks, and praise your glorious name.

God shows his sovereignty over the material order by creating it and ruling it according to his own fixed laws. Sometimes he shows his sovereignty by miracles. God shows his sovereignty over the human will and therefore also over human actions by controlling them. Thus, he hardens Pharaoh's heart so that Pharaoh refuses to let the people of Israel leave Egypt; and then God judges him. In a contrary way, God melts the hearts of some individuals and draws them to Jesus.

But why should the sovereignty of God be so objectionable to human beings? If we look at matters superficially, we might think that all people would quite naturally welcome God's sovereignty. "After all," we might argue, "what could be better than knowing that everything in the world is really under control in spite of appearances and that God is going to work all things out eventually?" But it is only when we look at externalities that we can think like that. When we peer below the surface we discover that we are all in rebellion against God because of our desire for autonomy.

This was Adam's problem. It was the root sin. God had told Adam that he was to be as free as any creature in the universe could be. Adam was to rule the world for God. Moreover, he was free to go where he wished and do as he wished. He could eat whatever he wished, with one condition: As a symbol of the fact that he was not autonomous, that he was still God's creature and owed his life, health, fortune, and ultimate allegiance to God, Adam was forbidden to eat of a tree that stood in the midst of the Garden of Eden. He could eat of all the trees north of that tree, all the trees east of that tree, all the trees south of that tree, all the trees west of that tree. But the fruit of that one tree was forbidden to him, upon penalty of death. "When you eat of it you will surely die," was God's warning.

Nothing could have been more irrational than for Adam to eat of that tree. God had never lied to him, so he could believe God. Moreover, Adam owed God utter and unquestioning obedience in this and every other matter. Besides, he had been warned that if he ate he would die. There was nothing to be gained from eating! There was everything to lose! Still, as Adam looked at the tree it was a great offense to him. The tree stood for a limitation on his personal desires. It represented something he was not allowed to do. So Adam said in effect, "That tree is an offense to my autonomy. I do not care if I can eat of all the trees north of here, east of here, south of here, and west of here. As long as I allow that tree to remain untouched, I feel less than human. I feel diminished. Therefore, I am going to eat of it and die, whatever that may mean."

So Adam ate of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, and death, the punishment for sin, came upon the race.

That is the condition of every human heart. We hate God's sovereignty because we want to be sovereign ourselves. We want to run our own lives. We want to roam free, to know no boundaries. When we discover that there are boundaries, we hate God for the discovery.

We react like the rulers of the nations in Psalm 2: "The kings of the earth take their stand and the rulers gather together against the LORD and against his Anointed One. 'Let us break their chains,' they say, 'and throw off their fetters'" (vv. 2-3).

We say, "We will not have this God to rule over us."

The Holy God

It is not only the sovereignty of God that is repugnant to us in our natural, sinful state, however. We oppose God for his holiness as well. One reason is obvious: We hate holiness because we are not holy. God's holiness exposes our sin, and we do not like exposure. But there is more to it than that. Let me explain.

Holiness is one of the greatest of all God's attributes, the only one that is properly repeated three times over in worship statements ("Holy, holy, holy is the Lord Almighty..." [Isa. 6:3; cf. Rev. 4:8]). We think of holiness as utter righteousness, that God does no wrong. But although holiness includes righteousness, holiness is much more than this and is not basically an ethical term at all. The basic idea of holiness is "separation." For example, the Bible is called holy (the Holy Bible), not because it is without sin, though it is inerrant, but because it is set apart and different from all other books. Religious objects are holy because they have been set apart for worship. In reference to God, holiness is the attribute that sets him apart from his creation. It has at least four elements.

1. Majesty. Majesty means "dignity," "authority of sovereign power," "stateliness" or "grandeur." It is the characteristic of strong rulers and of God, who is ruler over all. Majesty links holiness to sovereignty.

2. Will. A second element in holiness is will, the will of a sovereign personality. This makes holiness personal and active, rather than abstract and passive. Moreover, if we ask what the will of God is primarily set on, the answer is on proclaiming himself as the "Wholly Other," whose glory must not be diminished by the disobedience or arrogance of men. This element of holiness comes close to what the Bible is speaking of when it refers to God's proper "jealousy" for his own honor. "Will" means that God is not indifferent to how men and women regard him.

3. Wrath. Wrath is part of holiness because it is the natural and proper stance of the holy God against all that opposes him. It means that God takes the business of being God so seriously that he will permit no other to usurp his place.

4. Righteousness. This is the matter mentioned earlier. It is involved in holiness not because it is the term by which holiness may most fully be understood but because it is what the holy God wills in moral areas.

Here is our problem. Precisely because holiness is not an abstract or passive concept, but is instead the active, dynamic character of God at work to punish rebellion and establish righteousness, the experience of confronting the holy God is profoundly threatening. Holiness intrigues us, as the unknown always does. We are drawn to it. But at the same time we are in danger of being undone, and we fear being undone, by the resulting confrontation. When Isaiah had his encounter with the holy God in the passage referred to above, he reacted in terror, crying, "Woe to me! I am ruined! For I am a man of unclean lips, and I live among a people of unclean lips, and my eyes have seen the King, the LORD Almighty" (Isa. 6:5).

When God revealed himself to Habakkuk, the prophet described the experience by saying, "I heard and my heart pounded, my lips quivered at the sound; decay crept into my bones, and my legs trembled..." (Hab. 3:16).

Job said, "Therefore I despise myself and repent in dust and ashes" (Job 42:6).

Peter exclaimed when he caught only a brief glimpse of Jesus' holiness, "Go away from me, Lord; I am a sinful man!" (Luke 5:8).

The point I am making is this: If confrontation with the holy God is an unpleasant and threatening experience for the best of people—for the saints and prophets of biblical history, for example—how much more threatening must the holiness of God be for outright and unregenerate sinners. For them the experience must be totally overwhelming. No wonder they resist God, make light of him, or deny his existence. A. W. Tozer has written, "The moral shock suffered by us through our mighty break with the high will of heaven has left us all with a permanent trauma affecting every part of our nature." Tozer is right. Therefore, the holiness of God as well as God's sovereignty drive us from him.

The Omniscient God

In his study of atheism, Sproul has a particularly good chapter on God's "omniscience." This term means that God knows everything, including ourselves and everything about us. We do not like this, as Sproul indicates. He proves his point by looking at four modern treatments of the fear of being known, even by other human beings.

The first is by Jean-Paul Sartre, the French existentialist. Sartre has analyzed the fear of being beneath the gaze of someone else in a number of places, but the best known is in his play No Exit. In this play four characters are confined in a room with nothing to do but talk to and stare at each other. It is a symbol of hell. In the last lines of the play this becomes quite clear as Garcin, one of the characters, stands at the mantelpiece, stroking a bronze bust. He says:

Yes, now's the moment: I'm looking at this thing on the mantelpiece, and I understand that I'm in hell. I tell you, everything's been thought out beforehand. They knew I'd stand at the fireplace stroking this thing of bronze, with all those eyes intent on me. Devouring me. (He swings around abruptly.) What? Only two of you? I thought there were more; many more. (Laughs.) So this is hell. I'd never have believed it. You remember all we were told about the torture chambers, the fire and brimstone, the "burning marl." Old wives' tales! There's no need for red-hot pokers. Hell is—other people!

The final stage directive says that the characters slump down onto their respective sofas, the laughter dies away, and they "gaze" at each other.

The second modern treatment of the fear of being known by others is from Julius Fast's Body Language. This book is a study of nonverbal communication, how we express ourselves by various body positions, nods, winks, arm motions, and so forth. There is a discussion of staring, and the point is made that although it is allowable to stare at objects or animals, even for long periods of time, it is not acceptable to stare at human beings. If we do, we provoke embarrassment or hostility or both. Why? Because we associate staring with prying, and we do not want anybody prying into what we think or are.

The third modern study of the significance of the human fear of exposure is Desmond Morris's The Naked Ape. The naked ape is, of course, the human being, the only animal who has no hair or other covering.

The fourth person whose works Sproul studies is the Danish philosopher Søren Kierkegaard. He wrote of a human need for hiddenness or solitude.

What emerges from these studies of modern attitudes toward exposure is a strange ambivalence. On the one hand, we want people to look at us, to notice us. If they ignore us, we feel diminished or hurt. At the same time, if they look too long or too intently, we are embarrassed and upset, because we are ashamed of who we are and do not want others to know us very well. If this is the case in our reaction to other human beings, who never really know us deeply even when they pry, and who are in any case sinners like ourselves, how much more traumatic is it to be known by the omniscient God, before whom all hearts are open, all desires known?

Exposure like this is intolerable. So human beings suppress their knowledge of God—because of his omniscience as well as because of his other attributes.

The Immutable God

At the very end of Sproul's book there is a short "conclusion" in which the author tells how, after he had written the bulk of his study, he remembered a sermon by the great New England preacher and theologian Jonathan Edwards, entitled "Men [Are] Naturally God's Enemies." Sproul wondered how Edwards handled the subject he had been dealing with. So he hunted up the sermon and found Edwards saying that human beings hate God as "an infinitely holy, pure and righteous Being." They hate him because his omniscience is a "holy omniscience" and his omnipotence is a "holy omnipotence." So far, Edwards seemed to be making the same points Sproul was making.

Then Edwards said, "They do not like his immutability."

Immutability? thought Sproul. Why immutability?

Immutability means that God does not change. But why should human beings dislike that about God? Edwards explained that it is "because by this he never will be otherwise than he is, an infinitely holy God." As he thought about this, Sproul began to understand what the great theologian was saying. Men and women hate God for his immutability because it means that he will never be other than he is in all his other attributes.

If the time could come when God might cease to be sovereign, like a retiring chairman of the board, then his sovereignty would not seem particularly bad to us. We are eternal creatures. We could wait him out. When he retires, we could take over.

Again, the holiness of God would not be so offensive to us if the time might come when God would cease to be holy. What God forbids now he might someday condone. Tomorrow or next week or next month he might begin to think differently and change his mind. We could wait to do our sinning.

Omniscience? The time might come when God's memory would begin to fail and he would forget bad things he knows about us. We could live with that.

But not if God is immutable! If God is immutable, not only is God sovereign today; God will be sovereign tomorrow and the next day and the day after that. God will always be sovereign. In the same way, not only is God holy today. God will always be holy. And not only is God omniscient today. God will always be omniscient. God will never change in any of these great attributes. He is the sovereign, holy, omniscient, and immutable God. He always will be, and there is nothing you or I or anyone else can do about it.

We may suppress the truth about God out of a wicked rejection of his sovereignty, saying, "We will not have this God to rule over us." But whether we appreciate his rule or not, God's sovereignty is precisely what we need. We need a God who is able to rule over our unruly passions, control our destructive instincts, and save us. We may hate God for his holiness. But hate him or not, we need a holy God. We need an upright standard, and we need one who will not cease from working with us until we attain it. We may hate God for his omniscience. But we need a God who knows us thoroughly, from top to bottom, and who loves us anyway. We need a God who knows what we need. We may hate God for his immutability, since he does not change in any of his other attributes. But we need a God we can count on.

Chapter 17.
Without Excuse

Romans 1:20

No human being is infinite. Infinitude belongs exclusively to God. Yet, in spite of our finite nature, human beings do seem to have an almost infinite capacity for some things. One of them is for making excuses for reprehensible behavior. Accuse a person of something, and regardless of how obvious the fault may be, the individual immediately begins to make self-serving declarations: "It wasn't my fault," "Nobody told me," "My intentions were good," "You shouldn't be so critical." The two least spoken sentences in the English language are probably "I was wrong" and "I am sorry."

Some people try to brazen things out by denying the need to make excuses. Walt Whitman once wrote, "I do not trouble my spirit to vindicate itself or be understood." The French have a saying that has a similar intent: "Qui s'excuse, s'accuse" ("He who excuses himself, accuses himself"). But that is an excuse itself, since it means that the person involved is too great to need to make apologies.

Our text says that in spite of our almost infinite capacity to make excuses, we are all "without excuse" for our failure to seek out, worship, and thank the living God.

"I Didn't Know God Existed"

The first of our excuses is that we do not know that God exists or at least that we do not know for sure. Every era has had its characteristic excuses for failure to seek and worship God, but in our "scientific age," this is certainly a very common rationalization. We remember that when the Soviet cosmonaut Yuri Gagarin returned to earth from his short time in space, he said with typical atheistic arrogance, "I did not see God." The fact that he could not see God was supposed to be proof of God's nonexistence. Unfortunately, what Gagarin said is typical of many millions of people in our time, both in the communist East and the capitalistic West. It is the argument that science either has disproved God or else has been unable to give adequate evidence for affirming his existence.

It should be clear by this point, however, that if the Bible is from God, as Christians claim, then whatever we may think about the matter, God at least does not agree with our assessment. We say, "There is no evidence for God." Or, "There is insufficient evidence for God."

God says that quite the contrary is the case. God says that nature supplies evidence that is not only extensive but is also "clearly seen" and fully "understood." In other words, there is no excuse for atheism.

The alternative put forward today is that the universe is eternal because matter is eternal, and that all we see has come about over a long period of time as the result of chance or random occurrences. This is the view of Carl Sagan, who affirms the eternity of matter. "In the beginning was the cosmos," cries Sagan. But think through the problems. Suppose everything we see did evolve over long periods of time from mere matter. Suppose our complex universe came from something less complex, and that less complex something from something still less complex. Suppose we push everything back until we come to "mere matter," which is supposed to be eternal. Have we solved our problem? Not at all! We are trying to explain the complex forms of matter as we know them today, but where did those forms come from? Some would say that the form or purpose we see was somehow in matter to begin with. But, if that is the case, then the matter we are talking about is no longer "mere matter." It already has purpose, organization, and form, and we need to ask how these very significant elements got there. At some point we must inevitably find ourselves looking for the Purposer, Organizer, or Former.

Moreover, it is not just form that confronts us. There are personalities in the cosmos. We are personalities. We are not mere matter, even complex matter. We have life, and we know ourselves to be entities possessing a sense of self-identity, feelings, and a will. Where could those things come from in an originally impersonal universe? Francis Schaeffer has written, "The assumption of an impersonal beginning can never adequately explain the personal beings we see around us, and when men try to explain man on the basis of an original impersonal, man soon disappears."

Until recently, the most popular fallback from these truths has been the argument that whatever the difficulties may be for supposing an evolution of what we see from mere matter, such is nevertheless possible, given an infinite amount of time and chance occurrence. But there are two problems here.

First, what is chance? People talk as if chance were an entity that could bring about the universe. But chance is merely a mathematical abstraction with no real existence. Suppose you are about to flip a coin and were to ask, "What are the chances of its coming up heads?" The answer is fifty percent (ignoring the possibility that it may stick in the mud on its side). Suppose further that you do flip the coin and that it comes up heads. What made it come up heads? Did chance do it? Of course not. What made it come up heads was the force of your thumb on the coin, the weight of the coin, the resistance of the air, the distance from your hand to the ground, and other variables. If you knew and could plot every one of those variables, you would be able to tell exactly what would happen—whether the coin would land either heads or tails. You do not know the variables. So you say, "Chances are that it will come up heads fifty percent of the time." But the point I am making is that chance didn't do it. Chance is nothing. So to say that the universe was created by chance is to say that the universe was created by nothing, which is a meaningless statement.

What about there being an infinite amount of time? As I have pointed out, even with an infinite amount of time nothing with form or purpose comes into being apart from an original Former or Purposer. But supposing it could. Even this does not explain the universe, for the simple reason that the universe has not been around for an infinite amount of time. Science itself tells us that the universe is in the nature of fifteen to twenty billion years old. It speaks of an original beginning known popularly as the Big Bang. True, fifteen to twenty billion years is a long time, more time than we can adequately comprehend. But such time is not infinite! That is the point. And if it is not infinite, then an appeal to infinity does not explain the existence of our very complex universe.

"I didn't know God existed"? Can anyone really affirm that in face of the evidence for the existence of God in nature? The Bible says we cannot, and even a secular analysis of the options supports the Bible's statement. Ignorance is no excuse for failing to seek and worship God, because we are not ignorant.

"I Have Too Many Questions"

There are people who might follow what I have said to this point and even agree with most of it but who would nevertheless excuse themselves on the ground that they still have too many questions about Christianity. They recognize that the God we are talking about is not just "any god" but the God who has revealed himself in Scripture. And when they think about that they have a host of questions. They suppose that these are valid excuses for their rejection of the deity. For example:

1. What about the poor innocent native in Africa who has never heard of Christ? Every preacher gets asked this question. In fact, it is probably the question most asked by Christians and nonChristians alike. But it is also true that Romans 1:18-20, the text we have been studying, answers it. The implication behind this question is that the "innocent" native is going to be sent to hell for failing to do something he has never had an opportunity to do, namely, believe on Jesus Christ as his Savior, and that a God who would be so unjust as to condemn the "innocent" native cannot be God. And that is true! God must be just, and God would be unjust if he condemned a person for failing to do what he or she obviously did not have the opportunity of doing.

But that is not the case in regard to the so-called innocent in Africa. To be sure, the native is innocent of failing to believe on Jesus if he or she has never heard of Jesus. But it is not for this that the native or anyone else who has not heard of Jesus is condemned. As Romans 1 tells us, the native is condemned for failing to do what he or she actually knows he or she should do, that is, seek out, worship, and give thanks to the God revealed in nature. Everyone falls short there. A person might argue that the native actually does seek God, offering in proof the widespread phenomenon of religion in the world. Man has rightly been called homo religiosus. But that is no excuse either, for the universality of religion, as Paul is going to show in the next verses, is actually evidence of man's godlessness. Why? Because the religions that man creates are actually attempts to escape having to face the true God. We invent religion—not because we are seeking God, but because we are running away from him.

To repeat what we have seen in the last two studies: (1) all human beings know God as a result of God's revelation of himself to us through nature, but (2) instead of allowing that revelation to lead us to God, we repress the revelation and instead set up false gods of our own imaginations to take the true God's place. The reason, as we have also seen, is that (3) we do not like the God to which this natural revelation leads us.

2. Isn't the Bible full of contradictions? This is an excuse we also often hear, but it is as unsubstantial as the first one. We are told that as the data from science has come in, so many errors have been found in the Bible that no rational person could possibly believe that it is God's true revelation. It follows that at best the Bible is a collection of insightful human writings, so no one can intelligently buy into Christianity on the basis of the biblical "revelation."

The problem with this argument is its premise. It assumes that the accumulation of historical and scientific facts has uncovered an increasing number of textual and other problems, but actually the opposite is the case. As the data has come in over the decades, particularly over the last few decades, the tendency is for the Bible to be vindicated. Time magazine recognized this in a cover story in the December 30, 1974, issue. The story was captioned "How True Is the Bible?" In this essay the magazine's editors examined the chief radical critics of the recent past—Albert Schweitzer, Rudolf Bultmann, Martin Dibelius, and others—but concluded:

The breadth, sophistication and diversity of all this biblical investigation are impressive, but it begs a question: Has it made the Bible more credible or less? Literalists who feel the ground move when a verse is challenged would have to say that credibility has suffered. Doubt has been sown, faith is in jeopardy. But believers who expect something else from the Bible may well conclude that its credibility has been enhanced. After more than two centuries of facing the heaviest scientific guns that could be brought to bear, the Bible has survived—and is perhaps the better for the siege.

Even on the critics' own terms—historical fact—the scriptures seem more acceptable now than they did when the rationalists began the attack.

It is hard to see how anyone can use the alleged "contradictions" in the Bible to justify a failure to seek out and worship the Bible's God, especially after he or she has investigated the evidence thoroughly.

3. If there is a God and the God who exists is a good God, why does he tolerate evil? The argument has two forms. One form is philosophical, asking how evil could have entered a world created and ruled by a benevolent God. The other is personal and practical, asking why things happen to me that I do not like or why God does not give me what I ask him for or do what I tell him in my prayers I want him to do.

The philosophical problem is difficult. If we ask how evil could originate in an originally perfect world, there is no one, so far as I know, who has ever answered that puzzle adequately. If God made all things good, including Adam and Eve, so that nothing within them naturally inclined toward evil in any way, then it is difficult (if not impossible) to see how Adam or Eve or any other perfect being could do evil. But I must point out that although Christians may not have an adequate explanation for the origin of evil (at least at this point in the history of theological thought), our difficulty here is at least only half as great as that of the unbeliever. For the unbeliever has the problem not only of explaining the origin of evil; he has the problem of explaining the origin of the good as well. In any case, our failure to understand how evil came about does not disprove its existence any more than it disproves the existence of God.

The second form of this problem is personal and practical. It is the form of the question that probably troubles most people: "Why does God tolerate evil, particularly in my life? Why do bad things happen to me? Why doesn't God answer my prayers as I would like?"

Part of the answer to this problem is that if we got what we deserved, we would be suffering not merely the evils we now know but rather those eternal torments that are to be the lot of the unregenerate in hell. In other words, instead of saying, "Why do bad things happen to me?" we should be saying, "Why do good things happen to me?" All we deserve is evil. If our life has any good in it, that good (however minimal) should point us to the God from whom all good comes. That we do not follow that leading, but instead complain about God's treatment, only increases our guilt. It shows us to be precisely what Paul declares we are in Romans 1:18: godless and wicked.

Let me illustrate how this works. After I had preached the sermon that is printed as chapter 16 of this volume ("The Psychology of Atheism"), I received an unsigned note in which someone objected to my comments about the natural man's hatred of God's sovereignty. He (or she) said, "Preach sermons to your congregation, not to the radio audience. Deal with the hard questions.
The difficulty is not that I am not sovereign but that the sovereignty of God does not seem good. When the answers to my prayers seem to make no sense, what then am I to think of God? Deal with that one."

The tone of this note was a bit insulting, as you can see. But the problem is not that it was insulting to me. The problem is that it was insulting to God. Moreover, it was itself a refutation of the point it was making. The questioner was saying that he or she had no difficulty with the concept of God's sovereignty, only with what God does—if God exists. But, of course, what is that if not a challenge to God's sovereignty? It is a way of saying, "God, I am not going to believe in you unless you come down from your lofty throne, stand here before little me and submit to my interrogation. I will not acknowledge you unless you explain yourself to me." Could anything be more arrogant than that? To demand that God justify his ways to us? Or even to think that we could understand him if he did? Job was not challenging God's sovereignty. He was only seeking understanding. But when God interrogated him, asking if he could explain how God created and sustains the universe, poor Job was reduced to near stammering. He said, "I despise myself and repent in dust and ashes" (Job 42:6).

It is interesting that the same week in which I got this note, demanding that God explain himself on our level before we believe on him, I got another letter that was quite different. This person described a particularly horrible week that he had just gone through. But then he said, "Seeing the situation in the light of God's sovereignty made it possible for me to ask forgiveness for my anger and open my eyes to what God wants me to see, namely, that my life will frequently be 'disordered,' but he will never let it get out of control." Do you see the difference?

Is it right to have questions about why God acts as he does? Of course! Who has not had them? It is right to believe and then seek understanding. But to use an inability to understand some things as an excuse for failing to respond to what we do know is that deliberate repression of the truth about which Paul was speaking in our text.

"I Didn't Think It Was Important"

The weakest excuse that anyone can muster is the statement that "I just didn't think it was important." That is obviously faulty—if God exists and we are all destined to meet him and give an account of our actions some day. Nothing can be as important as getting the most basic of our relationships right: the relationship of ourselves to God. And yet, for one reason or another— perhaps just because the press of life's many demands seems more important—we push this greatest of all issues aside.

How do you think that is going to sound when you appear before God at the last day?

"I didn't think it was important"?

"I didn't think you were important"?

"I didn't think my repression of the truth about you mattered"?

A little later on in Romans, Paul tells what is going to happen in that last day. Men and women are going to appear before God with their excuses, but when they do, says Paul, "Every mouth [will] be silenced and the whole world [will be] held accountable to God" (Rom. 3:20). Even in this day there are no valid excuses, as Paul declares in Romans 1:20. But in that day the excuses will not even be spoken, so obvious will it be that all human beings—from the smallest to the greatest—are guilty of godlessness.

Since today is not yet that final day, there is still time to turn from the arrogance that pits finite minds and sinful wills against God.

Do you remember Methuselah? He lived longer than any other man—969 years. His name means "When he is gone it shall come." "It" was the great flood of God's judgment. That flood destroyed the antediluvian world. But the reason I refer to Methuselah and his longevity is that he is a picture of God's great patience with those who sin against him. During the early years of Methuselah's life God sent a preacher named Enoch to turn the race from its sin. Enoch preached that judgment was coming: "See, the Lord is coming with thousands upon thousands of his holy ones to judge everyone, and to convict all the ungodly of all the ungodly acts they have done in the ungodly way, and of all the harsh words ungodly sinners have spoken against him" (Jude 1415). After Enoch died, Noah continued the preaching. For the entire lifetime of Methuselah, all 969 years, the flood did not come. God was gracious, "patient... not wanting anyone to perish, but everyone to come to repentance" (2 Peter 3:9). But, though patient, God was not indifferent to sin, and at last Methuselah died, and wrath did indeed come.

We live in a similar age today. Today is the day of God's grace. But wrath is gathering. We see it about us like the rising waters of the flood. Do not wait to be overtaken by it. Do not make excuses. Admit that you are "without excuse" in God's sight and quickly take refuge in the Savior.

Chapter 18.
Base Ingratitude

Romans 1:21

In many Bibles the twenty-first verse of Romans 1 begins a new paragraph, and rightly so. In the previous verses Paul has explained the fearful state of men and women as exposed to the wrath of Almighty God, and he has explained why this is our condition. We are objects of God's wrath because we have rejected the knowledge of God, which all persons possess as a result of God's extensive disclosure of himself in the works of nature. Now Paul is going to take that description of the human race further by showing the sad results for man of this rejection.

Yet the paragraphs are also tied together. This is because Paul does not immediately speak of the results of our rejection of God, which is his ultimate purpose. Instead he first cites two more things of which sinful men and women are guilty. This means that there are three failures in all, one of which we have already studied and two additional ones added here. First, we have suppressed the truth about God, being unwilling to come to God to whom the revelation in nature leads. (This is the sin studied in detail in the last chapter.) Second, we have refused to glorify (or worship) God. This is in spite of our genuine knowledge of him. Third, we have forgotten to be thankful To know God is to know ourselves as his creatures and thus to know that all we have and enjoy is from him. Yet, because we willingly block the knowledge of God from our minds, we thus obviously also refuse to glorify God as God and are ungrateful.

Ungrateful! John Milton spoke of "base ingratitude" (Comus, line 776). William Shakespeare wrote, "Blow, blow thou winter wind; thou art not so unkind as man's ingratitude" (As You Like It, Act 2, Scene 7). The Russian writer Fyodor Dostoyevsky said of man, "If he is not stupid, he is monstrously ungrateful! Phenomenally ungrateful. In fact, I believe that the best definition of man is the ungrateful biped."

No Praise, No Glory

There is a connection between these three human failures, however. So to understand the nature of our ingratitude to God, we need first to understand that we have not "gloried him as God," which is how Paul states it.

The word glory, from which the words glorify and glorification derive, is quite interesting. In the Greek language the original words are dokeo (the verb) and doxa (the noun), from which we get our word doxology. Originally the verb meant "to appear" or "to seem," and the noun that came from this then meant an "opinion." A person's opinion of someone or something is how that person or thing appears to the one observing it. From doxa we get our English words orthodox (which means a "straight or correct opinion"), heterodox (which means a "different or wrong opinion") and paradox (which means a "contrary or irreconcilable opinion"). At one time doxa and dokeo were concerned with either a good opinion or a bad opinion about someone. But eventually they came to refer to a good opinion only. At this point the noun came to mean the "praise" or "honor" due to one about whom such good opinions were held, and the verb referred to rendering an individual such honor. Kings possessed "glory" because they merited the praise of their subjects. The word is used in this sense in Psalm 24, which speaks of God as the King of glory: "Who is he, this King of glory? The LORD Almighty—he is the King of glory" (v. 10).

At this point it is easy to see the effect of using the word glory or glorify of God. Who can "glorify" God? Obviously, only one who has a right opinion about him, that is, one who knows and properly appreciates God's attributes. The one who knows God as sovereign, holy, omniscient, immutable, loving, merciful, and so on—and who praises the Almighty for these things—glorifies him.

And there is this, too: The English language has another entirely different word that means almost the same thing as "glory" and that might well have been used for it had not the French word gloire superseded it in everyday speech. This is the Anglo-Saxon word worth, which also refers to a person's intrinsic merit or character. Man's worth is man's character. God's worth is God's glory. Now, using this term, what happens when you acknowledge God's character as he himself reveals it? Well, you acknowledge his "worth-ship," or, as we say, you "worship" him. "Worth-ship" is hard for us to say. So either we shorten it and speak of "worshiping" God, or we abandon the Anglo-Saxon term and switch to the Latin word and speak of "glorifying" God instead.

The point I am making is that each of these three ideas is the same. Linguistically, the worship of God, the praise of God, and the giving of glory to God are identical.

Of course, this is precisely what Paul says the human race has not done. Moreover, its failure to worship or glorify God follows naturally from its willful suppression of the truth about God, which God has revealed to us in nature. We have already seen that we reject the things God has revealed because we do not like the God to which the truth about God leads us. We do not like him for his sovereignty; God's sovereignty negates our autonomy. We do not like him for his holiness; God's holiness opposes and condemns our sin. We do not like him for his omniscience; his omniscience terrifies us because we fear exposure. We do not like God for his immutability, because immutability means that God will never be other than he is in all his other attributes. We cannot stand these truths. So we repress them, denying their existence. It is obvious that if we do this, we are not going to praise God for these same characteristics.

On the contrary, we do what the Jews did when they had been brought out of Egypt but had rebelled against God by making the golden calf. We take the attributes that belong to God only and ascribe them to idols, saying, "These are your gods, O Israel, who brought you up out of Egypt" (Exod. 32:8). We are going to examine how we do that in greater detail as we study the latter half of Romans 1.

Not Thankful

There are times in my study of the major Bible commentators when I am seriously disappointed, and this is one of them. For the third great failure for which Paul cites the human race is ingratitude—"nor gave thanks," he says—and yet this important idea receives very little treatment by these commentators. Haldane, great in nearly all respects as a commentator, gives just nine lines to this matter. Godet has five lines. Even John Calvin says only, "It is not without reason that Paul adds that neither gave they thanks, for there is no one who is not indebted to God's infinite kindnesses, and even on this account alone he has abundantly put us in his debt by condescending to reveal himself to us."

In working on this idea I was therefore pleased to discover that in his book on "doubt," entitled In Two Minds, the British writer Os Guinness (now living in America) devotes an entire chapter to ingratitude, viewing it rightly, I believe, as a major cause for doubt and thus as a step away from faith toward failure.

Guinness's thesis is that doubt is not unbelief but rather a middle place between faith and unbelief, hence his title. But that middle position is an unstable one. If we are doubting, we will not merely doubt for long. Either we will move from doubt in the direction of a stronger faith, or we will move from doubt in the direction of unbelief. And whether we do one or the other depends on how we deal with what causes us to be unsettled. Guinness sees the causes of our unsettling as: ingratitude, a faulty view of God, weak foundations, lack of commitment, lack of growth, unruly emotions, and fearing to believe. He calls them "seven families of doubt." Ingratitude is the cause of doubt he starts with.

Why is ingratitude so dangerous? Because it is based upon a willful unawareness of the most basic facts about God and upon our lack of a proper relationship to him. In other words, it is because of the very problem about which Paul is teaching.

Romans 1:18-20 teaches that the existence of God is abundantly disclosed in nature. This means, of course, not merely that God exists but also that all we are, see, and have has been brought into being by him. He is the Creator of everything. So if we have life, it is from God. If we have health, it is from God. The food we eat, the clothes we wear, the friends we share—everything good is from God. If we fail to be grateful for this, it is because we are not really acknowledging him or are rejecting a proper relationship to him. Someone may say, "But we sometimes experience bad things, too. We suffer pain and hunger. We get sick. Eventually we die." But even here we show our ingratitude. For we deny the fact that if we got what we deserve, we would all be in hell, sinners that we are. Our very existence, as sinners, should cause us to praise God not only for his sovereignty, holiness, omniscience, and all the other attributes I have mentioned, but for his abundant mercy, too. But we are not conscious of this. So we erect a great mass of ingratitude upon our earlier sins of suppressing the truth and refusing God worship.

Guinness refers to Romans 1:21 as a sober reminder that "rebellion against God does not begin with the clenched fist of atheism but with the self-satisfied heart of the one for whom 'thank you' is redundant."

Martyn Lloyd-Jones, who spends a little more time on ingratitude than the other commentators, writes:

Man does not thank God for his mercy, for his goodness, for his dealings with us in providence. We take the sunshine for granted; we are annoyed if we do not get it. We take the rain for granted. How often do we thank God for all these gifts and blessings!... God is "the giver of every good and perfect gift"; he is "the Father of mercies." Yet people go through the whole of their lives in this world and they never thank him; they ignore him completely. That is how they show their attitude toward God. In this way they suppress the truth that has been revealed concerning [him].

Remember and Give Thanks

Guinness's chapter on ingratitude makes another important contribution, and that is its emphasis on the biblical theme of "remembering to give thanks." This has "tremendous emphasis," he says. "The man or woman of faith is the one who gives thanks. Unbelief, on the other hand, has a short and ungrateful memory."

When the people of Israel left Egypt to travel to the Promised Land, they were the recipients of many great blessings. They had been delivered from slavery, protected from Pharaoh's pursuing armies, provided with water to drink and manna to eat, and they were given guidance in the form of the great cloud that covered them by day to protect them from the sun's fierce heat and turned into a pillar of fire by night to provide both light and warmth. If ever a people should have been fervently grateful to God, it was this people. Yet they were not grateful. They had asked for freedom. But when they received it and found that it was not precisely to their liking, they wanted to lynch Moses, turn around, and go back to Egypt. When they were given manna, they cried out for a different diet. No matter what God did, there was always something else they wanted.

Moses knew where such ingratitude would lead. He knew they would be made rebellious by ingratitude. So this great leader constantly reminded the Jewish people of their past, of God's blessings to them, and of their need to be thankful. After they had been delivered from Pharaoh's pursuing armies, Moses composed a song that said:

I will sing to the LORD, for he is highly exalted.
The horse and its rider he has hurled into the sea.
The LORD is my strength and my song; he has become my salvation.
He is my God, and I will praise him, my father's God, and I will exalt him....

Who among the gods is like you, O LORD? Who is like you— majestic in holiness, awesome in glory, working wonders?

Exodus 15:1-2, 11

Moses wanted Israel to remember God's past blessings. Later when God gave the Ten Commandments and other portions of the law, Moses said, "Be careful that you do not forget the LORD, who brought you out of Egypt, out of the land of slavery" (Deut. 6:12).

David, too, was strong on the need to be thankful, and he wrote much about it. After the ark of the covenant had been brought back to Jerusalem, David wrote a psalm beginning: "Give thanks to the LORD, call on his name; make known among the nations what he has done" (1 Chron. 16:8; cf. Ps. 105:1). David also said, "I will give you thanks in the great assembly; among throngs of people I will praise you" (Ps. 35:18). In the same way, Psalms 106, 107, 118, and 136 begin with thanksgiving: "Give thanks to the LORD, for he is good; his love endures forever." Psalm 100, titled "A Psalm. For giving thanks," says:

Shout for joy to the LORD, all the earth. Worship the LORD with gladness; come before him with joyful songs.
Know that the LORD is God.
It is he who made us, and we are his; we are his people, the sheep of his pasture.
Enter his gates with thanksgiving and his courts with praise; give thanks to him and praise his name.
For the LORD is good and his love endures forever; his faithfulness continues through all generations.

What was true for those living in the time of the Old Testament is true also for those living in New Testament times. When Jesus healed the ten lepers, only one of them came back, after showing himself to the priests, and thanked Jesus. Jesus asked, "Were not all ten cleansed? Where are the other nine? Was no one found to return and give praise to God except this foreigner?" (Luke 17:17-18). Jesus seemed to be bothered by the others' ingratitude. Similarly, Paul emphasized thanksgiving in his commands to the Philippians about prayer, saying, "Do not be anxious about anything, but in everything, by prayer and petition, with thanksgiving, present your requests to God. And the peace of God, which transcends all understanding, will guard your hearts and your minds in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4:6-7, italics mine). Paul was concerned that in making new requests of God (which is proper) we nevertheless remember to thank him for what we have already received.

The point I am making is that thankfulness is a mark of those who truly know God—even though we sometimes forget to be thankful. Ingratitude, by contrast, is the mark of those who repress the truth about him.

Are We Thankful?

Although this section is a study of the psychology and acts of those who are in rebellion against God—the focus of Romans 1:18-32—all of it clearly has bearing on those who profess to know God. There are two pertinent questions: Are we who know God thankful? and Do we express our thanks verbally?

It is interesting to note that in many of the world's languages "giving thanks" is the basic meaning of at least one word for prayer. A very important Greek word for prayer is eucharisteo, from which is derived the liturgical word Eucharist. The Eucharist is the Lord's Supper, and it refers to that aspect of the communion service that involves thanksgiving to God for Christ's atoning death. Eucharisteō means "to give thanks." One of the most important Latin words for prayer is gratia, from which we have derived the French and English words grace. It has two meanings. On the one hand, it means God's "unmerited favor." That is the most common meaning of the word in English. It is the meaning in the hymn "Amazing Grace." But gratia also means "thanksgiving," the meaning we retain when we speak of saying "grace" before a meal.

Isn't it interesting that so many of these words for prayer mean thanksgiving? Isn't it significant that the chief element in the opening of the heart of man to God in prayer should be gratitude?

Yet how little this is actually the case! We pray, but our prayers are often only versions of "God bless me and my wife, my son John and his wife, us four and no more. Amen."

Or they are strings of requests: "Give me this, give me that; do it quickly, and that's that."

Our prayers should follow the order of that little prayer acrostic ACTS: Adoration, Confession, Thanksgiving, and (only then) Supplication. We should ask for things only after we have already thanked God for what he has given.

What a difference it would make if we would all actually learn to glorify and worship God and be thankful! I think Reuben A. Torrey wrote wisely when he said:

Returning thanks for blessings already received increases our faith and enables us to approach God with new boldness and new assurance. Doubtless the reason so many have so little faith when they pray is because they take so little time to meditate upon and thank God for blessings already received. As one meditates upon the answers to prayers already granted, faith waxes bolder and bolder, and we come to feel in the very depths of our souls that there is nothing too hard for the Lord.

This is what Os Guinness is saying, too! Doubt is the middle position between faith and unbelief. But if we learn to thank God for who he is and for his many blessings, we inevitably move from doubt to faith, rather than from doubt to even greater rebellion.

Chapter 19.
Fools!

Romans 1:21-23

I have often spoken of the rebellion of the first man and woman against God, pointing out that, although the woman was deceived by Satan, having been led to think that her disobedience would result in good both for herself and her husband, the man was not deceived and therefore knew what he was doing. Adam deliberately set his face against God. He said in effect, "As long as that tree is in the middle of the garden of Eden and I am not able to eat of it, I feel demeaned as a human being. I am not autonomous. So I am going to eat of it and die, whatever that may be." Because he understood what he was doing, Adam's sin was greater than Eve's.

Yet there was a measure of "deception" in Adam's case also—deliberate deception. For how else can we explain what Adam did? Adam was no ignoramus. He knew that he was rebelling against God and that he was rejecting the truth about himself and the world, which God had revealed. What did Adam think he was going to put in the place of God and God's truth? In place of God, he wanted to put himself! That much is obvious. In place of the truth, he no doubt wanted to put a "truth" of his own making!

This is what Satan had actually offered Eve earlier. When she replied to the serpent—the great deceiver—about the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, saying that she and her husband were not to eat of it or touch it lest they die, Satan had declared, "You will not surely die.... For God knows that when you eat of it your eyes will be opened, and you will be like God, knowing good and evil" (Gen. 3:4-5). Ah, "like God!" That was what Eve and Adam wanted to become. God is the sovereign God, and one aspect of his sovereignty is that he makes the rules. Adam wanted to make his own rules. He wanted to say what was to be true and what was to be false. And yet, in rebelling against God, he became anything but sovereign or wise. He became the opposite, losing what strength and wisdom he had. Instead of becoming more like God, which Satan had promised the woman, Adam became like Satan. Instead of rewriting the truth so that it would better suit his own warped desires, Adam began a process in which he and the human race after him turned from the truth of God to lies.

Substitution and Moral Foolishness

What happened to Adam back in the earliest moments of earth's history is what Paul declares in Romans 1 to be true now of every human being. Our study of Romans 1:18-21 has shown what human beings have done in terms of their relationships to God. They have (1) suppressed the truth about God; (2) refused to glorify, or worship, God; and (3) neglected to be thankful. Because of the first and perhaps also because of the second and third of these transgressions, the wrath of God has already begun to come upon them.

But the problem not only involves people's relationships to God. It also involves what happens to them as a secondary result of their breaking of the ties that should exist between this holy and loving Creator and his rational creatures. When Adam rebelled against God it was not only his relationship to God that was broken. His relationship to Eve was broken also, and this, too, was to affect the history of mankind. Adam acted the fool, and he became one. So also with the race as a whole. Thus, having spoken of that cosmic rebellion by which the human race has set its face against God, Paul goes on to declare, "For although they knew God, they neither glorified him as God nor gave thanks to him, but their thinking became futile and their foolish hearts were darkened. Although they claimed to be wise, they became fools and exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images made to look like mortal man and birds and animals and reptiles" (vv. 21-23). According to these words, the first result of man's rebellion against God, so far as he himself is concerned, is that he became a fool. His heart was darkened.

The words in this paragraph are wonderfully expressive and deserve careful attention. I start with three that are related.

1. Dialogismois. This is the word translated "thinking" in the New International Version, "imaginations" in the King James Version, and "argumentations" in J. B. Phillips's paraphrase. It refers to the working of the human mind apart from revelation. We have it in our word dialogue. The point is that, having rejected the truth about God that God has revealed to all human beings in nature (and later through Jesus Christ and the Bible), human beings have been left to their own mental devices, which are, however, inadequate for working out or discovering reality. We will not have God. So, having rejected God, we can use our minds only to rearrange error.

2. Sophoi. This word is translated "wise" in most Bible versions, but its force comes from its use in words like sophistry, sophisticated, sophomore, philosophy, philosopher, and philosophical. A philosopher is one who loves wisdom. A sophisticate thinks himself to be very worldly-wise. This is what those who have rejected the truth about God imagine themselves to have become. It is what Adam imagined he had become. In ourselves we think that we are all very intelligent and sophisticated individuals.

Let me quote D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones on this point:

Instead of accepting revelation they became philosophers. And what is a philosopher? A philosopher is a man who claims that he starts by being skeptical about everything, that he is an agnostic. "I am going to have the data," he says, "and then I am going to apply my mind to it. I am going to reason it out and I am going to work it out." And that is exactly what such men have done; they became foolish and wicked in their reasonings, in their thoughts, in their own conjectures and speculations and surmisings. And what is the cause of it all? Paul uses the word "vain" and it means not only foolish, but it means wicked as well.... The cause of the whole trouble was wickedness, and it is still wickedness.

Paul's point is that such persons are not being honest with the data they claim to be treating, and the reason they are not honest with the data is that they do not like the direction to which the data points them. Therefore, instead of using their minds to recognize and pursue the truth, they use them to provide philosophical justifications for their actions.

3. Emōranthēsan. This is a long Greek word, but it is derived from a very simple root found within it: mōros, which means "fool." It is used in the sentence, "Although they claimed to be wise, they became fools" (v. 22).

What kind of fools? Well, in the Greek language, "fool" does not mean merely to be guilty of intellectual folly, though it includes this error, but to be guilty of moral folly or wickedness as well. That is why in the Bible it is so often connected with a denial of the existence of God, as in Psalm 14:1 ("The fool says in his heart, 'There is no God'"). It is why it is such a reprehensible term (cf. Matt. 5:22). If "fool" referred only to a deficiency of intellect, it could hardly be a bad thing, at least in terms of our relationship to God. None of us can ever know God fully; he is infinitely above us. But if the word includes a moral or ethical element, as it does, then it is truly bad, for it refers to our willful rejection of whatever truth about God we are capable of receiving.

This compounds our guilt, for it adds the sin of hypocrisy to the prior sin of rebellion. We have rebelled against God by rejecting the knowledge about himself that he has revealed to us. In addition to that, while willfully scorning the truth, we make exalted but ridiculous claims to great wisdom.

The Downward Sliding Path

Beginning in verse 24, Paul is going to show that turning away from God launched the race upon a downward path, leading inevitably to great moral depravity. We are going to look at that aspect of the slide of the human race in detail when we come to those verses. But even here it is important to see that what is involved is a falling away from a high level of truth, received by revelation, and not an upward climb to it.

It is important to see this, because the world believes exactly the opposite. It tries to teach that the path of the race has been consistently upward from its original "animal" beginnings and that our present world religions or philosophies are a step upward from whatever religious sensibilities went before them. We have been taught that primitive ages of the race were marked by animism and that animism progressed upward to polytheism, which in turn produced monotheism.

But this is not the way it happened. Some years ago a student of comparative religions named Robert Brow published a book entitled Religion: Origins and Ideas in which he argued correctly that this popular theory of evolutionary religious development simply does not fit the facts. On the contrary, he argued, the work of anthropologists suggests that the original form of religion was monotheism and that the polytheistic or animistic religions we see today among certain "primitive" peoples are actually a falling away from that much higher standard. Brow wrote, "Research suggests that the tribes are not animistic because they have continued unchanged since the dawn of history. Rather, the evidence indicates degeneration from a true knowledge of God."

In his reconstruction Brow argues that an early knowledge of the true God came first, accompanied by animal sacrifices that were a way of acknowledging that the worshiper had offended God and needed to make atonement for his or her offenses. In time polytheism entered, providing a pantheon of gods and goddesses who were worshiped not because they were imagined to be higher or greater than the original true God but because they were lesser and therefore less to be feared. At this point priests emerged to take over the functions of sacrifice, and the religions degenerated even further. So it has continued. According to Brow, the so-called primitive tribesman is actually closer to the truth of religion than our civilized and sophisticated contemporaries.

If this is true, as the Bible also declares it to be, then our pretension to progress in religion is only another sharp example of our great wickedness and inordinate folly. Claiming to be wise, we have become fools. For what could be more foolish than to have "exchanged the glory of the immortal God" for gods of our own devising?

Trauma, Repression, Substitution

In the midst of these important verses, Paul introduces another word that is extremely significant for understanding the nature of nonbiblical religions and the human psychology that has produced them. This is the word exchanged. It occurs in the verses we are studying, where Paul says, "... [they] exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images made to look like mortal man and birds and animals and reptiles" (v. 23). Two verses further on it occurs again: "They exchanged the truth of God for a lie, and worshiped and served created things rather than the Creator—who is forever praised. Amen" (v. 25).

This word explains why the human race has been so determined to invent religions to replace worship of the one true God. It explains it by a term we in our day are particularly well equipped to understand.

In psychology there is a recognized sequence of common human experiences known as trauma, repression, and substitution. Here is an example of the way these concepts are used: Suppose that a certain man is having difficulty concentrating on his work and that he cannot sleep at night. Not knowing what is wrong, he goes to a psychiatrist for help. "I can't seem to concentrate," he says. "I like my job. I am not particularly pressured by it. But I am not doing well, and at night I can't sleep. Something is wrong. I don't know what it is. Can you help me?" The psychiatrist says he will try. So he asks the man to tell something about himself. When was the first time he noticed being unable to concentrate? What was his life like at that time? How was his relationship with his wife? How was his relationship with his children? How have things been at home? Did anything happen at that time that might have upset him?

Suppose that during these exploratory sessions, the psychiatrist notices that every time he mentions the house in which this man lives, the man's brow furrows and his answers to the therapist's questions get shorter. This happens a number of times, and eventually the psychiatrist, who is trained to observe such things, asks, "Did anything bad ever happen to your home? Do you have any bad memories about it?"

The man furrows his brow again and says, "No." "Are you sure there isn't something bothering you about it?" The man assures the doctor that there is nothing. Nevertheless, as the doctor probes this area he discovers that about the time the man began to have trouble with his job, his house was burglarized one evening, and both he and his wife were threatened by the burglar. Suppose in addition that the psychiatrist discovers that the robber was never caught, that the man has installed the most sophisticated burglary devices, and that he is constantly calling home. When these facts emerge it is not hard for the psychiatrist to explain what has happened. The robbery and the threat to his wife were so traumatic to this man that ever since he has been worried that another robbery (or something worse) might occur. The man has not admitted these fears to himself. In fact, he has repressed the experience, perhaps because he thinks he is not supposed to show such unmanly emotions as fear. But the trauma is with him, and his inability to concentrate at work is one evidence that the problem has never been dealt with adequately. To do so the psychiatrist will get the man to talk about his experience, face up to his fears and try to work with them.

What the man has experienced are the three stages of trauma, repression, and substitution, which I mentioned earlier. The robbery was so traumatic that the man repressed his memories of it. But the trauma did not go away. The memory of the event was only repressed. So a set of unnatural behavioral patterns emerged to fill the void.

This is precisely what Paul says has happened to the human race. Because of our primitive break with God in Adam and the resulting sinful state in which we live, whenever we experience the revelation of God in nature (or in Jesus Christ, the Bible, Christian preaching, or whatever), we find echoes of the original trauma emerging and inevitably attempt to repress them. But we cannot erase the trauma, and an act of substitution takes place by which we become "religious," creating substitutionary deities to take the true God's place.

This is the explanation of the universality of religion on this planet. The fact that people are religious does not prove that we are all seeking God. It proves the contrary. It proves that we are all running away from God. Although we are unwilling to know God and do not want him, we are nevertheless unable to do without him and try to fill the void with our substitute gods.

R. C. Sproul has dealt with this very well in the book I referred to earlier: If There Is a God, Why Are There Atheists? He puts it like this:

In the case of God's revelation, man encounters something ominously threatening which is traumatic. The memory of conscious knowledge of the trauma is not maintained in its lucid threatening state but is repressed. It is "put down" or "held in captivity" in the unconsciousness.

That which is repressed is not destroyed. The memory remains though it may be buried in the subconscious realm. Knowledge of God is unacceptable to man and as a result man does his best to blot it out or at least camouflage it in such a way that its threatening character can be concealed or dulled. That the human psyche is capable of such repression has been thoroughly demonstrated in a multitude of ways. The critical factor, however,... is that the knowledge is not obliterated or destroyed. It remains intact though deeply submerged in the unconscious.

In the substitution-exchange process, the repressed knowledge manifests itself outwardly in a disguised or veiled form. The original knowledge is threatening; its disguised form is much less threatening.... In theological terms, what results from the repression is the profession of atheism either in militant terms, or its less militant form of agnosticism, or a kind of religion that makes God less of a threat than he really is. Either option, atheism or religion, manifests an exchange of the truth for a lie.

From Darkness to Light

There is one more word that we need to look at before bringing this chapter to a close, and that is the word darkness. It occurs in verse 21: "For although they knew God, they neither glorified him as God nor gave thanks to him, but their thinking became futile and their foolish hearts were darkened." Darkness is an image, of course. It is the equivalent of Paul's saying that "their thinking became futile" or "they became fools" or "exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images made to look like mortal man and birds and animals and reptiles."

When men and women turn away from God, they do not admit this, of course. Instead, they speak of "bright new ideas," "enlightenment" or "seeing the light." One whole movement in philosophy in Europe a century or so ago was called the Enlightenment. But, since God is the sole source of light, any ideas of enlightenment apart from him that we may think we have are an illusion. And what we need is the revelation and power of God to bring us back from selfinflicted darkness into God's light.

That is what has happened to Christians. We do not have any ability to rediscover the light of God by ourselves. Before God worked in us we were as much in the dark as anybody. Paul writes in Ephesians of what we were like in our unsaved state, much as he writes of the heathen in Romans: "They [the unsaved] are darkened in their understanding and separated from the life of God because of the ignorance that is in them due to the hardening of their hearts" (Eph. 4:18). However, as the result of God's illuminating work, "... you were once darkness, but now you are light in the Lord" (Eph. 5:8). To return to our illustration from psychiatry, in the case of Christians God has uncovered for us the cause of our great spiritual trauma. He has dealt with our rejection of his revelation (as well as with all our other sins) in Christ, making that known to us. Then he has brought us back into harmony with himself so that we no longer need fear him or run away from him but rather bask in his light.

We are also to live by his light. For in the passage from Ephesians cited above, Paul goes on to say, "Live as children of light (for the fruit of the light consists in all goodness, righteousness and truth) and find out what pleases the Lord" (Eph. 5:8-10). If we are of the light, we must live by the light. If we know God, we must show it by being like him.

Chapter 20.
God Gave Them Up

Romans 1:24-28

I do not know whether Oscar Wilde was reflecting more on the divine nature or human nature in saying, "When the gods wish to punish us they answer our prayers." But, according to the Book of Romans, he may well have been doing both, and have been correct in both instances.

Thus far in our study of Romans we have been concentrating on human rebellion against God, and we have seen—indeed, Paul has explicitly told us—that the wrath of God "is being revealed from heaven" against men and women because of this rebellion. In what way is God showing wrath? It is clear what we have done. We have (1) suppressed the truth about God; (2) refused to glorify, or worship, God as God; and (3) declined to be thankful. As a result human beings have become "darkened" in their thinking. We have become fools. Nevertheless, up to this point we have not been told specifically of anything that God has actually done to unleash his wrath upon humanity. Now this changes. For the first time in the letter we are told—three times in succession—that God has abandoned men and women to perversion. The sentence says, "God gave them over." It is found in verses 24, 26, and 28.

But here is the irony. And here is why I quoted Oscar Wilde. Man's punishment is to be abandoned by God. But, of course, this is precisely what man has been fighting for ever since Adam's first rebellion in the Garden of Eden. Man has wanted to get rid of God, to push him out of his life. In contemporary terms he is saying, "God, I just want you to leave me alone. Take a seat on that chair over there. Shut up, and let me get on with my life as I want to live it." And so God does!

Like the father of the Prodigal Son, he releases the rebellious child, permitting him to depart with all his many possessions and goods for the far country.

Adrift in God's Universe

Well! Isn't that what we want? Yes, it is what we think we want. But the problem is that it doesn't turn out as we anticipate. In fact, it turns out exactly the reverse. We think of God as a miser of happiness, keeping back from us all that would make us happy. We think that by running away from him we will be happy, wild, and free. But it doesn't work that way. Instead of happiness we find misery. Instead of freedom we find the debilitating bondage of sin.

Many who have studied the Bible for a long time know the phrase I have quoted in the King James wording, but this is a case in which the modern translations do better in capturing the meaning for our day. The King James Version of the Bible used the words "God gave them up" at this point. The King James translators knew what they meant, of course. They meant a judicial abandonment of the human race to the consequences of its rebellion. But, unfortunately, for most of us today those words sound like a simple hands-off policy in which men and women really are freed up to pursue and practice whatever they think will please them. That is not quite the idea. "God gave them up" sounds as if God simply let people drift off to nowhere, like releasing a porcelain pitcher in space. The actual idea is seen much better in the New International Version. For it is not that God gives the human race up to nothing, but rather that he gives it over to the consequences of the rebellious, sinful directions it has taken.

It is like releasing the porcelain pitcher on earth rather than in space. When you let go of the pitcher it does not drift off into nowhere. You release it from your hand to the law of gravity, and when you do that it falls downward and breaks—if the fall is far enough and the ground hard.

The reason for this is in the very nature of things, and in the fact that what they are can never be otherwise. We need to see this. If you or I were God, then we could get away with the kind of rebellion or sin without consequences that we seem to want. We could make the universe run the way we want it. But we cannot do that. The universe with all its laws, physical and moral, is a given—because God is a given. Since God can never be other than he is, the universe will always be as it is. And this means that when you and I rebel against God, we must by the very nature of the case do it on God's terms and according to God's laws rather than our own. When we run away from God we think our way will be uphill, because we want it to be so. But the way is actually downhill. We are pulled down by the law of moral gravity—when God lets go. The Downhill Slope

What happens is illustrated in the case of Jonah, the prophet who tried to run away from God. He rejected God's call for him to go and preach to Nineveh and instead set off for Tarshish at the far end of the Mediterranean. But he didn't get where he was going, and his path was constantly downhill until God turned him around and got him going to Nineveh. In the King James Bible, which makes this point a bit neater than the New International Version, we are told four times over that the prophet's path was downhill. We read that he went "down to Joppa" and that when he found a ship bound for Tarshish he went "down into it" (Jonah 1:3). Then we are told that he had gone "down into the sides of the ship" (v. 5). Still later, after he had been cast overboard, he recounted the experience, saying, "I went down to the bottoms of the mountains" (Jonah 2:6).

(The italics are mine.)

Down! Down! Down! Down! It is a sad life history, but it is the experience of all who run from God, and Paul says all men and women do run from God, trying to rearrange the universe to fit their own desires.

In Romans, Paul marks this downward lemming-like rush of the human race in three stages.

1. "Therefore God gave them over in the sinful desires of their hearts to sexual impurity for the degrading of their bodies with one another" (v. 24). I do not know why, when he set out to trace this downward moral path of human beings, the apostle Paul concentrated on sexual sins, since he could clearly have chosen other sins as well. Perhaps it is because sexual sins are so visible (sins of the spirit are harder to detect) or because the damage in this area is so evident or because this was the obvious, stinking cesspool of corruption in his day and, therefore, something those to whom he was writing would clearly understand. Whatever the reason—and there may be even more reasons than these—it is an excellent example.

Sex is a wonderful gift, a gift imparted to the human race by God. It is a gift to be enjoyed. But it is be enjoyed within the bonds of marriage, not outside of marriage and, above all, not in casual entanglements. If it is, the result is always what Paul declares it will be, namely, "impurity" and the "degrading" of one's body.

It is evident that hardly anything in Romans 1 is more contemporary so far as our own culture is concerned. Today we are witnessing a frantic pursuit of pleasure that has been called rightly, even by the secular media, "the new hedonism." That is, ours is seemingly a culture in which casual sex and every other kind of casual pleasure is an ideal. And it is an ideal that has been actualized by many! With what results? At the start of this path the Prodigal Son would no doubt extol it for its freedoms. He would speak of being free to think new thoughts, have new experiences, and shake off all that old inhibiting sense of guilt that bound him previously. But, given time, the feeling changes, and the one who is running away comes inevitably to feel used, taken advantage of, dirty, and betrayed.

Not long ago CBS television ran an hour-long special on the freewheeling lifestyle in California, interviewing particularly many women who had been caught up in it. Interestingly, their nearly universal opinion was that they had been betrayed by the sexual revolution. As one woman said, "All men want from us is our bodies; we have had enough of that to last a lifetime."

Isn't it the case that these women were expressing precisely what Paul says in verse 25, when he observes that those who act this way "have exchanged the truth of God for a lie"? Let's say it clearly, as the world is beginning to recognize: The "new hedonism" and the "sexual revolution" are a deception!

But there is more. There is a second downhill step on this path....

2. "Because of this, God gave them over to shameful lusts. Even their women exchanged natural relations for unnatural ones. In the same way the men also abandoned natural relations with women and were inflamed with lust for one another. Men committed indecent acts with other men, and received in themselves the due penalty for their perversion" (vv. 26-27).

I wrote a moment ago that there is nothing more contemporary in terms of today's culture than Paul's description of a declining society in this great first chapter of Romans. This has been clear already in terms of today's forms of hedonism and the sexual revolution. Unfortunately, the decline becomes even more apparent as Paul, with almost shocking candor, begins to talk about sexual perversions, namely, lesbianism and male homosexuality. For centuries these matters were hardly spoken of in western society. Although some were no doubt practicing these acts, they were considered so reprehensible that a moral person not only was not to speak about them, but he or she was not even to know what such vices involved. But today? Today they are written about with explicit detail in virtually every newspaper and magazine in our land. Grade-school children discuss them. Not only are we not shocked—but we have become complacent, as if this were a natural expression of an upright spirit.

"Natural" is the important word here—Paul uses it in verse 27, and the opposite term,
"unnatural," in verse 26—because it explains why this stage is a further step along the downward moral path.

Let me elaborate on that statement. Fornication and adultery (which are in view in verse 24) are not "unnatural" sins, for they are not against nature. Of course, they are true sins, for they break the moral law of God. They result in "impurity" and in the "degrading" of our bodies, as Paul says. But they are not unnatural. On the contrary, they are in one sense quite natural. They are accomplished by using one's body in a natural way. Not so with homosexuality! Homosexuality is "unnatural," and it is accomplished by using one's body in an unnatural way, that is, against nature. In the first case, we may well need the Bible to tell us that fornication is wrong. The popular song asks, "How can it be wrong when it seems so right?" But in the case of homosexuality we do not even need this special revelation. A look at one's sexual apparatus should convince anyone that practices of this kind are not normal. They were not meant to be.

Perhaps this is why at this point, and at no other point in his discussion of the results of our rebellion, Paul speaks of a specific judgment of God upon the sin itself: "Men committed indecent acts with other men, and received in themselves the due penalty for their perversion" (v. 27). Up to this point Paul has not been saying that God punishes these or other particular sins with particular penalties, but rather that the abandonment of human beings to the committing of the sin is itself the punishment. That is, God punishes you by letting you do what you want. But not here, at least not only that. Here Paul speaks of a particular penalty "received in themselves" by those who sin in this way.

Is Paul speaking of AIDS (acquired immunodeficiency syndrome)? No! He had never heard of AIDS, though he was probably thinking at least in part of other sexual diseases. But the point is irrelevant. What Paul is saying is that sin does and will have consequences, and "unnatural" sins will have particularly "unnatural" consequences.

Indeed, it is not only Paul who would say this. Not long ago Time magazine ran a cover story on AIDS, called "The Big Chill: Fear of AIDS," in which even this obviously secular magazine spoke religiously. It spoke of AIDS as "a vague sort of retribution, an Old Testament-style revenge." It quoted novelist Erica Jong, author of Fear of Flying and a former high priestess of sexual abandon, as saying, "It's hard enough to find attractive single men without having to quiz them on their history of bisexuality and drug use, demand blood test results and thrust condoms into their hands. Wouldn't it be easier to give up sex altogether and join some religious order?" Time also quoted a Los Angeles entertainment writer: "AIDS pushes monogamy right back up there on the priority list."

Why is this? Why are even secular magazines and newspapers beginning to sound like prophets? It is because of the given, because of the unchangeable physical and moral character of the universe in which we live. We may not like it; most of us don't. We would change it if we could. But we cannot. It is God's universe. It does not change. Therefore, the only wise thing is to come to terms with it, repent of sin, and come back to God in the way he has provided: through faith in the sacrifice of himself for us by Jesus Christ.

Yet there is something more...

3. "Furthermore, since they did not think it worthwhile to retain the knowledge of God, he gave them over to a depraved mind, to do what ought not to be done" (v. 28). The first time I began to think about this threefold repetition of the sentence "God gave them over" in this section of Romans, it seemed to me that at this point something was apparently wrong with the order. Paul is tracing a downward declining path, resulting from humanity's rebellion against God, yet here the order doesn't seem to be downward. We can understand that when men and women abandoned God, God abandoned them: first, to sexual impurity and, second, to sexual perversions. That is surely downhill. But now we find that God abandons them "to a depraved mind." Isn't that something that should have come first? Doesn't sin originate in the mind? Shouldn't the third of these consequences have been listed first, before the other two consequences?

I was puzzled by this sequence until I realized that the "depraved mind" about which Paul is writing is not just any sinful mind—he has earlier talked about the generally foolish minds and generally darkened hearts of human beings—but about the specifically "depraved mind" created by continuing down this awful path for a lifetime. At the end is a mind not merely foolish or in error, but totally depraved. It is a mind so depraved that it begins to think that what is bad is actually good and that what is good is actually bad. May I say it? It is the mind of the devil, which is what Adam chose to pursue when he followed the dangling carrot: "You will be like God, knowing good and evil" (Gen. 3:5). Adam did not become "like God," knowing good and evil; he became "like Satan." And, being like Satan, in time he came to call the good bad and the bad good. How else can one explain man's continual flight from him from whom alone all good gifts come (cf. James 1:17)?

The evidence of this bottom stage of depravity is disclosed in verse 32, the end of Romans 1: "Although they know God's righteous decree that those who do such things deserve death, they not only continue to do these very things but also approve of those who practice them." The new word here is "approve." It is not only that people do what is sinful. A person might do that, be ashamed of his or her action, and then repent of it. But here, at the very end of this awful downhill path of judicial abandonment described in this chapter of Romans, the individuals involved actually come to approve of what is evil.

How do you appeal for good to a person who has become like that? Every argument you could possibly use would be reversed. The case is hopeless.

"How Can I Give You Up?"

Hopeless? Yes, but not for God. For if it were, why would Paul even be writing this letter? As a matter of fact, if it were hopeless, he would not be writing it, for he was one of the most hopeless cases of all, as he reminds us several times in his epistles.

We are focusing here on the idea that "God gave them up." The way I want to state this is to say that although in a sense God has certainly given the race over to the natural outworkings of its rebellious ways—a judgment we see about us on all hands—in another sense God has not "given up" at all. At least he has not given up on those on whom he has set his affection. I think of the way in which he speaks through Hosea to the sinful nation of Israel:

"How can I give you up, Ephraim?
How can I hand you over, Israel?
How can I treat you like Admah?
How can I make you like Zeboiim?
My heart is changed within me; all my compassion is aroused.
I will not carry out my fierce anger, nor devastate Ephraim again."

Hosea 11:8-9

If God actually did give up on humanity forever, all would be hopeless. The Lord Jesus Christ would not have come. He would not have died for our sin. There would be no gospel. But that is not the case. Jesus did come. There is a gospel. The way back to the eternal, sovereign, holy God is open. This is the Good News. Hallelujah!

And need I say more? If there is the gospel, if this is still the age of God's grace, if God has not given up on us ultimately and forever—though he will eventually do that for some one day— then we are not to give up on other people either. How can we, if we have tasted the elixir of grace ourselves?

We tend to give up, at least if the sin of the one we are abandoning is different from our own. We think of others as too far gone, or as having sinned beyond the point of a genuine repentance. Or, terrible as it is, we think of their sin as proof, evidence, that God has abandoned them forever. Many have done that with homosexuals. They regard AIDS as the kind of divine judgment on this sin that precludes our having any pity on the victims or working to bring them the only salvation they can know. Is AIDS a judgment? I believe it is, just like many other consequences of sin. But it is not the final judgment. And until that final judgment breaks forth on our race, it is still the day of grace in which all who know the Good News and are obeying the voice of Christ in taking it to the lost can be hopeful.

Someone once spoke to John Newton, the man who had been a slave trader and a "slave to slaves" earlier in his life, about a person he regarded as a hopeless case. He despaired of him. Newton replied, "I have never despaired for any man since God saved me." We should not despair either. The consequences of sin are dreadful. But they alone, if nothing else, should compel us forward as agents of God's great grace and reconciliation.

Chapter 21.
Lifting the Lid on Hell

Romans 1:29-31

For several chapters we have been studying the most dreadful description of the sinful human race in all literature, the description provided by the apostle Paul in Romans 1:18-32. It began with the rejection of God by all people and has proceeded to God's abandonment of us, as a result of which human beings rapidly fall into a horrible pit of depravity, to their own hurt and the hurt of others.

In the last verses of Romans 1, to which we come now, Paul rounds out his description by a catalogue of vices. It is a long list, containing twenty-one items. But how are we to handle this? How can we face such a devastating unmasking of ourselves? Some will not face it at all, of course. Indeed, even many preachers will not. These verses detail what theologians call "total depravity," and people do not want to hear about that. So many preachers change their message to fit today's cultural expectations. They speak of our goodness, the potential for human betterment, the comfort of the gospel—without speaking of that for which the gospel is the cure.

Jesus said, "Love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your mind" and "your neighbor as yourself (Matt.

22:37, 39). But, as one writer says, "Man as sinner hates God, hates man, and hates himself. He would kill God if he could. He does kill his fellow man when he can. [And] he commits spiritual suicide every day of his life."

The interesting thing about this, however, is that although the pulpit has been muted in its proclamation of the truth of man's depravity, the secular writers have not. They write as if they have never met a good man or a virtuous woman. Psychiatrists say that if you scratch the surface and thus penetrate beneath the thin veneer of human culture and respectability, you "lift the lid of hell."

All Kinds of Wickedness

At the beginning of this section Paul wrote that "the wrath of God is being revealed from heaven against all the godlessness and wickedness of men who suppress the truth by their wickedness" (v. 18). In that verse the second use of "wickedness" refers to man's suppression of the truth about God. But at the beginning of the verse, where the term is used for the first time, "wickedness" is distinguished from "godlessness"; godlessness and wickedness are employed to designate two great categories of human evil. The first embraces all sins against God, that is, sins of the first table of the law. The second embraces the sins of man against man, those of the second table of the law. Generally speaking, it is the sins of "godlessness" that we have been looking at to this point; they are fundamental. However, in these last verses Paul lists examples of man's "wickedness."

1. Wickedness. It is probably to indicate that he is now moving to this second category of sins that Paul begins his catalogue of vices with this term. For "wickedness" in verse 29 is the same word that is used in verse 18. In Greek it is a composite negative term, made up of the positive word for "righteousness" (dikaios), preceded by the negative particle a, meaning "not." Literally it means "not righteous," or "unjust." Since what is "right" is determined by the character or law of God, this term denotes everything that is opposed to that divine law or character. It embraces what follows.

2. Evil. The Greek word is ponēria, which is a general term for badness. One commentator says, "This refers to the general inclination to evil that reigned among the heathen and made them practice and take pleasure in vicious and unprofitable actions." But, of course, it is not just the heathen who are evil, unless we rightly call everyone by that name. We, too, are evil.

3. Greed. In other places, this word (pleonexia) is translated "covetousness." It is what God prohibits in the tenth of the Ten Commandments and what is nevertheless the apparent basis of our western economies. It is the desire always to want a little more. There is a proper kind of ambition, of course. There is a proper desire to improve oneself, particularly for the benefit of others. But that is not what is referred to by this term. It is "the passion for more," the lust to advance oneself even at the expense of others.

4. Depravity. This word denotes that deliberate wickedness that delights in doing other people harm. It could be translated "maliciousness."

As I have mentioned, there are twenty-one terms for evil in these verses, and these are just the first four. But these four belong together in Paul's listing, since they are vices with which Paul says the human race is "filled." What holds them together? They seem primarily to describe injustices that humans commit against the property of other people, and thus also against their well-being.

Hatred of One's Fellowman

Having shown in the earlier part of this chapter of Romans that human beings hate God and would kill him if they could, Paul now shows how they also hate and attempt to destroy their fellows. In other words, the first four terms describe sins against the property and well-being of others. In the next five terms Paul details sins against the very persons of other human beings. The sins are: envy, murder, strife, deceit, and malice.

5. Envy. Earlier Paul has spoken of "greed," indicating that people never seem to be satisfied with what they have but instead clamor for more, often at the cost of others. Here he goes further. Envy is related to greed, but it goes beyond it, because it shows that the chief factor in our greed is jealousy over the fact that other people have more. Or worse! It is possible that they have less and that we are still greedy for what they have, simply because we envy them. In ancient Greece there was a man whose name was Aristides. He was a great man and was called "Aristides the Just." But he was put on trial for something, as many just men were, and a citizen of Athens came to him not knowing who he was and asked him to vote for his own banishment. Aristides asked, "But what harm has Aristides done you?"

The man said, "None. I am just tired of hearing him called 'Aristides the Just.'" That is envy in its most destructive form.

6. Murder. The Greek word for "murder" (phonou) sounds like the word for "envy" (phthonou), which is why they probably appear together so often in ancient texts. But they belong together naturally, too, since murder often flows from envy. Cain's murder of his brother Abel, the first murder in history, is an example. "And why did he murder him?" John asks. "Because his own actions were evil and his brother's were righteous" (1 John 3:12). Another early example is Lamech, who killed a young man who had injured him (perhaps only verbally) and then boasted about the deed (Gen. 4:23). We must remember here also that, according to Jesus, murder is not only the outward act of taking a life. It is also the hatred in the heart that leads to it (cf. Matt. 5:21-22).

7. Strife. The root meaning of this word is "debate." But it came to mean the bad side of debate, which is contention, quarreling, or wrangling.

8. Deceit. Paul is going to return to this word in his summation of human depravity in chapter 3, saying in verse 13 that the "tongues" of the wicked practice this vice. It denotes outright treachery by which words are used to ensnare the unwary for the deceiver's personal gain. Much of the business of the western world is carried on by this means.

9. Malice. This word is derived from two Greek words: kakos, which means "bad," "evil," "worthless," or "pernicious" (we have it in our word cacophony, which is a bad or discordant sound) and ethos, which means "habit," "custom" or "usage." So the word has the idea of customary or habitual evil. The malicious person is one who is normally set against other people and is out to harm them.

The Central Sins

It is hard to group these vices to give logic to Paul's treatment, and it may even be wrong to try to see meaningful groupings in his arrangement. Nevertheless, if the first four terms catalogue sins against the property or well-being of others, and the next five list sins against other persons, it may be that the next six terms are, as one commentator suggests, "those of which pride is the center." They are certainly among the most harmful of these vices.

10. Gossips. Some words in every language sound like what they describe, and this is the case here. We have words like hiss, buzz, thump, and bang, for example. This Greek word is psithuristas, which sounds like a whisper and is, in fact, sometimes translated "whisperings." It refers to the slanderous gossip that is often spread in secret and that is so harmful to another's reputation. It is a deadly vice. It is interesting that the Hebrew word that denotes the murmuring of a snake charmer is translated in the Septuagint by the verb form of this very word: to whisper.

11. Slanderers. Slander carries gossip one step further, since gossip is unleashed in secret but slander is done openly. The Greek word literally means "to speak against" someone, or "defame" him.

12. God-haters. At first glance, this word seems to be out of place in this listing, because here we are dealing with man's sins against man and "God-hater" seems more properly to belong in the earlier verses, in which man's opposition to God was examined. For this reason some have taken the word in a passive sense, meaning "hated by God," that is, as a term for hardened sinners. But surely it cannot mean that in a list of human vices. Actually, it does belong here, since it comes between the sin of slander and the sin of pride. It is as if Paul notes that in his "slander" man does not merely slander other human beings but is slandering God, too, not failing to speak even against the Almighty. That is the essence of insolence and arrogance, the next items the apostle mentions.

Not many people would admit that they hate God, choosing rather to think of themselves as rather tolerant of him. But nowhere do they show their hatred more than in their condescending attitudes. Scratch beneath the surface, allow something to come into their lives that they consider unwarranted or unfair, and their hatred of God immediately boils over. "How could God let this happen to me?" they demand. If they could, they would strangle him!

13. Insolent. This is the great Greek word hubris, which means "pride." But it is a special kind of pride. It is pride that sets a human being up against God. The Greeks regarded this as the greatest of flaws, one the gods would not tolerate. No translation can convey all this in one English word, but the New International Version does a fair job when it renders it "insolent."

14. Arrogant. Today people almost think of arrogance as a virtue, considering it a properly belligerent attitude toward hostile society. But it is rightly included in this list of vices. Arrogance rises from a feeling of personal superiority that regards others with haughtiness. Robert Haldane characterizes the word as describing those who are "puffed up with a high opinion of themselves" and who regard others "with contempt, as if they were unworthy of any intercourse with them."

15. Boastful. Boasting is based on pride. It is to seek admiration by claiming to be or have what one actually is not or does not possess.

Creators of Evil

Up to this point all the vices mentioned are but one word in Greek. But now Paul seems to need two words each to describe the next evils: "inventors of evil things" (epheupetas kakōn) and "disobedient to parents" (goneusin apeitheis).

16. They invent ways of doing evil. Real creativity belongs to God alone, since at best we can only think his thoughts after him. But here, in an ironical way, Paul suggests that the one area in which our creativity excels is inventing new ways to do evil. The old ways are not enough for us. They are too slow, too ineffective, too unproductive, too dull. So we expend our efforts to make more. This was a term used by the author of 2 Maccabees to describe Antiochus Epiphanes and by Tacitus to describe Sejanus. It is this kind of invention that the psalm is speaking of when it says that people "provoked him [God] to anger with their inventions" (Ps. 106:29 KJV).

17. They disobey their parents. Few things more characterize our day than children's utter disregard of their parents' wishes. But this must have been common enough in antiquity, too, since so much is said against it in the Bible. The fifth of the Ten Commandments, the first of the second table, says: "Honor your father and your mother" (Exod. 20:12a). Paul refers to it in Ephesians, noting that it is the first commandment with a promise attached: "that it may go well with you and that you may enjoy long life on the earth" (Eph. 6:2).

Senseless, Faithless, Heartless, Ruthless

The Greek word for disobedience (the seventeenth vice listed) is a compound word beginning with the prefix a, meaning "not," just like the term "not righteous" was used for "wickedness" in verse 29. That sound apparently stuck in Paul's mind and led to a series of four similar terms, which conclude this devastating catalogue: asynetous, asynthetous, astorgous, and aneleēmonas. The New International Version captures a bit of this flavor by rendering the four terms as:

senseless, faithless, heartless, ruthless.

18. Senseless. To most of us "senseless" probably means unconscious, but that is not the thought here. "Without understanding" is a fuller translation, but even so we need to make clear the kind of lack of understanding we mean. Haldane has it right in saying that "the persons so described were not destitute of understanding as to the things of this world." As to these they might be "most intelligent and enlightened." Rather it was "in a moral sense, or as respects the things of God, [that] they were unintelligent and stupid.... All men are by nature undiscerning as to the things of God, and to this there never was an exception."

19. Faithless. This word is not built on the Greek word for faith (pistis), which has to do with belief or trust in God. Rather, the root is tithēmi ("put" or "place"), and the term Paul uses actually has to do with breaking an appointment or covenant. "Breaking faith" is the idea. It means that what people solemnly commit themselves to cannot be trusted.

20. Heartless. This word literally means "without natural affection." It can be seen in the mother who intentionally aborts or abandons her child or the father who abandons his family.

21. Ruthless. The Greek word means "without mercy." Godet writes, "It calls up before the mind the entire population of the great cities flocking to the circus to behold the fights of gladiators, frantically applauding the effusion of human blood, and gloating over the dying agonies of the vanquished combatant. Such is an example of the unspeakable hardness of heart to which the whole society of the Gentile world descended." Ah, but it was not only in the ancient world that people lacked mercy. Ours is a particularly ruthless age. We tend to think that others are unmerciful, particularly when they deal harshly with us. But the truth is that cruelty is at the heart of even the most gentle human being.

One commentator observes that as we scan these lists, "we cannot but be impressed with the apostle's insight into the depravity of human nature as apostatized from God, the severity of his assessment of these moral conditions, and the breadth of his knowledge respecting the concrete ways in which human depravity came to expression."

The Road to Hell

I began this section by saying that it is hard to imagine anything more horrible than this great catalogue of human vices, not merely because they are horrible in themselves, but also because they are with us everywhere. To study a list like this does not mean that every individual is equally guilty of each vice or that there have not been periods of history when they have been either more or less prominent. But, at best, these are all just below the surface of our respectability, and they quickly become apparent whenever you cross our sinful human nature or scratch this surface.

Yet, horrible as this is, it is only a foretaste of what hell itself will be like. For hell is only what is described in these verses, going on and on for eternity. Lloyd-Jones writes, "Hell is a condition in which life is lived away from God and all the restraints of God's holiness." That is precisely what is described in this passage. The basic point is that the human race has chosen to go its way without God and that as a result of this choice God has abandoned the race to the result of its own sinful choices. We have made earth a hell! And we will carry that hell with us into hell, making hell even more hellish than it is already! We and hell itself will go on becoming more and more hell-like for eternity.

Oh, the horror of our choice!

Oh, the glory of the gospel!

A few weeks before I preached this study, after my earlier sermon on "The Psychology of Atheism," I was roundly chastised in a local paper for preaching such a harsh message, as if I had no word of love in my teaching. It may have been that the love of God was not as apparent in that message as it might have been, and if so, I need to correct that fault. But I do know that it is only an awareness of the horror of our sin that ever leads us to appreciate the gospel when we hear it. What if we think we are basically all right before God? What if we think ourselves good? Then we think we do not need the gospel. We think we can do without God, which is exactly what these verses are describing.

When our blinders are stripped off and the depravity of the race—to which we contribute—is unfolded before us, the glory of the gospel bursts forth, and Romans 1:16 and 17 becomes for us what Martin Luther found it to be for him, namely, "the door to Paradise." The gospel is then seen to be "the power of God for the salvation of everyone who believes"—no matter how sinful, no matter how corrupt.

We do not deserve this gospel. How could we? We could not even invent it. But because God is not like us—because he is not "wicked," "evil," "greedy," "depraved," "envious," "senseless," "faithless," "heartless," "ruthless," or anything else that is bad—he not only could invent it, he did!

Chapter 22.
How Low Can You Go?

Romans 1:32

Over the years I have collected questions about the Christian life that I wish someone had answered for me when I was much younger. One is "Why can't a person sin just a little bit?" I think this is an important question, because it is where most of us find ourselves much of the time. Most of us would not admit to wanting to sin in big ways, and we probably don't. We know that sin is destructive. We do not want to make an utter shipwreck of our lives. But we wonder from time to time why we can't sin "just a little bit." God forbids all sin, of course. But surely all sins are not equally terrible. What would be so bad about our just dipping into sin now and then—to sort of satisfy our appetite for it, have our fling, and then get back out and go on with our "upright" Christian lives?

Having studied most of the first chapter of Romans carefully, we should know the answer to that question. The problem with just dipping into sin is that sin never stops at that point. The problem with sinning "just a little bit" is that each bit is followed by just a little bit more, until God has been banished from life's horizons entirely and we have ruined everything.

The Downhill Path

The way this happens is spelled out in the second half of Romans 1 by a threefold repetition of the phrase "God gave them over," which we have already studied. (It occurs in verses 24, 26, and 28.) Just before this, Paul has shown how we reject God. We reject God by suppressing the knowledge about him that we have received from nature and by allowing the God-like vacuum in our lives to be filled with substitutes. We do it by saying, in effect (though we often do not admit it even to ourselves), "God, we do not want you. We want you to get out of our lives and leave us alone. We want to do our own thing without your interference."

So that is just what God does! God does not abandon us in the absolute sense, since this is still God's world and we still have to live in it and conform to the laws of this world, whether we want to or not. But God does abandon us to our own devices in the sense that he withdraws his restraints. He allows us to go our own way, abandoning us judicially to sin's consequences.

That path is definitely downhill!

It cannot be any other way, of course. If God is the source of all good, as the Bible declares him to be, then to abandon God is to abandon the good and to launch oneself on a path leading in progressive measure to all that is evil. If we will not have God, who is truth, we will find falsehood. If we will not seek God, who is holy, we will pursue perversions. If we will not have God, who is the source of all reality, we will have unreality. We will pursue fantasies and dreams and be disillusioned.

A review seems appropriate at this point. In declaring that God gives us over to our own devices, Paul describes a downhill slide that looks like this:

1. God gave them over to sexual impurity (v. 24). The reference is to fornication and adultery, which, Paul says, have two outcomes. First, they result in the degrading of our bodies. People who have had a variety of sexual partners often testify to this. Second, they result in exchanging what is good and true for what is bad and a deception. Paul calls it "a lie." Again, many who have sought personal fulfillment through sexual experimentation testify that promises of the "liberated" life were deceptions. The promised satisfaction and fulfillment did not materialize.

2. God gave them over to shameful lusts (v. 26). This refers to perversions, chiefly male homosexuality and lesbianism, and it is a step downward from mere sexual experimentation. This is because, in addition to being merely sinful, these perversions are "unnatural." That is, they are against nature. Bodies were not meant to function in these ways. Those who sin in these ways do so, therefore, not only against God's revelation in the Old and New Testaments, but also against the very order of creation.

3. God gave them over to a depraved mind (v. 28). When we looked at this verse before, I asked why this is a step further down the ladder of abandonment by God than items one and two. After all, sins of the mind precede sins of the flesh; a person has to think sin before practicing it. So why should this be the third item, rather than the first?

The answer, as we saw earlier, is that this is not the kind of mental depravity Paul is thinking of. It is true that thoughts about evil generally precede evil actions. But here Paul is speaking about the kind of thought perversion that results in the person involved regarding what is good as what (to him or her) appears evil, and what is evil as what (to him or her) appears good. This brings us to the verse with which this great chapter of Romans ends, our text for this study. Verse 32 says of those who have sunk to this point, "Although they know God's righteous decree that those who do such things deserve death, they not only continue to do these very things but also approve of those who practice them." The key word here is "approve." It means that these people sanction both the evil and the evildoers.

Moral Insanity

This is insanity, of course—moral insanity. But it is important to see that this is exactly the point to which rejection of God and suppression of the truth about God lead us.

It is helpful at this point to think of the story of King Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon, as told in the early chapters of Daniel. The theme of Daniel is the identity of the Most High God, and it is established early in the book when we are told that after Nebuchadnezzar had conquered Jerusalem, he carried articles from the temple of God in Jerusalem "to the temple of his god in Babylonia and put [them] in the treasure house of his god" (Dan. 1:2). This was a way of saying that, in Nebuchadnezzar's opinion, his god was stronger than the Jewish God. And so it seemed! Nebuchadnezzar had conquered Jerusalem. He did not understand that God had used him merely as an instrument of judgment upon his disobedient people, as he had repeatedly said he would do.

But Nebuchadnezzar was not really interested in proving that his god was stronger than the Jews' God; he was not all that religious. Nebuchadnezzar's god was only a projection of himself, an alter ego, and the real struggle of the book is therefore actually between Nebuchadnezzar himself and Jehovah. In other words, it is exactly the struggle that Paul depicts in Romans as being between sinful humanity and God. Nebuchadnezzar did not want to acknowledge God, precisely what Paul says we do not want to do. He wanted to run his own life, achieve what he wanted to achieve and then claim the glory for himself for those achievements.

The climax of his rebellion, recorded in Daniel 4, came when Nebuchadnezzar looked over Babylon from the roof of his palace and claimed the glory of God for himself, saying, "Is not this the great Babylon I have built as the royal residence, by my mighty power and for the glory of my majesty?" (Dan. 4:30). This is the cry of the secular humanist. It describes life as of man, by man, and for man's glory.

The point for which I introduce this illustration comes now, in the nature of the judgment pronounced upon this powerful but arrogant emperor. Sometimes, when we think of God's dispensing of judgments, we think of him as acting somewhat arbitrarily, as if he were merely going down a list of punishments to see what punishment he has left for some special sinner. "Let's see now," he might muse. "Nebuchadnezzar? What will it be? Not leprosy, not kidney stones, not paralysis, not goiter. Ah, here it is: insanity. That's what I'll use with Nebuchadnezzar." We may think that is what happened, when we read about the voice "from heaven" that declared: "This is what is decreed for you, King Nebuchadnezzar: Your royal authority has been taken from you. You will be driven away from people and will live with the wild animals; you will eat grass like cattle. Seven times will pass by for you until you acknowledge that the Most High is sovereign over the kingdoms of men and gives them to anyone he wishes" (Dan. 4:31-32).

But this is not the way it happened. God is not arbitrary. He does not operate by sorting through a list of options. Everything God does is significant. So when God caused Nebuchadnezzar to be lowered from the pinnacle of human pride and glory to the baseness of insanity, it was God's way of saying that this is what happens to all who suppress the truth about God and take the glory of God for themselves. The path is not uphill. It is downhill, and it ends in that moral insanity by which we declare what is good to be evil, and what is evil to be good.

Bestial Behavior

But it is not only insanity that we see in the case of Nebuchadnezzar. We see a dramatization of bestial behavior, too, in the words decreeing that Nebuchadnezzar would "live with the wild animals [and] eat grass like cattle." Indeed, what came to pass was even worse. We are told that "he was driven away from people and ate grass like cattle. His body was drenched with the dew of heaven until his hair grew like the feathers of an eagle and his nails like the claws of a bird" (Dan. 4:33). It is a horrible picture. But it is merely a dramatic Old Testament way of describing what Paul is saying in Romans: If we will not have God, we will not become like God ("like God, knowing good and evil," Gen. 3:5); on the contrary, we will become like and live like animals.

At this point I always think of Psalm 8, verses 4 through 7, which say:

When I consider your heavens, the work of your fingers, the moon and the stars. which you have set in place,
what is man that you are mindful of him, the son of man that you care for him?
You made him a little lower than the heavenly beings and crowned him with glory and honor.
You made him ruler over the works of your hands; you put everything under his feet: all flocks and herds, and the beasts of the field.

These verses fix man at a very interesting place in the created order: lower than the angels, or heavenly beings, but higher than the animals —somewhere between. This is what Thomas Aquinas saw when he described man as a mediating being. He is like the angels in that he has a soul. But he is like the beasts in that he has a body. The angels have souls but not bodies, while the animals have bodies but not souls.

But here is the point. Although man is a mediating being, created to be somewhere between the angels and the animals, in Psalm 8 he is nevertheless described as being somewhat lower than the angels rather than as being somewhat higher than the beasts. In other words, although between the angels and the beasts, man is nevertheless destined to look, not downward to the beasts, but upward to the angels and beyond the heavenly beings to God, becoming increasingly like him. If he will not look up and thus become increasingly like God, he will inevitably look down and become like the animals. Like Nebuchadnezzar, he will become beastlike.

Over the last ten or so years I have noticed something very interesting about our culture. I have noticed a number of articles (and sometimes books) that have tended to justify or at least explain bestial human behavior on the ground that we are, after all, "just animals." We have perversions, but—well, the animals have perversions, too.

Some time ago an article appeared in a scientific journal about a certain kind of duck. Two scientists had been observing a family of these ducks, and they reported something that they called "gang rape" in this duck family. I am sure they did not want to excuse this crime among humans by the inevitable comparison they were making. But I think their point was that gang rape among humans is at least understandable, given our animal ancestry. These scientists had an evolutionary, naturalistic background, and I think they were saying, "After all, gang rape is not that surprising when you consider that even the ducks do it."

A story of a similar nature appeared in the September 6, 1982, issue of Newsweek magazine. It was accompanied by a picture of a baboon presumably killing an infant baboon, and over this there was a headline which read: "Biologists Say Infanticide Is as Normal as the Sex Drive—And That Most Animals, Including Man, Practice It." The title says everything. It identifies man as an animal, and it justifies his behavior on the basis of this identification. The logic goes like this: (1) man is an animal; (2) animals kill their offspring; (3) therefore, it is all right (or at least understandable) that human beings kill their offspring. But, of course, the argument is fallacious. Most animals do not kill their offspring. They protect their young and care for them. And even if, in a few rare instances, some animals do kill their young, this is still nothing to compare to the crimes regarding the young of which human beings are capable. In this country alone, for example, we kill over one and a half million babies each year by abortion—in most instances, simply for the convenience of the mother.

Worse Than the Animals

I want to take this a step further, however, and to do that I share the following story. Dr. John Gerstner, Professor Emeritus of Pittsburgh Theological Seminary, was teaching about the depravity of man, and to make his point he compared men and women to rats. After he had finished his address there was a question-and-answer period, and someone who had been offended by the comparison asked Gerstner to apologize. Gerstner did. "I do apologize," he said. "I apologize profusely. The comparison was terribly unfair... to the rats." He then went on to show that what a rat does, it does by the gifts of God that make it ratlike. It does not sin. But we, when we behave like rats, behave worse than we should and even worse than rats. We are worse than "beasts" in our behavior.

Do ducks commit rape? I have never observed that particular family of ducks, and I do not know if they do or do not. Perhaps so. But I do know that if rape occurs in the animal world, it is uncommon. Not so with us. In the human race it is frightfully common. Or again, I do not know if baboons actually kill their young. They may. But they do not systematically murder them for their own convenience, as we do.

Is There a Bottom Rung?

Everything I have been describing to this point has concerned the downhill passage of the human race when it turns away from God, based on Romans 1:32, the last verse of this first great section of Paul's letter. This verse describes the nadir of man's fall. I have called it the lowest point, the worst point on the downward sliding scale.

But is it really the lowest point? Is it the bottom? Or is there a bottom? Is there a point beyond which sin will not go?

I have asked this last question from time to time in terms of our declining western culture—not so much in an absolute sense but in terms of the moral sensibilities of our nation. I have asked, "Is there a point at which we will pull back from our increasingly rapid decline and say, 'This is where we stop; this is terrible; this is a point beyond which we will not go'?" Is there such a point in our culture?

If there is, it is certainly not adultery. We have plenty of that.

It is not prostitution. In fact, prostitution is actually legal in some places.

It is not pornography, though Christians have been opposing pornography effectively in some areas.

Where is the point beyond which our culture does not want to go?

I have noticed that in recent years there has been an attempt to define this point at the place where perversions impinge upon children. The argument would go, "It is not possible to forbid anything to adults as long as they want to do something or consent with each other to do it. But we must not allow these things to affect children. Pornography? Yes, but not child pornography. Prostitution? Yes, but not child prostitution." That sounds good, of course. It gives us the feeling that we are both tolerant—God forbid that we should be intolerant—and moral. But it is sheer hypocrisy. I remember noticing, the first time I was beginning to think along these lines, that at the very time articles were appearing to protest against child pornography and child prostitution, a movie appeared starring Brooke Shields, who was only twelve years old at the time but who played the part of a child prostitute in a brothel in New Orleans at the turn of the century. It was called Pretty Baby. Certain elements of the media suggested that the young actress "matured" through her experience.

Do you see what I am saying? When we are sliding downhill we delude ourselves into thinking that we are only going to dip into sin a little bit or at least that there are points beyond which we will never go, lines we will never cross. But this is sheer fantasy. When we start down that downhill path, there are no points beyond which we will not go and no lines we will not choose to cross—if we live long enough. And even if we die, hell (as I commented in the previous study) is merely our continuing along this dismal, destructive, downhill path forever.

God's Image Restored

I do not want to leave this section with us at the edge of this awful bottomless pit, however. It is true that our rejection of God has left us looking to the beasts and becoming increasingly like them—indeed, even worse than the beasts—and that left to ourselves there can be no end to this grim descent into depravity. But the gospel, for the sake of which Romans was written, tells us that God has not left us to ourselves. In Christ, he has acted to restore what we are intent on destroying.

I see this in five steps:

1. We were made in God's image.
2. We rejected God in Adam and therefore lost that image; we became, not like God, knowing good and evil, but like Satan.
3. Having lost the image of God and having ceased to become increasingly like him, we became like beasts and, as I have been pointing out here, even worse than beasts.
4. Christ became like us, taking a human form upon himself.
5. He died for us and opened up the possibility of our renewal after his image.

Paul writes about this in 2 Corinthians 3, first speaking of a veil that has come between ourselves and God, and then adding: "But whenever anyone turns to the Lord, the veil is taken away.... And we, who with unveiled faces all reflect the Lord's glory, are being transformed into his likeness with ever-increasing glory, which comes from the Lord, who is the Spirit" (vv. 16, 18).

When we come to Christ, the question is not "How low can you go?" We are done with that. The question is "How high can you rise?" And to that question the answer also is: no limit. We are to become increasingly like the Lord Jesus Christ throughout eternity.

Chapter 23.
The First Excuse: Morality

Romans 2:1-3

At first glance the opening words of Romans 2 seem redundant—an echo of what we have already seen in the letter. In Romans 1:20, after Paul has explained how men and women suppress the truth about God, which God has revealed in nature, Paul concludes by saying, "So... men are without excuse." Now he says the same thing—"You, therefore, have no excuse"—as he continues to build the case that all persons, whoever they are or whatever they have or have not done, are under God's judgment.

Paul is not being redundant, of course, as we will see. But even if he were, the point of the repetition is well taken. Paul's repetition dramatizes the fact that human beings never seem able fully to admit their wrongdoing and never tire of making excuses for their bad behavior. Dale Carnegie, in his perennial best seller, How to Win Friends and Influence People, bases his approach to people-management on the premise that others rarely admit to having done anything wrong and that it is therefore pointless to criticize them. My favorite example from the book is a saying of Al Capone, the Chicago gangland leader who for years was the Federal Bureau of Investigation's "Public Enemy Number One." Capone was as sinister as they come, a hardened killer. But he said of himself, "I have spent the best years of my life giving people the lighter pleasures, helping them to have a good time, and all I get is abuse, the existence of a hunted man."

Carnegie's point, and mine as well, is that people habitually attempt to excuse their wrong behavior. If as hardened a man as Al Capone thought well of himself, how much more do the normal, "morally upright" people of our society think well of themselves!

Jew or Gentile

This is why Romans 2 was written. In Romans 1, Paul has shown that the human race has turned away from God in order to pursue its own way and that the horrible things we do and see about us are the result. All have become part of this rebellion. Later on (in Romans 3:10-11), he is going to conclude:

> As it is written:
> "There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God.
> All have turned away, they have together become worthless; there is no one who does good, not even one."

No one wants to admit that, however. So, instead of acknowledging that what Paul said about the human race is true, most of us make excuses, arguing that although Paul's description may be true of other people, particularly very debased individuals or the heathen, it is certainly not true of us. "We know better than that," we say. "And we act better, too." In the second chapter of Romans Paul is going to disabuse us of these erroneous ideas.

But who is it who thinks like this? To whom particularly is Paul speaking when he says in verse 1: "You, therefore, have no excuse, you who pass judgment on someone else"?

There has been a great deal of discussion of this among commentators. Some maintain that in Romans 2:1-16 Paul is addressing the "virtuous heathen," that is, the particularly moral or upright persons of his society. Others maintain that he is thinking of Jews. Later on, of course, Paul does mention Jews specifically—"Now you, if you call yourself a Jew..." (v. 17)—but the question is whether he is also thinking of Jews at the start of the chapter. If he is not, he is dealing with three classes of people: (1) pagans in chapter 1; (2) moral or virtuous people in 2:116; and (3) religious people or Jews in 2:17-29. If he is thinking of Jews, he is dealing with two classes of people: (1) Gentiles in chapter 1; and (2) Jews in chapter 2.

The reformers, John Calvin among them, took the former view. Calvin wrote, "This rebuke is directed at the hypocrites who draw attention by their displays of outward sanctity, and even imagine that they have been accepted by God, as though they had afforded him full satisfaction." He distinguishes between "sanctimonious persons" and those guilty of "the grosser vices."

Today most commentators believe that Paul was thinking of Jews throughout the chapter, even though he does not mention Jews specifically until later. John Murray is an example. He finds four reasons for this position:

1. "The propensity to judge the Gentiles for their religious and moral perversity was peculiarly characteristic of the Jew."
2. "The person being addressed is the participant of 'the riches of his [God's] goodness and forbearance and longsuffering,'" and this applies to Jews more than to Gentiles.
3. "The argument of the apostle is... that special privilege or advantage does not exempt from the judgment of God." This fits Jews particularly.
4. "The express address to the Jew in verse 17 would be rather abrupt if now for the first time the Jew is directly in view, whereas if the Jew is the person in view in the preceding verses then the more express identification in verse 17 is natural."

Support of this position is fairly strong today, as I have indicated. Yet I am not fully convinced. Murray argues that Jews were particularly prone to judge Gentiles. But I would argue that, although that was true, it is nevertheless also a basic human characteristic, practiced by Gentiles on one another as well as by Jews on Gentiles. Again, Murray thinks that "the riches of his goodness and forbearance and longsuffering" describes Jews more than Gentiles. But I think a broader reference is required by the thrust of chapter 1. It is because of God's longsuffering that the people described in chapter 1 are still living and not in hell. Likewise, I would argue that the "special privilege" Murray refers to in his third argument does not actually come in until later, when the Jews are being considered. As to the fourth argument, that the reference to Jews in verse 17 is too abrupt, I feel that it is no more abrupt than the way verse 1 introduces those "who pass judgment on someone else."

I think Paul first introduces those, both Jew and Gentile, who consider themselves above others, and then, midway through the chapter, those, in this case Jews particularly, who rely on their religious advantages.

Let me say, however, that in a sense it does not matter much. If Paul is thinking of Jews in verses 1-16, he is at least thinking of them in regard to their morally superior attitude, from which we are not exempt, though we be Gentiles. And if he is thinking of Gentiles, he is at least embracing Jews at the point at which they might indulge in similarly wrong thinking.

What's Wrong with Morality?

Paul has described the race as being under the wrath of God, and he has shown the depths to which our rebellion against God has led us. He has not minced words. He has described the race as being "filled with every kind of wickedness, evil, greed and depravity.... full of envy, murder, strife, deceit and malice.... gossips, slanderers, God-haters, insolent, arrogant and boastful; they invent ways of doing evil; they disobey their parents; they are senseless, faithless, heartless, ruthless" (Rom. 1:29-31). This is a dreadful denunciation, and at this point someone, perhaps everyone, reacts by saying that although that description of vice may fit other individuals, it certainly does not fit him. "I am not like this," he might say.

It would be perfectly proper if Paul had answered such an objector by pointing out that the important question is not whether he or she has done the specific blameworthy things mentioned, but whether the person measures up to the perfect standard of God. God, being perfect, cannot be satisfied with anything less than perfection. That important point, which Paul is also quite capable of making, means that we fall short of this divine standard and are therefore deserving of judgment, however good we may be.

But that is not the way Paul answers. Paul does not let the objecting person off the hook by acknowledging, somewhat reluctantly, that he (or she) may indeed be innocent of the vices mentioned, but that he nevertheless falls short of God's righteous, higher standard. On the contrary, Paul argues that the objector is guilty of these very things—perhaps even more guilty than the pagans to whom he feels superior. The very fact that this supposedly moral person is objecting shows that he has some kind of moral conscience. He "passes judgment on someone else" in declaring the other's actions bad, as distinct from his own actions, which are good. But this does not mean that he is innocent of what he sees and condemns in others. On the contrary, he is guilty of these very actions: "... at whatever point you judge the other, you are condemning yourself, because you who pass judgment do the same things" (v. 1).

Paul is not appealing to God's standard as that by which self-styled moral individuals will be judged, though he had every right to do so. Rather, he is appealing to their own standard, whatever it is.

Condemned by Any Standard

This is worth thinking through carefully. What are the standards by which you or I might judge sin in others?

1. The Ten Commandments. The most widely acknowledged standard of morality, at least in the western world, is the Decalogue, containing what most of us call the Ten Commandments, as recorded in Exodus 20 (cf. Deut. 5:6-21). Much civil law is based on it. For example, when we pass laws recognizing the responsibility of children to obey their parents up to a certain age, we are affirming the fifth of the Ten Commandments, which says, "Honor your father and your mother" (v.

12). When we pass laws against killing, even by such things as excessive speed on the highways, we are affirming the sixth commandment, which says, "You shall not murder" (v. 13). We have laws protecting marriages and against adultery, laws against stealing other people's property, laws against perjury, and so on. These laws grow out of a common recognition of the moral principles embodied in the Ten Commandments.

"Well, that is what we are talking about," says someone. "Paul's condemnation of sin in Romans 1 might have been proper in that far-off heathen context. But it does not apply to us. We have the Ten Commandments and do not do that for which the pagans are condemned." Don't we? Don't you?

You appeal to the fifth commandment, which requires you to honor your father and your mother. But have you never dishonored your parents? Have you never spoken to them in a dishonoring way? Acted in a dishonoring way? Have you always been properly thankful, respectful, and obedient to them?

You appeal to the sixth commandment, which forbids murder, and you feel good about this because you have never actually murdered anybody. But have you forgotten that God looks on the heart and judges by thoughts and wishes as well as by actions? Have you never been angry enough with somebody to want to murder that person? Jesus said on one occasion that even speaking a defamatory word is sufficient to incur God's wrath for breaking this commandment (Matt. 5:21-22).

You appeal to the seventh commandment, but are you guiltless here? This commandment forbids adultery; but many have done this, and others have desired it or contemplated it. Jesus said that we are guilty of this even if we only lust after another person (Matt. 5:28).

Have you never stolen? Never shaded the figures on your income tax in order to pay less than you actually owed? Never kept the change when you were given more than you should have received? Never borrowed something and then failed to return it, even though you remembered it later?

Have you never lied? Never misrepresented the truth?

And what about the commands I did not even mention the first time around? What about the tenth of the commandments, which says that we must not "covet"? To covet means to want something that someone else has just because he or she has it and you do not. There is no one in our society who is innocent of this, because our entire advertising and marketing industry is based on it.

There are also the four commandments that make up the first table of the law, those that deal with God and our responsibility to worship him. Who has never placed another god before God? Who has never made an idol of something? Who has not misused God's name? Who has remembered even a single Sabbath day, not to mention every Sabbath day, by keeping it holy?

If you say, "My standard is the morality of the Ten Commandments," you are condemned by this standard.

2. The Sermon on the Mount. There may be people who have followed my argument to this point but are still not convinced how useless it is to make excuses. They might admit the force of judgments based on the Ten Commandments. "But," they might say, "that was another age and a particularly difficult set of standards. We live in the Christian era now, and I go by the teachings of the gentle Jesus. My standard is the Sermon on the Mount."

If anybody thinks this way, that person's thinking proves how little he or she really understands Christ's sermon. For the Sermon on the Mount does not weaken the Old Testament standards; it rescues them. I have already made that clear in using Matthew 5 to interpret murder and adultery properly. The Sermon on the Mount shows that God is not satisfied with mere external adherence to his laws but requires an inner conformity as well. Our hearts and minds also must be purified.

However, I suppose that what most persons have in mind if they appeal to the Sermon on the Mount, are the Beatitudes, with which it begins. Jesus said:

> "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.
> Blessed are those who mourn, for they will be comforted.
> Blessed are the meek, for they will inherit the earth.
> Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, for they will be filled.
> Blessed are the merciful, for they will be shown mercy.
> Blessed are the pure in heart, for they will see God.
> Blessed are the peacemakers, for they will be called sons of God.
> Blessed are those who are persecuted because of righteousness, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

Matthew 5:3-10

Most "moral" people see themselves in this description. They think themselves meek, merciful, pure, peacemakers. They imagine that they actually thirst for righteousness and are even sometimes persecuted because of it. But who really embodies these characteristics? Is it anyone you know? Hardly! The only person who has ever really embodied them is the one who spoke them: Jesus of Nazareth. He was gentle in spirit; he mourned for sin; he was meek, merciful, and pure; he alone embodied righteousness—and he suffered for it.

You see my point. If Jesus has shown what it means to keep the standards of the Sermon on the Mount, then none of us has done it. And so, if we appeal to the Sermon on the Mount as the measure by which we judge others and put ourselves above them, we condemn ourselves, as Paul indicates.

3. The Golden Rule. "But wait a minute," someone interrupts. "You have referred to the Beatitudes as an important part of Jesus' teaching, and that is right. But it is not all he taught, even in this sermon. What about the 'heart' of the sermon: the Golden Rule. What is wrong with the part that goes: 'In everything, do to others what you would have them do to you, for this sums up the Law and the Prophets' (Matt. 7:12)?"

Is that the part by which you judge others and by which you want to be judged? Have you always treated others exactly as you have wanted them to treat you? Have you never been impatient with them? Never gotten angry with them unjustly? Never accused them falsely? Never taken advantage of another's weakness? The Golden Rule accuses you, as it must if it is truly the summation of the law, as Jesus teaches.

4. Fair Play. Let me try once more. What about the "Englishman's virtue," as some have called it. What about the simple, rock-bottom standard of fair play? The point is obvious. There is no one who is ever fair to other people always and in all ways.

Calling Sinners to Repentance

A number of years ago Thomas A. Harris wrote a book of pop psychology called I'm O.K., You're O.K., and about that time the Philadelphia Conference on Reformed Theology was holding its annual meetings on the depravity of man. One of the speakers was John H. Gerstner, Professor Emeritus of Pittsburgh Theological Seminary. He used the book as a jumping-off place for the following story.

Gerstner and his wife had been in Kashmir, and they were returning from a shopping expedition in a little boat that had just pulled up beside a larger junk near the shore. There was a bump, and some water splashed on them. The owner of the boat got very agitated and gestured for them to get out. Gerstner told how he remembered saying to his wife, "See how excitable this fellow is.

We get a little water splashed on us, and you would think it was a catastrophe of the first order." The man got more and more agitated. "It's okay, Kusra," Gerstner said. "It's okay."

Finally, the owner of the boat got so excited that he broke out of the dialect he had been using, which the Gerstners had been unable to understand, and shouted, "It no okay!"

At this they got the message and climbed onto the shore. The owner then threw his grandchild up to them and climbed out himself. When they turned around, the boat was gone. The hull had been punctured, and the undertow had swallowed their craft. It was eventually tossed up about six boats further on; if the Gerstners had delayed a moment longer, they would have been swallowed up with it.

That is the message of these early chapters of Romans: "I am not O.K. You are not O.K. No one is O.K." And the sooner we admit that we are not okay and turn to the One who knows that we are not, but who offers us a way of salvation anyway, the better off we will be. Jesus does not excuse us; he forgives us. He calls us sinners. Yet he says, "I have not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance" (Luke 5:32). The most important thing in life is to know that Jesus is able to save you from sin. The second most important thing is to know that you require it.

Chapter 24.
The Long-Suffering God

Romans 2:4

In my library in Philadelphia I have a large number of books that deal with the attributes of God.
They are among my favorite volumes. I think, for example, of A. W. Tozer's books on knowing God: The Pursuit of God and The Knowledge of the Holy. Or Arthur Pink's studies of God's character: The Attributes of God and Gleanings in the Godhead. Some are heavy theological works, like Emil Brunner's The Christian Doctrine of God, Herman Bavinck's The Doctrine of God and Carl F. H. Henry's multivolumed God, Revelation and Authority. There is also the welldeserved popular favorite: Knowing God, by J. I. Packer.

I find as I look over these books that there is little in them concerning two of the three attributes we are to study in this chapter: tolerance (forbearance) and patience (longsuffering). Why is this? Pink calls attention to it, saying, "It is not easy to suggest a reason... for surely the longsuffering of God is as much one of the divine perfections as is his wisdom, power or holiness, and as much to be admired and revered by us."

The reason many of us ignore these attributes may be precisely what Paul suggests it may be, when he asks in our text, "Do you show contempt for the riches of his [God's] kindness, tolerance and patience, not realizing that God's kindness leads you toward repentance?" The reason why we do not think often of God's tolerance and patience is our insensitivity to sin and our reluctance to turn from it.

The Goodness of God

I have said that two of the three attributes mentioned in our text are frequently neglected:
tolerance and patience. But the first of the three attributes is "goodness" (KJV), or "kindness" (NIV), and goodness is not usually ignored. I suppose this is because goodness is so desirable a part of God's nature. Our word God points in that direction. It comes to us from Anglo-Saxon speech, where "God" originally meant "The Good." This was an important insight, for it meant that in the minds of the Anglo-Saxons, God was not only "the Greatest" of all beings, though they recognized that as well, but that he was also "the Best." All the goodness there is originates in God. That is why the apostle James could write, "Every good and perfect gift is from above, coming down from the Father of the heavenly lights, who does not change like shifting shadows" (James 1:17). In the language of philosophy the simplest of all definitions of God is summum bonum, the chief good.

Yet, when Paul speaks of the goodness of God in Romans 2, he is not thinking of this as having to do primarily with what God is in himself, but as having to do with God's actions toward us. This may be why the New International Version renders the Greek term chrēstotēs (later, chrēstos) as "kindness" rather than "goodness," as it is in the King James Bible.

1. Creation. The first place at which the goodness of God is seen is in creation. We remember that on each of the successive days of creation, after God had made the heavens and the earth, the sea and the land, and all the creatures that live in the sea, inhabit the land, and fly in the air, God said, "It is good." And it really was good—and continues to be, in spite of the increasing spoilage of creation that has come to it because of human sin.

The world about us is good, and this is a great proof of God's goodness. Every time we breathe God's good air, we demonstrate how indebted we are to this goodness. Every time we use the resources of the world to make homes and clothes and to grow food, we show that God is kind toward us. And what of our bodies? How suited are our hands to perform useful work! How valuable are our arms and legs! How amazing our eyes! How marvelous our minds! Paul Brand's study of the wonders of the human body—cells, bones, skin, and motion—Fearfully and Wonderfully Made, highlights some of this goodness.

2. Providence. God's goodness is also revealed in providence, that is, by his continual ordering of the world and world events for good. Providence is seen in what theologians call "common grace. "Jesus spoke of this when he observed that God "causes his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sends rain on the righteous and the unrighteous" (Matt. 5:45).

3. The Gospel Call. But the kindness of God toward us is seen not only in the physical creation and providence. It is also seen in many spiritual matters. Above all, it is seen in the widespread proclamation of the gospel. To be sure, the gospel has not yet penetrated everywhere. There are still many millions of people who have not heard that Jesus loves them and has died for them. But you have! You at least know God's goodness in the gospel.

Charles Haddon Spurgeon, the great Baptist preacher of the nineteenth century, wrote on Romans 2:4:

Myriads of our fellow men have never had an opportunity of knowing Christ. The missionary's foot has never trodden the cities wherein they dwell, and so they die in the dark. Multitudes are going downward, downward; but they do not know the upward road. Their minds have never been enlightened by the teachings of God's word, and hence they sin with less grievousness of fault. You are placed in the very focus of Christian light, and yet you follow evil! Will you not think of this? Time was when a man would have to work for years to earn enough money to buy a Bible. There were times when he could not have earned one even with that toil. Now the word of God lies upon your table, and you have a copy of it in almost every room of your house. Is not this a boon from God? This is the land of the open Bible, and the land of the preached word of God. In this you prove the richness of God's goodness. Do you despise this wealth of mercy?... Is this a small thing?

The kindness of God is not a small thing. We dare not despise it, as Paul tells us.

The Tolerance of God

The second attribute of God in our text is tolerance, and this, as I wrote earlier, is frequently neglected. The Greek word is anochēs, variously translated "tolerance," "forbearance," "holding back," "delay," "pause," or "clemency."

The new idea introduced by this term is that of human offense to God's goodness, offense that should evoke an immediate outpouring of fierce judgment but which God actually endures. We see this quality at the beginning of the Bible. God had warned Adam that on the day he ate of the forbidden tree he would die (Gen. 1:17). But when God came to Adam and Eve in the garden to confront our first parents with the fact of their disobedience, he did not actually execute the sentence. Someone has pointed out that Adam and Eve did die in their spirits, which they proved by running away from God when he came calling. That is true. But they did not die physically, at least not at once. And they never did die eternally, because God came with an offer of salvation through a future deliverer who would defeat Satan, which they then believed and trusted. This first great outcropping of sin and God's dealings with it show God's tolerance.

So it is with us all. We sin, but God does not immediately implement the judgment we deserve. He bears with us, enduring the affront to his great majesty and holiness. And he offers us salvation!

The irony is that we do not appreciate this and instead actually turn God's temporary tolerance of some sin into an accusation against him. Do you remember the question raised by those who had witnessed a few instances of evil in the days of Jesus Christ? Apparently some Galileans had been visiting Jerusalem and had been worshiping at the temple. While they were in the midst of their pious acts, soldiers from Pilate fell upon them and killed some of them. Again, about this same time a tower fell over and killed eighteen persons who were standing beside it. Jesus was asked how it was possible that something like this could happen in a world ruled by a just yet merciful God. Was it because these people were worse sinners than others? Or was it because God was either too weak to avert the tragedies or just didn't care?

Jesus replied, "Do you think that these Galileans were worse sinners than all the other Galileans because they suffered this way? I tell you, no! But unless you repent, you too will all perish. Or those eighteen who died when the tower of Siloam fell on them—do you think they were more guilty than all the others living in Jerusalem? I tell you, no! But unless you repent, you too will all perish" (Luke 13:2-5).

Jesus' point was that our way of asking that question is entirely wrong. The question is not why God somehow "lets down" and allows others to perish, but rather why he has spared us, we being the sinners we are. If we could understand how sinful we are, we could understand that the soldiers should have killed us, or the tower should have fallen on us. We should be dead and in hell this very instant. That we are not in hell is an evidence of God's tolerance. He has not yet confined us to the punishment we deserve. God's tolerance should lead us to repentance, before it is too late.

The Patience of God

The last of these three attributes is the greatest from the point of view of our text, for it is linked to the call for repentance in that God spares us for a very long time that we might do so. The Greek word makrothymia is interesting, because the first half of it, makro (macro), emphasizes how great God's longsuffering, or patience, is.

Here is a good place to put these three terms together and compare them. I quote first from Robert Haldane. He thinks these words apply to the Jews explicitly, which I do not. But his definitions and contrasts are significant nevertheless: "Goodness imports the benefits which God hath bestowed on the Jews. Forbearance denotes God's bearing with them, without immediately executing vengeance—his delaying to punish them.... Long-suffering signifies the extent of that forbearance during many ages." Here is another quotation, from Charles Hodge: "The first means kindness in general, as expressed in giving favors; the second, patience; the third, forbearance, slowness in the infliction of punishment."

I would define each of these three terms as aspects of God's goodness: the first as goodness to man without any specific relationship to sin; the second as goodness in relation to sin's magnitude; the third as goodness in relation to sin's endurance or continuation. Spurgeon was thinking along these lines when he wrote, "Forbearance has to do with the magnitude of sin; longsuffering with the multiplicity of it."

"Patience" means that God bears with sin a long time. Here are some examples:

First, God was patient with those who sinned in the early ages of the race before the great flood.

This was a particularly evil time. Some of the evil is described in Genesis 4, which begins with Cain's murder of his brother Abel and ends with Lamech's boast about having killed a man just for wounding him. This evil is summarized in Genesis 6:5, where we are told, "The LORD saw how great man's wickedness on the earth had become, and that every inclination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil all the time." What a devastating statement—"only evil all the time"! This was a dreadful age. Yet, in spite of this great evil, God was patient with the antediluvian generation. He spared it for 120 years while Noah was in the process of constructing and outfitting the ark. It was only at the end of that period, after ample warnings from Noah and the other pre-flood preachers, like Enoch, that the flood came.

A second example is Israel, with whom God was exceptionally patient. He was patient with the Jews for forty years in the wilderness, as Paul reminds us in a sermon to Gentiles and Jews at Antioch ("He endured their conduct for about forty years in the desert," Acts 13:18). Later, when the Israelites entered the Promised Land and were soon found following the debased customs and worship of the nations around them, God did not immediately chastise his people but instead sent a long line of deliverers. Even when their sin was so great that a judgment by invasion and deportment was inevitable, God still sent generations of prophets to warn both Israel and Judah and turn them from sin.

What of ourselves? Arthur W. Pink writes:

How wondrous is God's patience with the world today. On every side people are sinning with a high hand. The divine law is trampled under foot and God himself openly despised. It is truly amazing that he does not instantly strike dead those who so brazenly defy him. Why does he not suddenly cut off the haughty infidel and blatant blasphemer, as he did Ananias and Sapphira? Why does he not cause the earth to open its mouth and devour the persecutors of his people, so that, like Dathan and Abiram, they shall go down alive into the Pit? And what of apostate Christendom, where every possible form of sin is now tolerated and practiced under cover of the holy name of Christ? Why does not the righteous wrath of heaven make an end of such abominations? Only one answer is possible: because God bears with "much longsuffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction."

Repent or Perish

Yet, much as I appreciate Arthur Pink and value his description of God's longsuffering toward those of our own time, I do not think his statement that "only one answer is possible" is correct. Pink asks, "Why does God not immediately destroy all wrong doers?" He answers, "Because God is longsuffering toward the vessels of wrath fitted for destruction." That means: simply because God is longsuffering. Sinners will perish eventually anyway, but God is nevertheless willing to endure them for a very long time.

Well, that is part of the answer. God does endure for a long time those who eventually will perish. But if our text—which speaks so eloquently of the goodness, tolerance, and patience of God—means anything, it certainly means that God also has quite another purpose in his patience. Paul says that it is to lead us to repentance.

There are two ways we can go, of course. Paul is clear about them. One way is repentance, the way Scripture urges. The other is defiance, or spite toward God's goodness.

Which will it be for you? You can defy God. You can set yourself against his goodness, tolerance, and patience—as well as against his other attributes like sovereignty, holiness, omniscience, and immutability, which you also despise. But why should you do that? I have previously pointed out that it is quite understandable how a sinner who does not wish to leave his or her sin must hate God's holiness. It is obvious that a rebellious subject will resent God's sovereignty. But why should you "show contempt for the riches of his kindness, tolerance and patience"? These are winsome qualities. A kind, tolerant, and patient God is a good God. Why should you fail to realize that God's exercise of these attributes toward you is for a good end?

I want to give you three reasons why you should allow these attributes to lead you to repentance and should no longer despise the goodness of God.

First, if God is a good God, then whatever you may think to the contrary in your fallen state, to find this good God will mean finding all good for yourself. You do not normally think this way. You think that your own will is the good. You think that if you have to turn from what you think you want—and desperately do want—you will be miserable. Can you not see that it is your own sinful way, and the ways of millions of other people just like you, that is the cause of your miseries. God is not the cause. God is good. God is the source of all good. If you want to find good for yourself as well as others, the way to find it is to turn from whatever is holding you back and find God. God has provided the way for you to turn to him through the death of his Son, the Lord Jesus Christ. He died for your sin to open the door to God's presence.

Not long ago I was talking to a young girl who had gotten into trouble because of her rebellion against nearly everyone who was in authority over her, had ended up in an institution for troubled teenagers, and had had a very rough time. But in the counseling and small-group sessions she learned something important. As we talked she said, "I learned that the people I thought were my enemies were actually my friends, because they told me the truth, and I learned that my trouble was not caused by other people. I caused it. If I am going to get anywhere, I have to change."

This teenager had become a lot smarter than many people who fight against God by blaming him for their misery. If you are to be wise and not foolish, you must allow the goodness of God to lead you to repentance.

Second, if God is tolerant of you, it is because he has a will to save you. If he wanted to condemn you outright, he could have done it long ago. If he is tolerant, you will find that if you come to him he will not cast you out. One commentator wrote, "If God is good even to the unkind and the unthankful, surely the door of entrance to the divine favor is open to the penitent."

Third, if God is patient with you in spite of your many follies, it is because he is giving you an opportunity to be saved. The apostle Peter wrote, "The Lord is not slow in keeping his promise, as some understand slowness. He is patient with you, not wanting anyone to perish, but everyone to come to repentance" (2 Peter 3:9). If God were not good, you might have room to doubt this. You might think of God as a cat playing with a mouse. You might think of him as being patient with you only for his own amusement. But this is not the case at all. If God is good in his patience, his reason for being so must be to do good. His patience must be to give you opportunity to turn to him. Do not make the mistake of thinking that because God is tolerant he will not judge sin. God will judge it. He is just, as well as patient. But now he is patient, and if he has allowed you to live twenty, forty, or even eighty or ninety years, it is so that you might come to him now—before you die and the opportunity for salvation is gone forever.

Paul says that God's goodness "leads" you to repentance. If he is leading, he will not turn you away if you follow him. If he bids you repent, he will not spurn your repentance.

Chapter 25.
Wrath Stored Up

Romans 2:5

In Romans 2:5 we come for a second time to the idea of the wrath of God, and for the second time we need to defend wrath as a proper element in God's character. It is strange this should be so.

Several years ago newspapers reported the discovery of a "house of horrors" in north Philadelphia. A man named Gary Heidnik had been luring prostitutes and other rootless women to his home, imprisoning and torturing them, and finally killing some. When his crimes were uncovered, two women were found chained to the walls of the basement, and body parts of others were discovered in Heidnik's refrigerator. Heidnik was criminally insane, of course. But the interesting thing about this case is that much of the outrage it engendered was directed, not so much at this man, who was obviously insane, but at the police, who had been alerted to the strange goings-on in the house earlier by neighbors but had done nothing. The police maintained that until they were finally told about Heidnik by a woman who had been in his home but had escaped, they did not have "probable cause" to interfere.

The position of the police may have been technically and legally correct, of course. But the point I am making is that people naturally feel that evil demands both intervention and outrage, and they are deeply upset if this does not happen. If nothing is done or if the situation is allowed to continue unchallenged for a long time, the outrage is intensified!

Why are we unwilling to grant the rightness of a similar outrage to God. The only possible reason is that we consider our sins and those of most other people to be excusable—forgetting that in the sight of the holy God they are not much different from those of Gary Heidnik. They are measured not by our own relative and wavering standards of good and evil, but by God's absolute and utterly upright criteria.

Wrath Revealed

The first time we came in Romans to the idea of the wrath of God, we were at the beginning of the first great section of the letter. There Paul wrote, "The wrath of God is being revealed from heaven against all the godlessness and wickedness of men who suppress the truth by their wickedness" (Rom. 1:18). This is a thematic verse and therefore very important, for it is saying that the wrath of God is not something merely saved up until some long-delayed but final day of judgment, but rather is something that God has been revealing to us even now. Romans 2:5 is going to say that there is also a day of wrath to come, but the first thing Paul says about God's wrath is that it is already being revealed from heaven.

This means that the wrath of God is a very real thing. Moreover, we can know the certainty of a future day of wrath by noting the past and present revelation of that wrath.

How has the wrath of God been revealed? Robert Haldane says:

It was revealed when the sentence of death was first pronounced, the earth cursed, and man driven out of the earthly paradise, and afterward by such examples of punishment as those of the deluge, and the destruction of the cities of the plain by fire from heaven.... But, above all, the wrath of God was revealed from heaven when the Son of God came down to manifest the divine character, and when that wrath was displayed in his sufferings and death, in a manner more awful than by all the tokens God had before given of his displeasure against sin. Besides this, the future and eternal punishment of the wicked is now declared in terms more solemn and explicit than formerly. Under the new dispensation, there are two revelations given from heaven, one of wrath, the other of grace.

I do not anywhere know a statement regarding the nature of the revelation of God's wrath that is more complete or accurate than this statement by Haldane. Yet, in Romans 1, Paul's point is that the wrath of God is revealed to us chiefly in the debilitating downward drag of sin upon our lives. We think when we sin that we can sin "just a little bit." But we cannot! Sin captures us and pulls us down inexorably, until—if we are allowed to continue in sin long enough—we end up calling what is good, evil and what is evil, good. And we perish utterly!

This means that the moral turmoil and chaos of the world, including our own personal world, is evidence that the wrath of God is no fiction. This is something to be gravely concerned about.

Wrath Deserved

In Romans 2:5, Paul has other things to say about wrath, and his first point is that the wrath of God toward the sin of men and women is deserved. That should be perfectly evident by now, of course—at least if we have understood the argument of Romans 1. God's wrath is deserved, because our ignorance of God is a willful ignorance and our refusal to seek him out and worship him is a willful refusal. We have already seen that God has revealed his existence and power in nature and that this alone should be sufficient to lead every man, woman, and child on the face of the earth to give thanks to God. But we do not do it, and the fact that we do not do it is proof that we do not want to.

But the case is even stronger than this, which is what Paul is chiefly teaching in chapter 2. Romans 1 declared God's wrath on the basis of the evidence for the existence of God in nature, which we refuse to acknowledge. Chapter 2 goes beyond this, with verse 5, our text here, speaking of the wrath of God as coming to us because of our stubborn refusal to repent.

The word repent takes us back to verse 4. For in that verse Paul has spoken of two paths open to human beings as a result of God's kindness, tolerance, and patience. One path is the path of contempt for God's blessings. The other path, the one Paul recommends, is repentance. Paul argues that the kindness, tolerance, and patience of God are to lead us to repentance. But will this happen? Is it happening now? The answer appears in verse 5, where Paul speaks of our "stubborn" and "unrepentant" hearts. Apparently, the kindness, tolerance, and patience of God do not have the effect by themselves of leading men and women to repentance. On the contrary, those who have already suppressed the truth about God revealed in nature now add to their evil a hardening of their hearts against the kindnesses that have been bestowed upon them for their good.

So the wrath of God against the race is deserved on two counts: (1) we have rejected the natural revelation; and (2) we have shown contempt for God's patience and kind acts.

Wrath Proportionate to Sin

In my judgment, the most important teaching in this verse is that the wrath of God is proportionate to human sin, in the sense that those who sin much will be punished much and that those who sin less will be punished less. This has been a problem for some Christian people who have thought of hell's punishments as being poured out on unbelievers only because of their adamant refusal to accept Jesus Christ. Since that sin—a great sin, to be sure—seems to be the same for everybody, the punishments of hell should be equal, such persons feel.

But this is not correct. For one thing, even the basic premise is in error, for not everyone has a chance to hear of Jesus Christ, and therefore not all will be punished for refusing to believe on him. We saw this in our study of Romans 1, when we dealt with whether it is just for God to condemn those who, like the natives in a far-off island jungle, have never had a chance to hear the gospel. We saw there that God does not condemn people for failing to do what they did not even know they should do, but rather for failing to follow the revelation they do have. The native is condemned, not for failing to believe on Jesus, about whom he has never heard, but for failing to seek God out on the basis of the revelation of God found in nature.

If this is true, however, as it is, then it also follows that some people are more guilty than others and must be punished accordingly. The native is perhaps least guilty, in spite of what we may regard as his particularly debased worship and immoral practices. The person who has heard of Jesus but has refused to come to God through faith in Jesus Christ is more guilty. He has rejected not one but two sources of revelation: the revelation in nature and the special revelation of the gospel of God's grace in Jesus Christ disclosed in Scripture.

What of those, like ourselves, who have heard the gospel repeatedly and have even seen its power demonstrated in the lives of other persons? If we refuse that repeated and amplified revelation, we are the guiltiest of all.

There is an interesting image suggested by Paul's language at this point, for Paul speaks of the stubborn and unrepentant person "storing up wrath" for the day of God's judgment. It is the image of a greedy individual, a miser, who has been storing up wealth which, contrary to his expectations, is destined to destroy him. I think of this man as storing up a great horde of gold coins, placing them in an attic above his bed where he thinks no one will find them and where they will be safe. He keeps this up for years, amassing a great weight of gold. But one day, while he is sleeping and oblivious to his danger, this great weight of gold breaks through the ceiling of his bedroom, comes crashing down onto his bed, and kills him. He thought of his wealth as salvation, but it was death.

That is the way it is for those who pile sin upon sin and show contempt for God's kindness. They think of their sins as building up a life of future happiness and freedom. But each sin is actually a storing up of wrath. Haldane says, "A man is rich according to his treasures." Therefore, "the wicked will be punished according to the number and aggravation of their sins." This is true even of the good we receive and enjoy without giving proper thanks to God.

Each little indulgence of sin is a coin of wrath stored up.

Each neglect of others is a saved-up ingot of anger.

Each angry word, each selfish thought, each mean retort, each harmful act, is a piling up of wrath's treasures.

Each pleasure enjoyed without genuine thanks to God builds wrath.

Each year of grace, each day enjoyed without the experience of God's swift and immediate judgment, each moment of indifference to the mercy of God, is wrath's accumulation.

If life has been good to you, you only increase your guilt and build a treasure of future punishment by ignoring God's kindness.

Certain Wrath

There is another thought about wrath in verse 5, and it is that the wrath of God against sin is certain. People who spurn God's patience inevitably think that in the end they will somehow get free and escape what they deserve. That is what the people being addressed in this chapter were thinking. They looked at the debased moral practices of the heathen and concluded that they themselves would escape God's wrath because of their imagined superiority to the heathen in such things. But it is not so, Paul says. In fact, it is quite the contrary. Their very awareness of high moral standards, coupled with their refusal to repent of sin and come to God, intensifies their guilt and assures their final condemnation.

Certainty of judgment is seen in the phrase "the day of God's wrath." Why is the time of the outpouring of the wrath of God called a "day"? In my opinion it is not because it is to unfold in what we would call a twenty-four-hour day, like the day of the invasion of the Normandy beaches in World War II, which one writer called The Longest Day. I think the Bible speaks of various and manifold judgments that may actually be spread out over a considerable period of time. The use of the word day in the phrase "day of wrath" is similar to its use in the phrase "the day of Jesus Christ." In that phrase the word encompasses the events of a thirty-three-year ministry.

Why, then, is the day of God's wrath called a "day"? It is because it is as fixed in God's calendar as any day you can mention—December 7, 1941, to give just one example. That day is determined! So when the day rolls around, the wrath of God will be poured out, whatever you or anyone else may hope to the contrary.

A great German preacher by the name of Walter Luethi wrote:

If the time should ever come (for these things are conceivable nowadays) when we should succeed in demonstrating that black is white and white black, that good is evil and evil good, if we should ever be successful in invalidating the fundamental moral principles of the universe, so that sin were no longer hated and everyone took a fancy to evil, then there would still be a stronghold where evil would be hated, and that is heaven. And there would still be one who has sworn to fight the evil in the world to the last drop of his blood, and that is God, whose "wrath is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and wickedness of men."

Wrath That Is Just

Romans 2:5 makes another point about wrath that we also need to see. God's wrath is a just wrath, not arbitrary or petulant but rather according to "righteous judgment." When Paul mentions judgment he brings in thoughts of God's law and reminds us that the judgment of God will be according to law. Indeed, as he is going to show, those who have done good—it there are any—will receive good from God, while those who have done evil will receive evil.

One great problem with sin is that it leads to self-justification, so that anything that happens to us that we do not like is immediately perceived as being unjust, a reason to fault God for his ordering of the universe. The cry of the rebellious heart is always: "The only thing I want from God is justice."

God forbid that you should receive justice from God!

The justice of God will condemn you. And the terror of the very thought of justice is that God is indeed a just God. The God of all the earth does do right, as Abraham well knew (cf. Gen. 18:25). Sin is punished now in large measure, and it will be punished fully and equitably in the life to come. Do not ask God for justice. Seek mercy. Seek it where salvation from the wrath of God may alone be found.

Wrath Poured Out

Where is that salvation to be found? If God's wrath is deserved by us, proportionate to our sin, as certain as the calendar, just, and even partially disclosed in the natural unfolding of the effects of sin in our lives, how can it possibly be avoided—since we are sinners?

The only place is in Christ, who bore the full measure of the wrath of God in our place. Do we doubt that God's wrath is real and threatening? If we do, we need only look at Jesus in the hours preceding his crucifixion. He was not like Socrates who calmly quaffed the hemlock that was to end his life. Jesus' soul was "troubled" (John 12:27), and he agonized in the Garden of Gethsemane, asking that the "cup" God had prepared for him might be taken away (Matt. 26:3644). Jesus was not afraid of death. He had as much courage in that respect as Socrates. The reason Jesus trembled before death is that his death was not to be like the death of mere mortals. Jesus was not going to die for himself. He was going to die for others. He was going to take upon himself the full measure of the wrath of God that they deserved. He was to drink the cup of wrath to the very dregs—in order that the justice of God might be satisfied and sinners might be spared.

And so it was!

The time came when Jesus was led away to be crucified. He was hung on the cross, midway between earth and heaven, a bridge between sinful man and a holy God. There he, who knew no sin, was made sin for us. There God's wrath was poured out.

For centuries the wrath that men and women had been storing up had been accumulating—like coins in the attic or water behind a great dam. Oh, here and there a little of the flood of God's judgment had sloshed out over the top as God reached the end of his patience in some small area, and a Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed or a Jerusalem was overthrown. But, for the most part, the wrath of God merely accumulated, growing higher and broader and deeper and increasingly more turbulent. Then Jesus died! When he died the dam was opened, and the great weight of the accumulated wrath of God was poured out upon him. He took God's wrath for us. He bore its impounded fury in our place. No wonder his righteous soul shrank back from the atonement. He had never committed a single sin. He was spotless and without blame. Yet because he was blameless and because he was God, he was able to stand in the breech for us and secure our salvation.

God demonstrated clearly that he had! In Jerusalem there was a temple the central feature of which was a room called the Most Holy Place. God was understood to dwell symbolically in that place. Before it hung a thick curtain, symbolizing the barrier that sin has raised between God in his holiness and ourselves in our sin. For anyone to penetrate beyond that barrier meant instant death, as occasionally happened, for the wrath of God must flame out against any sin that would intrude upon holiness. That curtain was torn in two when Jesus died. For centuries it had hung there, proclaiming that God was holy, that man was sinful, and that the way to God was therefore strictly barred. But now that Jesus had died for sin, taking the place of any who would trust him and receive the benefit of his sacrifice, the wrath of God was expended, the way was open, and there was nothing left but God's great love and kindness.

This is the gospel. It is what is open to you if you will approach God, not on the basis of your own good deeds or works, which can only condemn you, but on the basis of Christ's having borne the wrath of God in your place.

That wrath is thundering down the chasm of history toward the day of final judgment, and one day it must break upon you unless you stand before God in Jesus Christ. Martin Luther began his spiritual pilgrimage by fearing God's wrath and then came to find peace in Christ. But he never forgot the reality of the final judgment, and he always warned his hearers to flee from it to Christ. He said in one place, "The Last Day is called the day of wrath and of mercy, the day of trouble and of peace, the day of destruction and of glory." Luther was right. It must be one or the other. If it is to be a day of mercy and peace for you, rather than a day of wrath and trouble, it must be because you are trusting in Christ.

Chapter 26.
Good for the Good, Bad for the Bad

Romans 2:6-11

I am sure you have been in situations in which a person, perhaps yourself, has been caught doing something wrong and has immediately begun to make excuses. "I didn't mean to do it," the accused one might say. Or, "But so-and-so did it first." Or, "You just don't understand my circumstances."

It may be the case in any given instance that the person involved really was "innocent," because of his or her motive or because of circumstances. This is one reason why our judicial system takes so much trouble to determine motives and circumstances in criminal cases. Generally, however, the excuses people make are exactly that, excuses, and they need to be seen for what they really are. This is particularly true in our relationships to God. God accuses us of repressing the truth about himself and of violating his moral law even while we pass judgment on others for doing the same things, but as soon as we hear these truths we begin to make excuses. We claim that we did not know what was required of us, that we did not do what we are accused of doing, or that our motives were actually good. Whenever we find ourselves doing this, we need to rediscover the principles of God's just judgment, which Romans 2 explains.

One important principle is that God's judgment is according to truth (v. 2). On the basis of this principle alone we find ourselves to be guilty. For God, who is the God of truth, declares that we ourselves do what we find deserving of blame in others.

Another principle is that God's judgment is according to our deeds (v. 6). We cannot plead extenuating circumstances with God, because it is what we do that counts. This principle is unfolded in verses 6 through 11 and is developed further in verses 12 through 15.

Two Different Paths

These verses speak of two very different paths. One is the path of good deeds, the end of which is glory, honor, peace, and eternal life. The other is the path of evil, the end of which is trouble, distress, wrath, and anger. The verses teach that a person is on either one path or the other.

Up to this point, particularly as a result of our earlier study of verse 5, a person might conclude that the judgment of God will be a finely graded thing—extending all the way from perfect happiness and bliss on the one hand to utter misery and torment on the other, and that most of us will fall somewhere in between. This is because of the principle of proportionality in judgment, which we developed from the idea of "storing up wrath" in verse 5. As we look at people, we see that some are better than others, and some are worse. Therefore, we reason, in the life to come some should be treated well, some should be treated badly, and the differences should be relative. A person reasoning along these lines might conclude that our future existence in heaven or hell (or whatever) should be somewhat the same as our present existence, which means a mixture of good and bad for most people.

Our text refutes this error. According to these verses, the two paths are mutually exclusive.

The Path of the Just

The first path is that of the person who does good. In our text Paul speaks of such people in two places. Putting together these verses, we have the following: "To those who by persistence in doing good seek glory, honor and immortality, he [God] will give eternal life.... There will be... glory, honor and peace for everyone who does good: first for the Jew, then for the Gentile" (vv. 7, 9-10).

There are two things that such a person is described here as doing: (1) he or she does good and (2) persists in doing good. There are three things that are highlighted as his or her essential motivation: (1) glory, (2) honor, and (3) immortality. Elsewhere in Paul's writings, these terms are used of the Christian's ultimate expectations. "Glory" refers to the transformation of the believer into the image of God's Son, by which the glory of God will be reflected in that person (cf. Rom. 5:2; 8:18, 30; 9:23; 1 Cor. 2:7; 15:43; 2 Cor. 3:12-18; 4:17). "Honor" refers to God's approval of believers, as contrasted with the dishonor and even scorn accorded to them by the world (cf. Heb. 2:7; 1 Peter 1:7). "Immortality" refers to the resurrection hope of God's people (cf. 1 Cor. 15:42, 50, 52-54). One commentator writes, "The three terms have indisputably in the usage of Paul redemptive associations, and this consideration of itself makes it impossible to think that the eschatological aspiration referred to is anything less than that provided by redemptive revelation. The three words define aspiration in terms of the highest reaches of Christian hope."

Likewise, there are four things that God is said to dispense to such people as rewards for their aspirations: (1) eternal life, (2) glory, (3) honor, and (4) peace. "Eternal life" refers to salvation—life in heaven with God rather than damnation. "Glory" and "honor" are two of the goals the people described are striving for. The last term, "peace," seems to parallel "immortality" and therefore points, not to peace with God, which we can enjoy now as the result of Christ's death for us and our resulting justification, or even to that supernatural peace of God, which "transcends all understanding" (Phil. 4:7), but to the peace of heaven. It is deliverance from sin and its conflicts.

But here comes the big question. Has anyone ever chosen this path by his or her own will and then walked along it by his or her own strength? Does anyone of himself or herself actually do good and persist in it apart from the gospel?

I have spoken of the aspirations of the one who walks this path being "Christian" aspirations. Therefore, it is a path walked by Christians. But the question I am asking is whether any of us actually choose this path and then persist in it of ourselves, that is, unaided by the work of the Holy Spirit in turning us from sin to faith in Christ and by joining us to him. I hope that by this time we know the answer to that question. It is no! No one chooses to do good (as God defines it) or seeks glory, honor, or immortality by the path of rigorous morality. In fact, as we will see when we get to Paul's summation of the human condition in Romans 3:10-12:

As it is written:

> "There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God.
>
> All have turned away, they have together become worthless;

there is no one who does good, not even one."

This first path would be a wonderful option if anyone could actually walk along it. But none can! And none do! Therefore, when God judges men and women by an accurate and comprehensive examination of their deeds, as he says he will do, all will be condemned. "For God does not show favoritism" (Rom. 2:11).

The Way of Sinners

The second path is the one all persons naturally take, apart from the intervention of God. It is the way of destruction. Again, Paul speaks of it in two verses of our text. Putting these together we have: "For those who are self-seeking and who reject the truth and follow evil, there will be wrath and anger. There will be trouble and distress for every human being who does evil: first for the Jew, then for the Gentile" (vv. 8-9).

In these verses there are four things that the wicked are said to be or do, which reveal their sinfulness. First, they are "self-seeking." This is the opposite of the first and second "greatest" commandments, which say, "Love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your mind.... [and] your neighbor as yourself (Matt. 22:37, 39). It is the sin of Satan who said, "I will make myself like the Most High" (Isa. 14:14b). Second, they "reject the truth." In the context of these early chapters of Romans, this refers to the rejection of the truth of God revealed in nature and, of course, all other rejections of truth that flow from it. Third, such a person "does evil." Romans 1:29-31 was an exposition of what this means, and there are other like passages later on (cf. Rom. 3:13-18). Fourth, they "follow evil." This could mean simply that they do evil, but this would be redundant in light of verse 9. Here it probably refers to the continuing downward path of evil described in 1:18-32.

What is the result of these choices? Again, there are four items: "wrath and anger" and "trouble and distress." The first two and the last two closely parallel each other, and there is a relationship between the first pair and the second. "Wrath and anger" both concern God's fierce and absolute opposition to all evil. "Trouble and distress" refer to the effect of God's resulting judgment upon evildoers. The words are frequently used of the sufferings of the wicked in the life to come (cf. Isa. 8:22; Zeph. 1:15, 17).

This is what awaits the ungodly and why even those who think that they are better than other people also need the gospel.

The Two Paths in Scripture

Many people find this section of Romans to be extremely difficult, for it seems to be saying that salvation is by good works. If you do good and persist in it, you will be saved. If you do evil, you will be lost. This is not what Romans 2:6-11 is saying, of course. No one is saved other than by the work of Jesus Christ and by faith in him. Nevertheless, it is significant that the inspired apostle does speak of two paths, and he does not encourage us to suppose that a person can reach the goal of eternal life without actually being on the path of righteousness.

Should we be surprised at this? Hardly!

This is the message of Psalm 1, which speaks of the righteous man "who does not walk in the counsel of the wicked or stand in the way of sinners or sit in the seat of mockers," but rather delights "in the law of the LORD," and speaks also of the wicked man who is "like chaff that the wind blows away" (vv. 1, 2, 4). This has present implications. But, like Paul's parallel thoughts in Romans, it has eternal implications as well. "Therefore the wicked will not stand in the judgment, nor sinners in the assembly of the righteous" (v. 5), and "the wicked will perish" (v. 6).

Matthew 19:16-21 records that the Lord Jesus Christ replied in similar terms to the rich young man who asked him, "Teacher, what good thing must I do to get eternal life?"

We might have expected Jesus to reply that the man should have faith in him. But instead Jesus said to obey the commandments: "'Do not murder, do not commit adultery, do not steal, do not give false testimony, honor your father and mother,' and 'love your neighbor as yourself.'" The young man thought he had already done this. "All these I have kept," he said.

Again, instead of telling him to have faith in himself or even pointing out that he had not actually kept these commandments as God intended he should, Jesus merely brought to mind the young man's debilitating love of possessions: "If you want to be perfect, go, sell your possessions and give to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven. Then come, follow me" (v. 21).

The introduction to the parable of the good Samaritan is along the same lines. An expert on the law tried to test Jesus by asking the same question posed by the rich young ruler: "Teacher, what must I do to inherit eternal life?" (Luke 10:25).

Jesus pointed him to the law: "'Love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your strength and with all your mind'; and 'Love your neighbor as yourself'" (v. 27). The parable that followed was given to show who one's neighbor is and what it means to love him.

The most striking of Jesus' words setting out the two paths are those that come at the end of his last great sermon before the crucifixion, the sermon preached on the Mount of Olives:

[Jesus said,] "When the Son of Man comes in his glory, and all the angels with him, he will sit on his throne in heavenly glory. All the nations will be gathered before him, and he will separate the people one from another as a shepherd separates the sheep from the goats. He will put the sheep on his right hand and the goats on his left.

"Then the King will say to those on his right, 'Come, you who are blessed by my Father; take your inheritance, the kingdom prepared for you since the creation of the world. For I was hungry and you gave me something to eat, I was thirsty and you gave me something to drink, I was a stranger and you took me in, I needed clothes and you clothed me, I was sick and you looked after me, I was in prison and you came to visit me.'

"Then the righteous will answer him, 'Lord, when did we see you hungry and feed you, or thirsty and give you something to drink? When did we see you a stranger and invite you in, or needing clothes and clothe you? When did we see you sick or in prison and go to visit you?'

"The King will reply, 'I tell you the truth, whatever you did for one of the least of these brothers of mine, you did for me.'

"Then he will say to those on his left, 'Depart from me, you who are cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels. For I was hungry and you gave me nothing to eat, I was thirsty and you gave me nothing to drink, I was a stranger and you did not invite me in, I needed clothes and you did not clothe me, I was sick and in prison and you did not look after me.'

"They will also answer, 'Lord, when did we see you hungry or thirsty or a stranger or needing clothes or sick or in prison, and did not help you?'

"He will reply, 'I tell you the truth, whatever you did not do for one of the least of these, you did not do for me.'

"Then they will go away to eternal punishment, but the righteous to eternal life."

Matthew 25:31-46

I do not want anyone to think that I am substituting good works for faith as a means of salvation. I am not. If good works are even added to faith —not to mention being substituted for faith—as a grounds of salvation, this becomes a false gospel and deserves the anathema Paul pronounces on such error (Gal. 1:8-9). Salvation is achieved by Christ for all who are to be saved, and it becomes theirs by simple faith in him and his work. But we must not mock God either! It is an equal error, as Paul also shows, to think that one can be saved by faith and then continue down the same path he or she has been treading, doing no good works at all. A person doing that is not saved, regardless or his or her profession.

Here is the wonder of the Christian gospel. On the one hand, it is utterly by grace received through faith—and even that faith is of grace (cf. Eph. 2:8). No one who is saved can possibly boast of anything. We are saved on the sole grounds of Jesus' death in our place. But, at the same time and on the other hand, those who are saved by grace through faith are placed on a path of righteousness where they do indeed perform such good works as the world about them cannot even begin to dream.

That is why Jesus could say, "For I tell you that unless your righteousness surpasses that of the Pharisees and the teachers of the law, you will certainly not enter the kingdom of heaven" (Matt.

5:20). "Righteousness" in this verse means "good deeds." So the teaching is that the people of God will—if they truly are the people of God—do good works surpassing even the best of the righteous (but unsaved) people of Christ's day.

Getting on the Right Path

What can you do if you are on the wrong path? How do you get out of the company of the wicked—who are rejecting the truth, pursuing evil, and thereby treasuring up wrath against the day of God's judgment—and into the company of those who are doing good deeds and who seek glory, honor, and immortality? Let me ask that twofold question again more clearly: What do you do if you are on a wrong path in order to get off the wrong path and onto a right one? Here are some specific answers:

1. Recognize that you are on the wrong path. Nobody is ever going to get off a wrong path and onto a right one as long as he or she entertains some hope that the present road will eventually lead to where he or she wants to go. So long as you think the way of your own self-seeking and of the rejection of the biblical truth about God is going to get you to happiness or fulfillment or salvation in the life to come (or whatever), you are never going to take even the first small step toward being saved. You must begin by recognizing that you are on the wrong path and that the end of that path is destruction.

2. Admit that the path itself will not change. Strangely, some travelers will admit that they are on a wrong road, but rather than go back to the right one they keep hoping that the road itself will change or that they will find a fork they can take that will get them to their proper destination. That will not happen in the physical world—nor in the spiritual! The path of self-seeking will always take you further from God and happiness. It is the downward path of Romans 1. It ends in the wrath of Romans 2.

3. Turn around and face the opposite direction. This is a way of speaking about what the Bible calls repentance or conversion. "Repentance" means to have a change of mind, to think differently and act differently as a result. "Conversion" literally means to turn around. You need to reject the way you are going and choose a different path entirely.

4. Commit yourself to the Lord Jesus Christ, trusting in his death on your behalf. This is the fullest meaning of faith, which does not stop merely with an intellectual assent to certain truths about God or Jesus but involves a commitment to Jesus as one's personal Lord and Savior. You must be able to say, as Thomas did when Jesus appeared to him a week after his resurrection, "My Lord and my God!" (John 20:28).

5. Get on with following Jesus and obeying his commands. When you are wandering down the path of your own self-seeking and finally begin to realize what you are doing, you sense that you are hopelessly far from the true path—and in a sense you are. As long as you continue as you are going you will always be far from it. God seems infinitely removed. The return to God seems hopeless. But when you stop and turn around, beginning to seek God rather than your own will and pleasure, you will find (much to your surprise) that Jesus is not far away at all. In fact, you find him right there beside you. It was because he was with you and was calling you that you even turned around. That is why in the Bible repentance and faith always go together, so closely together that it is often impossible to say which comes first and which second. To believe on Jesus is to turn from sin—and vice versa.

And there is something else, too.

In the same instant you turn from sin and believe on Jesus, you find that you are already on the right road. You do not have to seek it, because the first step on that road is believing on Jesus. It is being where he is. He starts with you at that precise point. Therefore, as you step forward you find the darkness dispel, the light break through, and a glimpse of glory, honor, immortality, and eternal life rise up before you as your goal.

Chapter 27.
Not Hearers Only, But Doers

Romans 2:12-15

I mentioned previously that every preacher who spends time trying to answer questions people have about Christianity has heard the question about the heathen over and over again. "What about the poor heathen in a far-off jungle who has never heard about Jesus Christ? Will God condemn him for failing to believe on a person about whom he has not even heard?"

I have answered that question in various ways over the years. One of the answers I have sometimes given, particularly to those who are not yet Christians, is that if someday we get to heaven and discover that a number or even all of these untaught natives have arrived in heaven despite our failure to tell them about Jesus, all we will be able to do is praise God for his great mercy and unfathomable ways. We will be happy! But if, on the contrary, we get to heaven and discover that not one of the untaught heathen is there, all of them having been condemned for failing to do what they knew they should do (on the basis of the natural revelation), we will still praise God for his mercy (to those to whom it was extended) and acknowledge his justice in the heathens' case, since the Judge of all the earth always does do right (cf. Gen. 18:25).

However, when I come to Romans 2:12, as we do now, I am reproved for this answer. For the text does not suggest that the heathen may somehow get to heaven in spite of their ignorance of the gospel, but rather that they will be condemned like the others. Not for failing to believe on Jesus, of whom they have not heard, of course! But for failing to do what they knew they should do, even apart from God's special revelation.

Verse 12 of our text supports this view, using the powerful word perish. "All who sin apart from the law will perish apart from the law, and all who sin under the law will be judged by the law."

Principles of Judgment

It can hardly be otherwise, of course, given the nature of man and the principles of God's judgment spelled out in this important second chapter of Romans. It is true that after reading verses 7 and 10 we might have some excuse for thinking that God may save some persons apart from the gospel, since those verses describe the hypothetical case of those who do good by God's standards. "To those who by persistence in doing good seek glory, honor and immortality, he will give eternal life. [There will be] glory, honor and peace for everyone who does good: first for the Jew, then for the Gentile." This might suggest that there are some untaught persons who, in spite of their ignorance of the gospel, nevertheless do good, strive for immortality, and therefore will be saved. But the fact that this is an entirely hypothetical case is proved by verse 12. If anyone actually could persist in doing good, there would be the reward of eternal life with God. But no one does! Therefore, "all who sin apart from the law will also perish."

I mentioned the principles of God's judgment as a reason why no one will be saved without Christ. Based on Romans 2, it is worth reviewing them at this point.

1. God's judgment is according to truth (v. 2). Human judgment tries to live up to this standard.

Witnesses in our courts are required to "tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." But obviously human judgment is at best according to partial truth, and it is often misled entirely when witnesses inadvertently misrepresent the facts or lie about them. God's judgment is infinitely superior to human judgment at this point. It is according to full knowledge and perfect truth, because all secrets are known and all hearts are open to God. And no one will be able to lie in God's court.

2. God's judgment is proportionate to human sins (v. 5). This is why Paul speaks of sinners as "storing up wrath" against the day of God's wrath. Those who sin much will be punished much. Those who sin less will be judged accordingly.

3. God's judgment is according to righteousness (v. 5). Paul points to "his righteous judgment." There will be nothing wrong about it. It will be according to the highest possible standard and a faultless moral code.

4. God's judgment is impartial (v. 11). In human courts we often find the accused hoping to receive preferential treatment for one reason or another, and judges sometimes comply. Not so with God. At the final judgment all will be judged according to the same impartial standards and procedures, for, as Paul writes, "God does not show favoritism."

5. God's judgment is according to people's deeds (vv. 6-10, 12-15). Considering the number of verses dealing with this principle, this must have been the most important point of all according to Paul's way of thinking. Indeed, it is found throughout Romans 2, even in verses that seem to be making another point. Take verse 1, as an example. Paul is writing of persons who try to excuse their wrongdoing by saying that they have a firmer sense of what is right and wrong than other people. Paul's reply is that these persons are nevertheless guilty, because they "do the same things." That is, they are judged on the basis of their actual deeds. That phrase—"do the same things"—is also implied in verse 2 and repeated in verse 3. Finally, in verse 6, Paul says, "God 'will give to each person according to what he has done.' " It is not what we know or even what we say we do that matters. It is how we actually perform.

Sinners Under the Law

How hard it is for our perverted sense of being righteous in God's sight to die! As we read these verses we can discern at once what Paul was dealing with and how he is replying. I said earlier, when we began to study Romans 2, that in my judgment Paul is dealing chiefly with the virtuous pagan in the first half of the chapter (vv. 1-16) and with the Jew in the second half (vv. 17-29). But, although this is generally true, he nevertheless is also probably thinking of the Jew in this section. Paul can undoubtedly visualize the Jew's response. He has spoken of those who are "under," or exposed, to the law as perishing. But the Jew would not want to accept this. According to Jewish teaching, salvation was by the law. The pious Jew spent long hours meditating on the law and could always be found in the synagogue attending to its reading and exposition. I suppose Paul could almost hear the Jew gearing up to rattle off his accomplishments.

"I am not like all other men—robbers, evildoers, adulterers—or even like this tax collector."—"I fast twice a week."—"I give a tenth of all I get" (cf. Luke 18:12).

"All these I have kept since I was a boy" (cf. Luke 18:21).

As a matter of fact, Paul had thought like this himself before he met Christ: "... circumcised on the eighth day, of the people of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew of Hebrews; in regard to the law, a Pharisee; as for zeal, persecuting the church; as for legalistic righteousness, faultless" (Phil. 3:5-6).

Later, Paul is going to deal with the religious person's false hopes more directly, but here he focuses on such people's actual performance. "I know you know the law," Paul is acknowledging. "But do you keep it?" He reminds them that "it is not those who hear the law who are righteous in God's sight, but it is those who obey the law who will be declared righteous" (v. 13).

Not hearers only, but doers! That is the point of this passage, and it is the point at which each of us falls down. At the time of the release of the Tower Report on the investigation of arms sales to Iran, the newspapers carried a headline in which President Ronald Reagan was quoted as admitting, "Everyone fell short." That is it exactly—except that in the matter of our standing before God, the outcome is of far greater importance. Since we are condemned by the law, all of us having failed to live up to its standards, we must seek salvation in another way entirely.

Sinners Apart From the Law

There is another problem here: the problem of Gentiles (whom Paul had chiefly in mind) who would excuse themselves on the grounds that, unlike the Jews, they had not been given the law. They would agree with the justice of God in the Jews' condemnation. God had told the Jews how to live, and they had not done it. Indeed, they were even hypocritical about it, which is what Paul seems to bring out in the latter half of the chapter (vv. 17-24). The Jews had sinned under the law. But the Gentiles did not have the law of God. How, then, could they be condemned by it? In fact, how could they even be accused of sinning? Yet Paul wrote, "All who sin apart from the law will also perish apart from law" (v. 12a). How can there be sin apart from a divine law code or revelation?

Paul's answer is in verses 14 and 15. It has two parts. First, the Gentiles, even though they do not possess the law of God given to the Jewish people, nevertheless have a law "written on their hearts." Second, they also possess "consciences" that tell them they ought to obey this law and condemn them when they do not.

This is a very important point, for it introduces for the first time in Paul's letter what the older theologians called "the moral law" or "the law of nature." Earlier we dealt with "natural revelation," which means the revelation that God has given of himself in creation. (See chapter 15 of this volume.) It involves his "eternal power and divine nature" (Rom. 1:20); that is, confirms that there is a Supreme Being. But that is not what is involved here. In the earlier case, the natural revelation was seen to be sufficient to condemn all men and women, because on its basis they are obliged to seek out, thank, and worship the true God, which they do not do. But this goes beyond the natural revelation in that it involves a moral code or order that, Paul says, is possessed by all people. They may not have the revealed law of God. But they have something like it. They have "a law for themselves," which condemns them.

No person has talked about this moral law more effectively in recent years than the late Cambridge professor C. S. Lewis. It is the initial argument in his classic defense of the faith, Mere Christianity. Lewis begins with the observation that when people argue with one another, an angry person almost always appeals to some basic standard of behavior that the other person is assumed to recognize: "They say things like this: 'How'd you like it if anyone did the same to you?'—'That's my seat, I was there first'—'Leave him alone, he isn't doing you any harm'—'Why should you shove in first?'—'Give me a bit of your orange, I gave you a bit of mine'—'Come on, you promised.' People say things like that every day, educated people as well as uneducated, and children as well as grown-ups."

What interested Lewis about these remarks is that the people making them are not merely saying that the other person's behavior just does not happen to suit them, but rather that the behavior of the other person is wrong:

The man who makes [these remarks]... is appealing to some kind of standard of behavior which he expects the other man to know about. And the other man very seldom replies, "To hell with your standard." Nearly always he tries to make out that what he has been doing does not really go against the standard, or that if it does there is some special excuse. He pretends there is some special reason in this particular case why the person who took the seat first should not keep it, or that things were quite different when he was given the bit of orange, or that something has turned up which lets him off keeping his promise. It looks, in fact, very much as if both parties had in mind some kind of Law or Rule of fair play or decent behavior or morality or whatever you like to call it, about which they really agreed. And they have. If they had not, they might, of course, fight like animals, but they could not quarrel in the human sense of the word. Quarrelling means trying to show that the other man is in the wrong. And there would be no sense in trying to do that unless you and he had some sort of agreement as to what Right and Wrong are, just as there would be no sense in saying that a footballer had committed a foul unless there was some agreement about the rules of football.

Lewis had a marvelously fresh gift for stating deep things simply. But it cannot escape us that this is precisely what Paul is saying in Romans 2:14-15, in reference to the Gentiles, though in more theological terms. It is true that Gentiles did not have the Jews' law. But they had a law within, a law that did not merely say that some kinds of behavior seem to work better than others or produce better responses from other people, but, rather, went far beyond that either to accuse or excuse them of wrongdoing.

Witnesses for the Prosecution

There are three important witnesses against the natural man in these verses. We must see what they are.

1. The law of nature. Lewis points out that today the law (or laws) of nature usually refers to physical phenomena like gravity, the bonding of elements, combustion, or nuclear energy. But, when the ancient theologians used this term, it meant, as it does here, "the law of human nature." The law of human nature is like natural physical law in that it comes from without and is meant to govern the way things operate or function. But there is this difference: In the physical realm an object has no choice as to whether or not it will observe the physical law. Those laws always operate. But in the human or moral realm people do have a choice, and the law is universally violated.

I know that many people object to belief in a universal moral law, pointing to the fact that some (the insane, for example) do not seem to be aware of it or to the fact that moral standards vary among different races or cultures. But those objections are not valid. It is true that there are people who do not seem to be aware of moral standards, and the insane are among them. But the very fact that we call such persons "insane" shows that we nevertheless recognize and want to adhere to the standards, regardless of what the problem may be in that individual's case. If an insane man commits a crime, we usually excuse him; but we do not excuse others. The problem is the person, not the standard. Again, although there are obvious differences in the way various races and cultures look at morals, there is nevertheless far more agreement than we might think at first. Regardless of the culture, there is (with few exceptions) a general regard for life, honor, bravery, selflessness, and such things. And the law codes and moral treatises of the ancients are remarkably like our own.

Regardless of what people say or even how they act, the real proof of the moral law is in people's objection when they perceive themselves to be mistreated. If they speak of "unfair treatment," as all people do at one time or another, "have they not let the cat out of the bag and shown that, whatever they say, they really know the Law of Nature just like anyone else?" as Lewis argues.

2. Conscience. The second accuser in these verses is the conscience, which Paul introduces as "also bearing witness" (v. 15). Some have confused the law of nature and the conscience, but they are two very different concepts. The first is an objective standard of which all are aware; it involves knowledge, knowledge of the right. The conscience is the part of our being that tells us we ought to do the right thing personally. Robert Haldane says, "Knowledge shows what is right; the conscience approves of it and condemns the contrary."

3. The Memory. The third of the prosecuting witnesses in man is something we have not touched on yet, but which is introduced in the very last phrase we are studying: "their thoughts now accusing, now even defending them" (v. 15). It is the memory. Why is the memory so important? Obviously because it is something within ourselves that can (and will) condemn us, even without an external, judging word from God.

What a picture we have here! Three accusers, combining their witness to prove that even the person without the law will perish!

Donald Grey Barnhouse was known for his vivid and often very original illustrations, and at this point in his treatment of Romans he refers to the famous Revolutionary War painting "The Spirit of '76." It shows a drummer, a standard-bearer, and a fifer marching briskly down the road. Barnhouse says that our conduct (measured by the moral law), our conscience, and our memory are like those figures:

Your conduct beats the drum that declares by your resounding good works that you know there is a divine law. Your conscience waves the flag that reminds you that often you have trampled your principles in the dust as you rushed past on your way to complete the desires of your own will. And the fife of your memory shrieks its refrain to remind you that you have sinned. The excuses and accusations of your thought run like shrill arpeggios in the counterpoint of your guilt. And the trio, conduct, conscience and mind, are all in step, in a perfect unison of condemnation because you have followed the road of your own will, refusing the road that forks at the cross of Jesus Christ that will lead you, if you follow it, even into eternal life.

Shall Not Perish

That is the point to which we should be led, of course. We should be led away from attempts to justify ourselves by our works, as the Jews did, or excuse ourselves as people who do not know what we should do, as the Gentiles did. Instead we should turn to Christ, where alone salvation may be found.

At the beginning of this study I spent some time talking about Romans 2:12, which says, "All who sin apart from the law will also perish apart from the law." I made the point that we must never think any person will ever be saved in any way other than by faith in Jesus Christ. Apart from him they will "perish." But whenever we see that word perish, with all its proper force and terror, we must also think of probably the best-known verse in the Bible, John 3:16, in which Jesus uses that word but says that it need not be our end: "For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life."

John 3:16 speaks of two destinies: eternal life and perishing, the very ends Paul speaks about in Romans 2 (vv. 7, 12). From birth we are all headed toward the second end, destined to perish miserably, without God and without hope (cf. Eph. 2:12). But Jesus died to make another and entirely different destiny possible. It is the way of atonement, with Jesus dying in our place, taking our punishment for sin upon himself. This is a wonderful end. It is, as Lewis says, "a thing of unspeakable comfort." Still, it does not begin with comfort. It begins with the knowledge of sin, so that we might turn from sin to faith in Jesus.

Chapter 28.
All Hearts Open, All Desires Known

Romans 2:16

I am not very attracted to liturgical prayers because, although liturgical language is often quite beautiful (like that of Shakespeare's plays), the mere repetition of prayers tends, in my opinion, toward a love of language for its own sake and not meaning. There are exceptions, of course, and sometimes a particular phrase sticks in mind as expressing a great truth admirably.

I think of one such expression as we come to Romans 2:16: "This will take place on the day when God will judge men's secrets through Jesus Christ, as my gospel declares." The main idea is the uncovering of human secrets by God at the final judgment, and the liturgical expression of that truth, which I love, is from the opening collect of the Anglican Order for the Administration of Holy Communion. It begins, "Almighty God, unto whom all hearts are open, all desires known, and from whom no secrets are hid...." I think that is a powerful expression—and helpful if it is used rightly. It reminds us that in a world ordered by an omniscient God there are, in the final analysis, no secrets. We may have secrets here, hiding from others what we are or do. But there will be no secrets on the day when all secrets will be brought to light before God.

The All-Knowing God

God knows all things even now, of course. God spoke of the Jewish people to Isaiah, saying, "For I know their works and their thoughts" (Isa. 66:18 KJV). King David wrote of himself:

> O LORD, you have searched me and you know me.
> You know when I sit and when I rise; you perceive my thoughts from afar.
> You discern my going out and my lying down; you are familiar with all my ways.
> Before a word is on my tongue you know it completely, O LORD.

Psalm 139:1-4

The author of Hebrews declared, "Nothing in all creation is hidden from God's sight. Everything is uncovered and laid bare before the eyes of him to whom we must give account" (Heb. 4:13).

This is one reason why unregenerate people repress their knowledge of God, as Romans 1:18-20 declares they do. We looked at this when we were studying those verses. If God knows all things, as he must if he is God, he knows us not as we wish to project ourselves before others but as we really are, and none of us can stand the thought of such perfect and penetrating knowledge.

I pointed out in that earlier study that this is one of the characteristics of human nature perceived by the existentialist philosopher and playwright Jean-Paul Sartre. In his analysis of man, Sartre rooted man's uniqueness in his being a subject, who observes, rather than an object, which is observed. A subject observes and acts. An object is observed and acted upon. The former pleases us. The latter is disturbing. In one of his works, Sartre imagines himself as a man who is standing in a hallway, looking through a keyhole at another person. As long as he is the observer and the other person is the object observed, Sartre is content. He is in control. But suddenly he hears footsteps in the hall, turns around, and realizes that someone has been looking at him as he has looked through the keyhole. Now he is no longer content. He is no longer in control, and he is overcome with feelings of shame, fear, guilt, and embarrassment. According to Sartre, to be fully human, man must be the ultimate subject rather than an object.

But what about God? How can one escape being an object before him, since God sees us always? Sartre's solution was to banish God from his own private universe, to become an atheist.

In a series of essays called The Words, Sartre tells how he came to this point. He was a child at the time. He had been raised a Catholic, and as one of his assignments in the Catholic school he attended he had written a paper on the Passion of Christ. When the awards were presented for these papers, Sartre was given only a silver medal rather than the gold. He resented it and blamed God. Sartre wrote, "This disappointment drove me into impiety.... For several years more, I maintained public relations with the Almighty. But privately, I ceased to associate with him."

Then he tells how, during these years, there was a time when he felt that God existed: "I had been playing with matches and burned a small rug. I was in the process of covering up my crime when suddenly God saw me. I felt his gaze inside my head and on my hands. I whirled about in the bathroom, horribly visible, a live target. Indignation saved me. I flew into a rage against so crude an indiscretion, I blasphemed, I muttered like my grandfather: 'God damn it, God damn it, God damn it.' He never looked at me again."

That story alone explains the life and philosophy of Sartre. Yet it is sad and tragic. Sad, because it is mistaken. Sartre says, "He [God] never looked at me again." But in reality God never ceased to look at Sartre.

God looks on all things and sees them perfectly. Actually, it was Sartre who had ceased to look at God. Tragic, because by turning his back on God, Sartre turned from the one being in the universe who could have helped him.

I said earlier that Sartre's solution to the problem of being beneath the gaze of God and of being overcome by natural feelings of shame, fear, guilt, and embarrassment was to banish God from his universe—to become an atheist. But it does not require a philosophical genius to realize that this is only whistling in the dark. If there is a God, as even Sartre indirectly attests, then he cannot be so banished, certainly not by human beings. Moreover, if God is omniscient, as he must be if he is God, then not only has he seen all the evil deeds we have done and known the evil thoughts we have had. He also remembers them. And one day he will produce them for exposure and judgment.

It is what Paul speaks about when he writes of "the day when God will judge man's secrets through Jesus Christ."

Naked Before God and Man

I now take you from that day of judgment to one of the very first days of human history. It is the day when Adam and Eve stood before God in the Garden of Eden shortly after having sinned by eating of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. The story is in Genesis 3, but the theme is set in the previous chapter, before the fall, where it is said: "The man and his wife were both naked, and they felt no shame" (Gen. 2:25).

I have said many times in considering this story that I have no doubt that this was a literal physical nakedness. Otherwise the matter of their making fig-leaf clothes for themselves, which we are told about later, has no meaning. But it was a psychological nakedness, too. Adam and Eve were not ashamed in their nakedness before they sinned. It was only after they had sinned that they were conscious of it.

Why were they unashamed before the fall? The answer is obvious. Nakedness has to do with exposure, not only with external, physical exposure but, more importantly, with internal exposure. They were not ashamed in their nakedness before the fall because they had nothing to be ashamed about.

1. They were unashamed before God. Adam and Eve had done nothing that would have been any cause for shame. They were without sin at the time, and their relationship to God was one of utter openness. They delighted to see God when he came to them in the garden. They conversed with him freely. We cannot do this, of course, and the reason we cannot do it is sin. Sin causes us to hide from God, as Adam and Eve later did when God came to them. Sin causes us to flee from him.

Some flee into atheism, as Sartre did.

Some flee into materialism.

Even Christians run away from God when they persist in sin.

Donald Grey Barnhouse had been preaching on a college campus and had been invited to speak in one of the women's dorms following a meeting that had been held elsewhere that evening. When he finished, one of the young women remained behind, obviously offended by his teaching. Her face was scowling. "I used to believe that stuff, but I don't believe it anymore," she said.

Barnhouse asked, "What class are you in?"

"I'm a freshman."

"What kind of a family do you come from?" The girl said that she came from a Christian family.

"Do you have a Bible?"

"Yes."

"Do you read it?"

"I used to read it," the student said, "but I don't read it anymore. I told you I no longer believe that stuff."

"Can you remember when you stopped reading it?" Barnhouse asked. The girl said that she had stopped reading it around Thanksgiving. "Tell me," said Barnhouse, "what happened in your life around November the tenth?" The girl began to cry, and it soon came out that at that time she had started to live in sin with a young man, and it was because of this that she could no longer tolerate the gaze of God when she read her Bible.

Wesley said it well: "The Bible will keep you from sin, or sin will keep you from the Bible." This is because the God who confronts us in Scripture is the holy God before whom all hearts are open.

2. They were unashamed before each other. Before the fall, it was not only God before whom Adam and Eve were unashamed. They were also unashamed before each other, and for the same reason. They had nothing to be ashamed about. They had not lied to one another. They had not falsely accused one another, as they later did, trying to shift the blame for their sin to others. They had not harmed one another. As a result they could be completely themselves. Today no one can be completely open in a relationship. In some good relationships we come close. But still, there is a residue of ourselves that we keep hidden even from a spouse or very close friend. Why? Because we are ashamed of ourselves, and we fear that if we reveal the fault, the other will cease to love us or respect us.

3. They were unashamed in their own eyes. Both Adam and Eve were without shame as they looked on themselves. In those first days, Adam could look at himself and know he had nothing to hide. And Eve could look at herself and know she had nothing to hide.

What about us? Today, most of us will hardly stop our mad race through life long enough even to take a brief glance at who we are. Generations ago, people lived more slowly; they could reflect on who they were and where they were going. Modern life has intensified the pace. Most of us cannot even come into a room and sit down for two minutes without feeling the need to snap on the television set or radio to fill our heads with stimulation—anything to keep from thinking. "All the news, all the time!" That is what we want. And the reason we want it is that we do not want to consider that we are naked before God and that nothing is hidden from him before whom we must give account.

Hiding from Thee

What we are and do comes out in the continuation of the Genesis story. Adam and Eve sinned, in spite of the warning God had given them concerning the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. So when God came to them in the garden they hid themselves—or at least they tried to.

Actually, they had already tried to hide, first from themselves and then from each other. They did it by trying to make clothing from fig leaves. Sometimes when people are trying to be funny they speak of prostitution as the oldest human profession, but they are wrong in this. The oldest profession is not prostitution but the clothing industry. Later, sin showed itself in sexual sins as well as in other ways. But the very first effect of sin was the opening of the eyes of Adam and Eve to perceive that they were naked, in response to which "they sewed fig leaves together and made coverings for themselves" (Gen. 3:7). In other words, as sinners they found their psychological exposure intolerable and tried to cover up. At first they used leaves. Later, when God appeared to question them, they used evasions and excuses and tried to put the blame on God.

I have sometimes spoken of these leaves as good works and of the attempt to be covered by them as "fig-leaf righteousness." It was a way of saying, "We are all right. We are not sinners. We are good people." Well, as long as it was just the two of them, they got by, since they were both sinners. But the fig leaves were inadequate when they finally stood before God, just as our good works will be useless at the judgment.

I do not know what happened to those fig leaves when God finally appeared to Adam and Eve and called them to stand before him. Perhaps they fell off. But whether or not they did, they might as well have, for nothing could have hidden from God what they were or had done. So it will be in our judgment. We commit our sins in secret. We present a false face to the public. We declare that God does not exist. We brand ourselves atheists. We think we are safe. But we do not need reporters hiding in the bushes to observe what we are doing and report it in the National Enquirer. We do not need a talk-show host to reveal our cover-up transactions. God knows. God remembers. And one day he "will judge men's secrets through Jesus Christ." What a dreadful last scene to human history!

The Psalmist said, "If you, O LORD, kept a record of sins [and he does], O LORD, who could stand?" (Ps. 130:3).

Naked—Yet Clothed by God

I come to the climax of the story of Adam and Eve's sin, and it is chiefly for this that I tell it. God told Adam and Eve that the punishment for their eating of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil would be death. But when he confronted them in their sin and exposed it, the death he had promised fell not on them but on a substitute. And here is a truly thrilling point: It was with the skin of the substitute that they were clothed.

The Bible tells it tersely, saying, "The LORD God made garments of skin for Adam and his wife and clothed them" (Gen. 3:21). The text does not indicate what animals God killed in order to get the skins with which he clothed Adam and Eve, but in view of the development of this idea later in the Bible, I tend to think that they were lambs and that the skins were lambskins. Certainly, the incident is meant to point to Jesus Christ as the only sufficient atonement for sin, and Jesus is pictured as "the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world" (John 1:29). Whatever they were, God must have killed animals in order to have the skins with which he clothed our first parents.

Think what this must have meant to Adam and Eve. Their first thought, when they saw the animals lying dead in front of them, must have been, "So this is what death is!" They must have regarded the scene with horror. God had told them, "You must not eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, for when you eat of it you will surely die" (Gen. 2:17). But if they had not witnessed death before this, which we are to suppose they had not, they probably did not take this threat seriously. Now suddenly death was before them, and they must have sensed for the very first time how serious it is to disobey God. In that instant it must have dawned on them that if death is the result of sin, then sin is far worse than anything they could possibly have imagined. Moreover, they were sinners, and their sin was damnable.

But there is something else that must have gripped them in that instant, and that was a deep and growing wonder at God's mercy. God had told them that their sin would be punished by death. And it was! But wonder of wonders, it was not themselves who died but the animals. They had broken God's law. God had every right to take their lives in forfeit of his broken commandment. But instead, he showed that there could be a substitution. An innocent could die for them.

And there was another marvel, too. They were exposed as sinners. All the secrets they had were revealed. But although their sins were exposed—their nakedness was a symbol of it—they did not have to remain naked. Rather, God clothed them with the skins of the slain animals. So they were both exposed and covered at the same time.

This is what must be done for us. We cannot escape from our guilt. The guilt is there and is well documented. We can try to deny it, but everything in our lives, culture, and psychological makeup will refute the denial. We show our guilt by doors and blinds and shower curtains and the clothing industry—as well as by our calculated attempts to hide from one another. These patterns testify to the truthfulness of the Word of God. But the gospel tells us that God deals with this guilt. He does not just deny, forgive, or forget it. He deals with it in Jesus Christ.

Christ died for sin; the penalty of sin has been paid. Now God clothes those who have believed in Christ with Christ's righteousness:

> Jesus, thy blood and righteousness
> My beauty are, my glorious dress; 'Midst flaming worlds, in these arrayed, With joy shall I lift up my head.

Whoever you are, the day is coming when you will stand before the judgment bar of God, and God will judge even the deepest secrets of your heart. How will you manage in that day? You can appear before God in only one of two ways. Either you will stand before him in the righteousness of Christ, your sin atoned for by his death, or you will stand in the horror of your own spiritual and moral nakedness. The Bible speaks of people who will be like that. It describes their terror. "Then the kings of the earth, the princes, the generals, the rich, the mighty, and every slave and every free man hid in caves and among the rocks of the mountains. They called to the mountains and the rocks, 'Fall on us and hide us from the face of him who sits on the throne and from the wrath of the Lamb! For the great day of their wrath has come, and who can stand?'" (Rev. 6:15-17).

Do not wait until the day when God will expose and judge all secrets. Flee to Christ for his righteousness today.

Chapter 29.
The Second Excuse: Religion

Romans 2:17-24

It should be evident from study of the earlier portions of Romans that nearly everything that has been said thus far applies to all men and women. That is, it applies to ourselves—apart from the supernatural work of God in us through the Holy Spirit. Regardless of our achievements, our vaunted moral standards or our outward position in life, we are all in exactly the same situation as the hedonistic pagan described in Romans 1. We have suppressed the knowledge of God disclosed to us in nature and have therefore launched ourselves along the path of moral and spiritual decline that the chapter describes. The propensity to condemn others for what we ourselves do, which is unfolded in Romans 2, also describes us.

But we are great at making distinctions, particularly when these are to our advantage, and it is to another of these self-serving "excuses" that we now come. We have already seen one such distinction, used by the moralist, who admits that there are indeed pagans like those portrayed in Romans 1 but who denies that he or she is like them—because the person knows better and has "standards." (See my chapter 13.) The new distinction, the one that enters in here, is made by individuals who consider themselves to be religious.

In Paul's day such a person was the Jew, which is how Paul begins the section: "Now you, if you call yourself a Jew...." Today the person who fits this category could be an ardent Fundamentalist, any churchgoing Protestant (regardless of denomination), a devout Catholic, or some other variety of "religious" individual.

Let's imagine what this religious person might be thinking. He or she has been listening to Paul describe the pagan morality of the day and has been quick to join Paul in condemning it. "I am glad that you have spoken as you have," this person might tell Paul, "because things really are in a terrible state today. The divorce rate is up. Our political leaders lie to us. Nobody wants to work. The schools are breaking down. Crime, venereal disease, prostitution, gambling and other vices are increasing. Moreover, if God is a God of justice and truth, as we suppose he must be, he will certainly judge all these wicked people severely. So preach to them. The drug dealers, the crime lords, the politicians—all, no doubt, will profit from your gospel.

"But leave me out of it! I am a very religious person, and my religious commitments exempt me from your blanket condemnations. I have been a churchgoing person all my life. I have been baptized and confirmed. I go to communion. I give to the church's support."

Paul replies that these are genuinely good things and not to be ignored. "But you still need the gospel," he says.

"Why?"

"Because God is not interested in outward things alone—things like church membership, the sacraments, stewardship—but rather in what is within."

God says, "Man looks at the outward appearance, but the LORD looks at the heart" (1 Sam. 16:7b).

A Catalogue of Advantages

I have put this argument in simple contemporary language, but when we turn to Romans 2:17-20 we find the Jew (the "religious person" of Paul's day) to be making eight important claims. Four are about the Jews' special spiritual advantages. Four are about their religious privileges. The claims having to do with the Jews' spiritual advantages are:

1. God has given us his law.
2. He has entered into a special relationship with us.
3. Because we have been given his law, we know his will, and
4. We approve only the most excellent of human moral standards.

The claims having to do with their privileges are:

1. To be a guide for the blind,
2. To be a light for those who are in the dark,
3. To be an instructor for the foolish, and

4. To be a teacher of infants.

To evaluate these claims properly, we must begin by seeing that so far as they go, each is absolutely true. Many of our contemporaries would regard such claims as mere spiritual arrogance or prejudice, believing that no religion has any special claim to truth. But no Christian can think like this, nor can any true Jew. The Jew in Paul's day boasted of having received a unique and special revelation from God: first from the hands of Moses on Mount Sinai and then by a long succession of writings from selected generals, kings, chroniclers, and prophets. And he was correct in this boast! In fact, Christians as well as Jews receive the writings of the Old Testament as the very words of God, not as mere human inventions. The apostle Peter wrote, "For prophecy never had its origin in the will of man, but men spoke from God as they were carried along by the Holy Spirit" (2 Peter 1:21).

In the same way, it is also absolutely true that God had entered into a special relationship with the Jews. He had begun with Abraham, and from Abraham's days onward Jews had enjoyed the advantages of a covenant relationship.

Jesus taught this in his conversation with the Samaritan woman whom he met at Jacob's well near Sychar (John 4:1-26). When he touched upon her sin, she tried to get him into a theological discussion—just like many people today do when so confronted. They try to escape dealing with the evil in their lives. This woman asked a question about the proper place for worship— undoubtedly often discussed in the towns of Samaria in her day. Was it Jerusalem, as the Jews obviously claimed? Or was it upon Mount Gerazim, as the Samaritans believed? (vv. 19-20).

Jesus answered the woman in two ways. First, he opened her eyes to a new era of worship, which he was bringing in, a time in which worship would be neither in Jerusalem exclusively nor in Samaria. Rather, he said, "... a time is coming and has now come when the true worshipers will worship the Father in spirit and truth... they are the kind of worshipers the Father seeks. God is spirit, and his worshipers must worship in spirit and in truth" (vv. 23-24).

Second, Jesus dealt with the specific question she raised. This has forever settled the matters both of the authority of the Old Testament and of the priority of Jews in spiritual matters. Jesus said, "You Samaritans worship what you do not know; we worship what we do know, for salvation is from the Jews" (v. 22). It follows from this that until the inauguration of the church age at Pentecost, although salvation was available for Gentiles, the way was by the gate of Judaism only.

Again, the Jew addressed by Paul in our text was right in claiming that because he possessed a true revelation from God in what we call the Old Testament, he really did know God's will. Or at least he had the proper foundation for knowing it. In Romans 2:18 "will" is not referring to the secret or hidden counsels of God—for an obvious reason: the hidden counsels of God are indeed hidden. Rather, it refers to the revelation in Scripture of what, as Haldane put it, "is agreeable to him, what he requires them to do, what he commands, what he prohibits, what he approves, and what he rewards." We have an example of what this means in the three specific commandments that Paul cites in verses 21 and 22.

Finally, the Jew was right in his claim that because he was instructed by the law he had a valid basis for approving what was excellent or superior in human moral standards. In other words, he could evaluate any lesser standards because he possessed an absolute rule or yardstick by which to measure them.

Out of these four basic spiritual advantages grew an equally impressive set of privileges, couched here in somewhat metaphorical language. The Jew saw himself as being "a guide for the blind, a light for those who are in the dark, an instructor of the foolish, a teacher of infants"—all because he had "the embodiment of knowledge and truth" in the Scriptures (vv. 19-20). And so he did! So he was! The knowledge of the true God and the way of this true God were indeed a light in the dark labyrinth of pagan superstition and culture.

The Eighth Commandment

Alas, knowledge of God and of the way of this true God was not enough! This is because, as we have already seen, God judges according to truth and not according to appearances, according to what men and women actually do and not according to their mere professions.

At this point Paul brings forth three examples of that "superior" way of the Jew, which came as a result of his possessing the revealed law of God: the eighth of the Ten Commandments, the seventh of the Ten Commandments, and a statement embracing the first two of the Ten Commandments. The eighth commandment said, "You shall not steal" (Exod. 20:15). This was part of the Jewish instruction properly passed to others. But, Paul asks, did the Jew himself steal? The seventh commandment said, "You shall not commit adultery" (Exod. 20:14). But did the Jew commit adultery? The first and second commandments declared: "You shall have no other gods before me. You shall not make for yourself an idol in the form of anything in heaven above or on the earth beneath or in the waters below. You shall not bow down to them or worship them; for I, the LORD your God, am a jealous God, punishing the children for the sin of the fathers to the third and fourth generation of those who hate me, but showing love to a thousand generations of those who love me and keep my commandments" (Exod. 20:3-6). But did the Jew break these two commandments?

So far I have written about Romans 2:17-24 as if it is dealing with Jews almost exclusively. But here we must break away from that more limited view and get back to what I said at the beginning, namely, that these verses speak to all kinds of "religious" people: Fundamentalists, churchgoing Presbyterians, Baptists, Catholics, whatever. It is a charge, as one commentator puts it, "against the orthodox."

So I ask, "We who preach against stealing, do we steal?"

The idea that one should not steal is a generally accepted standard of human behavior, but it is just as generally broken. We should not think that we have kept this commandment just because we have not forced our way into another person's home and walked off with his possessions. We steal from God when we fail to worship him as we ought or when we set our own concerns ahead of his. We steal from an employer when we do not give the best work of which we are capable or when we overextend our coffee breaks or leave work early. We steal if we waste company products or use company time for personal matters. We steal if we sell something for more than it is worth. We steal from our employees if the work environment for which we are responsible harms their health, or if we do not pay them enough to guarantee a healthy, adequate standard of living. We steal when we borrow something and do not return it. We steal from ourselves when we waste our talents, time, or money.

The Seventh Commandment

After citing the eighth of the Ten Commandments, Paul moves backward to the seventh and asks: "You who say that people should not commit adultery, do you commit adultery?"

What are we to answer to this question, particularly if we live in the United States of America where adultery, fornication, and a variety of forms of sexual experimentation are not only excused, but even encouraged and applauded? What are we to answer in view of the revelation of sexual sins in the lives of prominent national figures, both secular and religious? What are we to say in view of Jesus' teaching that the seventh commandment has to do with the thoughts of our minds and the intents of our hearts and not only with external actions. According to Jesus' teaching, lust is the equivalent of adultery, just as hate is the equivalent of murder (Matt. 5:2728; cf. vv. 21-22). The biblical standard is purity before marriage and fidelity afterward.

There is hardly an area of our cultural life so in opposition to God's standards. The media use the lure of sex to push materialism and glamorize the pursuit of pleasure. Television fills our living rooms with sex-filled advertisements, and its programs are increasingly explicit in portraying immoral sexual relationships and practices. Movies are worse. Even the most respectable areas of our cities frequently feature X-rated films.

At one time people would defend high sexual standards, even though they often did something quite different on the side. But today we do not even hold to the morality. "If it feels good, do it!" That is the cry of our age and the practice of the great majority.

The First and Second Commandments

The third of Paul's examples of preaching one thing but doing another is a reference to the first and second commandments: "You who abhor idols, do you rob temples?"

It is not as easy to understand this question as it is to understand the first two. There are several problems. First, the second half of the sentence does not match the first in the same way the parts of the first two questions match. When Paul says, "You who preach against stealing, do you steal?" he is charging the religious person with doing exactly what that person says others should not do. In other words, the religious person says, "Do not steal," yet he does steal. So also with the second example. The religious person says, "Do not commit adultery," but he commits adultery himself. In the case of this third example, the parts do not match. The prohibition is: "Do not worship idols." But Paul's accusation is not idolatry, which we might expect, but rather sacrilege or robbery of the heathen temples.

The second problem is equally if not more puzzling. So far as we know, the Jews did not "rob temples." Does this mean, then, merely that they robbed God of the honor properly due to him? Does it refer to the trafficking in offerings conducted in the courtyard of the temple in Jerusalem, which Jesus condemned? Does it refer to Jews possessing (perhaps as art objects) items that had been taken from heathen temples by Gentile armies and later sold? Does it refer to actual temple spoilage? It is hard to say what this means, although there are arguments in favor of each of these views.

What we can say is that, regardless of the particular way the ancient Jew may have broken the first and second of the Ten Commandments (which we may or may not understand), we certainly understand how we have broken them—even the most religious among us.

The first commandment is a demand for our exclusive and zealous worship of the true God: "You shall have no other gods before me" (Exod. 20:3). To worship any god but the biblical God is to break this commandment. But we need not worship a clearly defined "god" to break this commandment—Zeus, Minerva, Buddha, Allah, or one of the countless modern idols. We break it whenever we give some person or some object or some worldly aspiration the first place in our lives, a place that belongs to God alone. Often today the substitute god is ourselves or our image of ourselves. It can be such things as success, fame, material affluence, or power over others. To keep this commandment would be, as John R. W. Stott says, "to see all things from his [God's] point of view and do nothing without reference to him; to make his will our guide and his glory our goal; to put him first in thought, word and deed; in business and leisure; in friendships and career; in the use of our money, time and talents; at work and at home."

Now consider the second commandment, which says: "You shall not make for yourself an idol in the form of anything in heaven above or on the earth beneath or in the waters below. You shall not bow down to them or worship them; for I, the LORD your God, am a jealous God, punishing the children for the sin of the fathers to the third and fourth generation of those who hate me, but showing love to a thousand generations of those who love me and keep my commandments" (Exod. 20:4-6). If the first commandment deals with the object of our worship, forbidding the worship of any false God, this commandment deals with the manner of our worship, forbidding us to worship even the true God unworthily.

This means that we should take the utmost care to discover what God is truly like and thus increasingly worship him as the only great, transcendent, spiritual, and inscrutable God he is. But we do not do this. Instead, as Paul argued at the beginning of his discussion, we suppress the knowledge of God and find that our foolish hearts are darkened (Rom. 1:18, 21).

When Paul comes to the end of this paragraph, which describes the true state of the orthodox, or "religious," person, he quotes the Old Testament to show that "God's name is blasphemed among the Gentiles because of you" (v. 24; cf. Isa. 52:5; Ezek. 36:22). This is always the case when ostensibly devout persons violate the very standards they proclaim. It is a terrible thing!

But there is something even more terrible, and that is for these same persons to continue nevertheless along this wrong path, supposing that they are on the best of standings with God— just because they are religious—when actually they are, like the utter pagans around them, on a swift journey to destruction. William Barclay begins his discussion of these verses with the words: "To a Jew a passage like this must have come as a shattering experience." He is right, of course. But it is not only for the Jew that a passage like this is or should be shattering. It should be shattering to us all, particularly if we find ourselves thinking that our case is somehow different from that of other persons—because of our religious leanings.

If you have been trusting in your baptism, If you have been trusting in your confirmation, If you have been trusting in your church membership, or your knowledge of the Bible or doctrine, or in your generous stewardship, If you have been trusting in your Christian upbringing, If you have been trusting in anything other than Jesus Christ and his death upon the cross in your place, throw whatever it is completely out of your mind. Abandon it. Stamp upon it. Grind it down. Dust off the place where it lay.

Then turn to Jesus Christ alone, and trust him only.

Chapter 30.
Circumcision

Romans 2:25-29

When my wife and I lived in Basel, Switzerland, we became acquainted with the annual Swiss celebration known as Faschnacht, which is the equivalent of the Mardi Gras—"Fat Tuesday." This term refers to the time of indulgence immediately preceding Lent (which always begins on a Wednesday) in which people do things they expect to have to give up for the solemn days leading up to Good Friday. Basel is a Protestant city, so its citizens hold Faschnacht during the first week of Lent—in bold defiance of Catholic custom. But otherwise their week of riotous abandon is precisely the same as found elsewhere. The Swiss have many jokes about it. One of the standard jokes concerns the number of illegitimate babies that will be born in Basel about nine months later.

In Switzerland the Salvation Army is evangelical, and each year it uses Faschnacht to witness to the claims of Christ. I remember from the time I was there that in the days immediately before the celebration of Faschnacht billboards appeared bearing the name of the Salvation Army, an address or phone number where one could get spiritual council, and a sentence in German that went: Gott sieht hinter deine Maske. It means "God sees behind your mask."

I have reflected on that many times, remembering that it is a statement of a great biblical principle, found explicitly for the first time in 1 Samuel 16:7. That text says, "Man looks at the outward appearance, but the Lord looks at the heart."

Last Retreat of the Orthodox

This is what Paul is getting at in the last paragraphs of Romans 2, as he deals for the final time with the objections of those who consider themselves to be so thoroughly religious that they do not need the gospel. The issue is the Jewish sacrament of circumcision and the accompanying claim that all who have been circumcised will be saved.

Robert Haldane writes that "Paul here pursues the Jew into his last retreat." The Jew, who was the chief example in Paul's day of the thoroughly religious person, had begun his defense against Paul's gospel by the argument that he (or she) possessed the law. As we have seen in the previous study, Paul argued that possession of the law, although undoubtedly a great privilege, is of no value if the one possessing the commands of God fails to keep them. The law says, "You shall not steal" (Exod. 20:15). But knowing that is no help if you do steal, for then the law condemns rather than exonerates the individual. It is the same with other commandments: "You shall not commit adultery" (Exod. 20:14) and "You shall have no other gods before me" (Exod. 20:3). The Jew, along with everybody else, had broken those laws. So it was not sufficient to say, "I have the law, and therefore I do not need the gospel." On the contrary, the law is given to reveal our need of God's grace.

Still, the Jew had one last card to play, one final argument. He had been circumcised, and circumcision had brought him into visible outward fellowship with that body of covenant people to whom God had made salvation promises. It was like saying that circumcision (our counterpart is baptism) had made him a member of that body, and because of that membership his salvation was certain.

The Jew really did believe this—just as many people today believe they are saved merely by being members of a church! In the various commentaries I possess, the most thorough documentation of this point is by Charles Hodge, who drew it from a variety of scholars. I quote his summary here:

Rabbi Menachem in his Commentary on the Books of Moses (fol. 43, col. 1) says, "Our Rabbins have said that no circumcised man will see hell." In the Jalkut Rubeni (num. 1) it is taught, "Circumcision saves from hell." In the Medrasch Tillim (fol. 7, col. 2) it is said, "God swore to Abraham that no one who was circumcised should be sent to hell." In the book of Akedath Jizehak (fol. 54, col. 2) it is taught that "Abraham sits before the gate of hell, and does not allow that any circumcised Israelite should enter there."

The argument is that salvation is for Jews and that what makes one a Jew is circumcision. Today, of course, even Jews are not quite certain about what it is that makes a true Jew. The most common answer is that a Jew is a person who has descended from Abraham. Yet what about Ishmael and those who descended from him, the Arabs? Ishmael was Abraham's son, but Ishmael's descendants are not Jews, though they are of Semitic stock. To account for this, the official Jewish definition is that a Jew is a person who has a Jewish mother. By this reasoning, Isaac alone would be Jewish and Ishmael would be excluded. But what about a child born of a good Jewish mother (or even of two good Jewish parents) who converts to Christianity? Is such a person Jewish? According to the official theory, a child of a Jewish mother who converts to Christianity would be Jewish. Yet in many Jewish circles conversion to Christianity is considered grounds not only for denying that the person is Jewish but also for excluding such a one from his or her own biological family.

What is a Jew?

Paul's answer to this important question is radical. But notice: Paul does not say (since he is dealing with salvation matters) that one does not have to be a Jew to be saved, but rather that one has to be a true Jew which, as he points out, is not a matter of external criteria—such as possession of the law, descent from Abraham, or circumcision—but of conduct, which flows from spiritual changes within. "A man is not a Jew if he is only one outwardly, nor is circumcision merely outward and physical. No, a man is a Jew if he is one inwardly, and circumcision is circumcision of the heart, by the Spirit, not by the written code..." (vv. 28-29).

It is what we found earlier in Romans 2. God's concern is not chiefly with our knowing the truth but with our doing it (vv. 1-3). It is not a matter of our having the law but of obeying its precepts (vv. 21-23).

Let me quote William Barclay:

Jewishness, [Paul] insists, is not a matter of race at all; Jewishness has nothing to do with circumcision. Jewishness is a matter of conduct. If that is so, there is many a so-called Jew who is a pure descendent of Abraham and who bears the mark of circumcision in his body, who is no Jew at all; and equally there is many a Gentile who never heard of Abraham and who would never dream of being circumcised, who is a Jew in the real sense of the term.... With one stroke Paul was abolishing the very basis of Jewish thought. He was shutting out from real Jewishness many and many a Jew, and he was introducing a new conception which made Jewishness a thing available to every nation, a thing as wide as the earth itself.

What Is a Sacrament?

Most of us are not personally affected by contemporary debate over the definition of a true Jew, of course. But the matter of godly conduct accomplished in us by the work of the Holy Spirit (v. 29) is our concern. And, as far as the sacraments go (our sacraments are baptism and the Lord's Supper, rather than circumcision), the issue is whether these reflect the necessary inward change and reality.

What is a sacrament?

Peter Lombard, who lived in the twelfth century, called a sacrament "a sign of a sacred thing." John Calvin, in a more comprehensive statement, wrote that a sacrament is "an outward sign by which the Lord seals on our consciences the promises of his good will toward us in order to sustain the weakness of our faith; and we in turn attest our piety toward him in the presence of the Lord and of his angels before the eyes of men." The important thing in each definition is that a sacrament is a "sign" of a spiritual reality rather than the reality itself.

Let me define a sacrament from a Christian point of view. There are four elements:

1. A sacrament is a divine ordinance instituted by Christ himself. This links the sacraments to other things that Christ also commanded us to do: for instance, to pray. But it separates it from things that we may do but are not commanded to do: to kneel when we pray or to sing hymns when we worship, to give just two examples. In this, the New Testament sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper, which were commanded by Christ, are like the Old Testament sacrament of circumcision, which God himself imposed on Abraham and his descendants.

2. A sacrament uses material elements as visible signs of God's blessing. In baptism the sign is water. In the Lord's Supper the signs are bread, which signifies the Lord's body, and wine, which signifies his shed blood. The Old Testament sign was a cutting away of the flesh.

This is an important matter, for it sets the sacraments off from other proper but nonsacramental activities that do not use material elements as signs. Moreover, the element distinguishes the sacrament from that to which it points. For example, if you are driving along the New Jersey Turnpike and see a sign that reads "New York 30 miles," you realize that the sign is pointing to New York. The sign is not itself New York. Again, if you see a sign saying "Drink Coca-Cola," you know that the sign is not Coca-Cola. It is only pointing you in that direction. It is in this way that the sacraments point to spiritual realities. Baptism signifies our identification with Jesus Christ by faith. The Lord's Supper signifies our vital participation and union with him. The sign is secondary, outward, and visible. The reality is primary, inward, and invisible.

3. A sacrament is a means of grace. This does not mean that spiritual life is automatically communicated to the one who participates in the sacraments in some magical way, so that he or she is automatically saved. This is the point Paul is denying in his discussion of circumcision in our text. But this negative truth is not the same thing as saying that the sacraments have no value. Indeed, immediately after denying in Romans 2 that one is saved by circumcision, Paul goes on to speak of the "value" of circumcision in the next chapter, as we shall see. What is the value of baptism and the Lord's Supper? John Murray answers:

Baptism is a means of grace and conveys blessing, because it is the certification to us of God's grace and in the acceptance of that certification we rely upon God's faithfulness, bear witness to his grace, and thereby strengthen faith.... In the Lord's Supper that significance is increased and cultivated, namely, communion with Christ and participation of the virtue accruing from his body and blood. The Lord's Supper represents that which is continuously being wrought. We partake of Christ's body and blood through the means of the ordinance. We thus see that the accent falls on the faithfulness of God, and the efficacy resides in the response we yield to that faithfulness.

4. A sacrament is a seal, certification, or confirmation of the grace it signifies. Earlier I pointed out that a sign points to something other than itself, like the sign directing a traveler to New York or encouraging him to drink Coca-Cola. But a sign frequently does something else as well: It indicates ownership. A sign saying "Joe's Restaurant," means that the restaurant belongs to Joe. A sign reading "United States Courthouse" means that the building on which it is found is the property of the federal government. In a similar way, some signs authenticate documents. A seal on a passport or on an academic transcript validates that document.

Theologians refers to sacraments as "signs and seals" of some reality: signs because they point to them, seals because they authenticate the one submitting to the sacrament.

This is what made baptism such an important sign for Martin Luther. There were times in the midst of the fearful events and enervating pressures of the Reformation when Luther, who went up and down emotionally, as forceful leaders often do, became confused about everything. In his most bleak periods he questioned the value of the Reformation; he questioned his own faith; he even questioned the value of the work of the Lord Jesus Christ on his behalf. But we are told that when that happened he would frequently write on the table in front of him in chalk the Latin words baptizatus sum! ("I have been baptized!"). That sign would point him to spiritual reality, and he would be reassured that he really was Christ's and had been identified with him in his death and resurrection.

Being a Jew is important. In fact, in a sense every saved person must be a member of that covenant people. But only if you are a true Jew (cf. Gal. 6:16)! That is, one must be a Jew inwardly and spiritually, not necessarily by physical descent from Abraham. In the same way, circumcision is of value, but only if it points (like baptism and the Lord's Supper) to the reality of a changed heart.

Summary of Romans 2

We have now come to the end of Romans 2, and it is time to summarize Paul's teaching in that chapter. The apostle has been dealing with persons who would agree with his condemnation of the heathen (as expressed in chapter 1), but who would excuse themselves on the grounds either (1) of being very moral, that is, people who know higher standards of conduct than those possessed by the heathen; or (2) of being thoroughly religious and therefore of being saved by the possession of the revealed law of God and by participation in the sacraments.

Do you know of any people like that today? Of course, you do. You may even be one of them. Here is what the apostle Paul says to such people:

1. Knowledge alone, even knowledge of the highest spiritual and moral principles, does not win God's approval. On the contrary, superior knowledge actually leads to even greater condemnation—if it is not accompanied by adherence to the higher standard. Both the moral pagan and the orthodox Jew were found wanting, not because they did not have a moral code or divine revelation, but because, having that code or revelation, they nevertheless failed to live up to it. The pagan did "the same things" he condemned in others (vv. 1-3). The Jew likewise "broke the law" (vv. 21-23).
2. Membership in a religious society, whether the covenant nation of Israel or the visible church of Christendom, does not guarantee that we have obtained God's favor. It is not that belonging to the visible company of God's people is unimportant. It is. But salvation is not won by any external associations if (as we have seen) God looks not on outward appearances but on the heart. Jews have been saved; they are being saved. But it is not because they are Jews! Church members are likewise being saved. But it is not because they are church members! If any of us could perfectly keep the law of God, we would be saved by keeping it. But none of us can. We have all broken it. Therefore, we can be saved only as the result of Christ's death on the cross and the application of that work to us by the Holy Spirit. This alone brings us into the true company of God's elect people and develops a life consistent with that new identity.

3. The sacraments, either of the Old Testament or the New Testament periods, save no one. They point to what saves, but they are not the reality themselves. Hodge observes, "According to the apostle, the true idea of a sacrament is not that it is a mystic rite, possessed of inherent efficacy or conveying grace as a mere opus operatum; but that it is a seal and sign, designed to confirm our faith in the validity of the covenant to which it is attached; and from its significant character to present and illustrate some great spiritual truth."

4. God judges according to truth and performance, and by that standard every human being is condemned. We may not like the concluding part of that sentence, but we can hardly disagree with the rightness and value of the first part. Would it be right for God to judge in any other than the highest and most righteous fashion? Could he judge in any way other than by truth? Could he admit falsehood or deception before the bar of his justice? Could he allow pretense or wishful thinking or mere intentions, rather than actual deeds, to slip by? Could he overlook sin, just because a person is a Jew? Or a church member? Or just because he or she might know better? Obviously, none of these perversions of justice can occur with God, though they are all too common in human systems. If this is true, then of themselves no human beings will be justified.

5. If we are to be saved, it must be by the labor of Jesus Christ applied to us by the Father through the ministry of the Holy Spirit. When David sinned and then confessed his sin in Psalm 51, even though he confessed his sin genuinely and thoroughly he did not suppose that it was the mere fact of his confession that would save him. On the contrary, he looked entirely to God. He prayed: (1) "Cleanse me with hyssop..." (v. 7). Hyssop was used to sprinkle the blood of the animals used in the Jewish sacrificial system. So this was a plea for cleansing by the blood of the atonement. And he added: (2) "Create in me a pure heart" (v. 10). As the next verse makes clear, David understood this to be something that could only be accomplished by the Holy Spirit, which is precisely the point to which Paul comes at the conclusion of the chapter.

I end with one last observation. In the final sentence of Romans 2, Paul has a pun, which is untranslatable in English but which takes us back to the identification of a true Jew, with which we began. The word Jew comes from the name of Judah, the fourth son of Jacob (or Israel, Gen. 32:28), and the pun is found in the fact that Judah means "praise." When Leah gave birth to Judah she said, "This time I will praise the Lord," and the text adds, "So she named him Judah [or 'praise']" (Gen. 29:35). Similarly, when Jacob/Israel was dying, he said, using the same pun, "Judah, your brothers will praise you" (Gen. 49:8a).

This is the pun Paul uses at the end of the chapter: "Such a man's praise is not from men, but from God." He means, "True Jewishness (Judah) is from God and is spiritual. It does not come from men by outward things like circumcision."

Chapter 31.
Do Jews Have an Edge?

Romans 3:1

Every profession has its favorite stories, and the legal profession is no exception. A lawyer friend tells a story of a novice attorney defending a man accused of biting another man's ear off during a barroom brawl. A witness to the fight was on the stand, and the lawyer was cross-examining him. "Did you actually see the defendant bite this man's ear off?" the young attorney asked.

"No, sir," the witness replied.

That was the answer the attorney wanted and needed, but he made a mistake not uncommon to young lawyers. Instead of ending his cross examination when he was ahead and on a winning track, he continued to ask questions.

"What exactly did you see?" he queried.

"I saw him spit it out," said the witness.

The point is that going too far or failing to quit when you're ahead is a mistake in legal squabbling.

The Problem with Paul's Argument

It is a like charge—that he has gone too far—that the apostle Paul seems to hear an opponent raise as he comes to the end of Romans 2 and begins chapter 3. We know what Paul has been trying to prove: that all persons, Jews as well as Gentiles, are guilty of sin before God and therefore need a Savior. No one can save himself. But Paul has argued this case so forcefully that he has virtually equated the Jew, who was thought to have great religious advantages, with the Gentile, who had none. He has said, "There will be trouble and distress for every human being who does evil: first for the Jew, then for the Gentile; but glory, honor and peace for everyone who does good: first for the Jew, then for the Gentile. For God does not show favoritism" (Rom. 2:9-11). Then, when he reaches the end of the chapter, he defines Jewishness in a way that has virtually nothing whatever to do with a person's religious or ethnic heritage: "A man is a Jew if he is one inwardly; and circumcision is circumcision of the heart, by the Spirit, not by the written code..." (v. 29).

"But doesn't that prove too much?" an opponent would be arguing. If God treats Jews and Gentiles alike, not showing favoritism, and if the only thing that makes one truly Jewish is an inward transformation by the Holy Spirit, then what advantage is there in being a Jew?

Or, to put it in other terms, what is the Old Testament all about? Why did God bother to choose Abraham and establish his descendants, the Jews, as a special covenant people if there is no advantage to being Jewish? And why did God institute circumcision? If Paul is right, these things are pointless. Or, since we know that what God does is not pointless and must have a proper purpose to it, isn't it the case that Paul must be wrong in his conclusions—whether or not we can detect the weak point in his arguments?

This is a very important matter—for Jews as well as for non-Jews. We have been talking about the Jewish people's spiritual advantages or lack of them. But, although the Jew's apparent advantages are different from the Gentile's, his situation and the Gentile's are parallel. For we who call ourselves Christians must ask, "What advantage, then, is there is being a godly, churchgoing person? What value is there in baptism, church membership, communion, or any other religious exercise if we are all under condemnation anyway?"

I have titled this study "Do Jews Have an Edge?" But I might as well have asked, "Do any religious people have an edge?" If we do not, then why should we bother with religion at all? Let's enjoy ourselves and sin right along with the heathen. If we do have an edge, then isn't it the case that it is possible to please God by our religious practices and be saved by them after all?

The Jews' Advantages

Paul's answer is that circumcision and being Jewish are true advantages, although they are not the kind of advantages we are thinking of if we wrongly suppose that one can be saved by them.

To do justice to Paul's thinking, we need to look ahead to the list of Jewish advantages appearing not here in Romans 3 but in chapter 9. The passage at hand encourages us to do this, because after Paul asks, "What advantage, then, is there in being a Jew, or what value is there in circumcision?" he answers, "Much in every way! First of all, they have been entrusted with the very words of God" (vv. 1-2, italics mine). The very fact that Paul says "first" leads us to look for what is also second and third and so on.

Paul lists only one advantage in Romans 3: "the very words of God." This had led some commentators to note that the Greek word proton (translated "first of all") can also mean "chiefly" or "as a matter of first importance." But, as John Murray points out, "It makes little difference whether we regard the word he uses as 'first' or 'chiefly,'" since both inevitably suggest other advantages.

As mentioned, we do find a list of these advantages in Romans 9. Speaking of the Jews, Paul says, "Theirs is the adoption as sons; theirs the divine glory, the covenants, the receiving of the law, the temple worship and the promises. Theirs are the patriarchs, and from them is traced the human ancestry of Christ, who is God over all, forever praised! Amen" (vv. 4-5). These ideas are worth looking at individually.

1. The adoption as sons. This first term embraces what follows, for it speaks of a sovereign act of God, who—for his own good reasons and according to his own good pleasure—drew the Jewish people into a special family relationship with himself. There is a real difference between Jews, who were adopted into God's family, and Christians (both Jews and Gentiles), who enter the family of God by a new birth, being born again. But the advantages are similar. Among them, obviously, is the privilege of approaching God directly as one's Father.
2. The divine glory. In the context of Jewish history, this phrase refers to God's revelation of himself in glory on Mount Sinai at the time of the giving of the law, in the Most Holy Place of the Jewish temple, and in a few other places. No other nation had this privilege.

3. The covenants. This word is plural, so it probably refers to the full scope of those special bondings of God to Israel generally known as the Abrahamic covenant, the Mosaic covenant, and the Davidic covenant. In each case, God promised to be certain things to his people and to do certain things for them, not because of any good in them or in anticipation of any special performance on their part, but solely for his own good pleasure.

4. The receiving of the law. This is the item Paul refers to as "first of all" or "chiefly" in Romans

3. We will see why this is the most important advantage later and in our next study.

5. The temple worship. This was an obvious advantage because, in the early days, God actually manifested himself in the tabernacle or temple. However, since the emphasis here is on "worship," the advantage actually referred to is the way in which this worship pointed the pathway to God by atoning sacrifices for sin, which prefigured the only perfect sacrifice of Jesus Christ. Indeed, each item in the temple design and furnishings pointed forward to Jesus and was fulfilled by him.

6. The promises. The Old Testament (like the New Testament) is filled with promises to God's people. These are of very wide scope, covering all we could possibly need. They are sure and reliable, since it is God who has made and spoken them.

7. The patriarchs. This word means "fathers" and can refer to any one of the giants of Israel's past. Chiefly it refers to the first three fathers: Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (or Israel). God calls himself by their name, saying to Moses, "I am the God of your father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob" (Exod. 3:6; cf. Matt. 22:32). It was an advantage to have had such ancestry, because God had worked through these men greatly. Also, they were models of faith and godliness to their descendants.

8. The human ancestry of Jesus Christ. Being related to Christ did not secure salvation for Jewish people, but it was still better to be close to him and his ministry in this way than to be far from him. If nothing else, there was at least a cultural affinity out of which it was easier to understand the meaning of his teaching.

The Very Words of God

I suppose that if Paul had been asked to interrupt himself after the first two verses of Romans 3, he might have listed those eight items. And if he had been pressed even further, he might have developed a whole book or preached a whole sermon or sermons on each one. Each is a great advantage, and seeing the whole picture requires us to think a bit about each of them.

Still, we must not miss the fact that when Paul is answering the specific question "What advantage, then, is there in being a Jew?" in Romans 3, it is not the whole list but rather the matter of possessing the very words of God alone that he stresses. In fact, although he has also asked, "What value is there in circumcision?" he does not speak of the sacraments or any other external sign as an advantage in this context. Just Scripture! That is the chief item and, in Romans 3, the only one.

This is of immense importance to us, because it is the only blessing in this long list of Jewish advantages in which Gentiles share. We cannot say as Gentiles, "Ours is the adoption as sons," for we have not been adopted as a people. We cannot say, "Ours is the divine glory" (we have never seen God's glory), or "Ours are the covenants" (though there is a covenant of grace for Christian people). We cannot claim the advantages of the temple worship or the promises made to Israel or the patriarchs or an ancestral relationship to Jesus Christ.

But we can say, "Ours are the Scriptures"—if we have been fortunate enough, as virtually all of us have been, to have been given the very words of God in our language.

Can any of us experience anything in life of greater personal advantage to our souls than possession of the Holy Scriptures? Of course not! Without them we are utterly confused, adrift on a sea of human speculation where all the great questions of life are concerned. Is there a God? We do not know; at least, in our sinful state we are unable to admit the full personal significance of there being a God. Who are we? We do not know the answer to that important question. Apart from Scripture, we cannot know that we have been created in the image of the one true God and are called to glorify him and to enjoy him forever. How do we come to God? How is our sin to be dealt with? What way of life is best? Does what we do here matter? It is only from the revelation of God in the Bible that we can have sure answers to any of these life-and-death questions.

What Advantage to the "Christian"?

At this point I am sure you can see where this study is going, since I am obviously trying to take what Paul has said to the thoroughly religious person of his day, the Jew, and apply it to the thoroughly religious person of our time. Paul is answering an argument. His answer is a digression from what he has been setting out to prove in Romans 1:18-3:20. Nevertheless, the issue the apostle is dealing with here is of vital importance to everyone. No one is saved by such things as baptism, sacraments, or church attendance. No one is even saved by such an important thing as having—yes, even studying—the Bible. But that does not mean that religious practices are of no use to us or that one is acting wisely if he or she abuses, neglects, or disregards them.

So I ask this question: "What advantage, then, is there in being a godly, churchgoing 'Christian' person?" I suggest three answers.

1. Even if God never saves you by drawing you from the darkness of your sin to saving faith in Jesus Christ, you will at least sin less because of these advantages and therefore be punished less severely.

Some will think this a strange place to begin, but we need to begin with the hardest situation in order that we might understand, on the one hand, that there are genuine spiritual advantages (for those who will have them) and, on the other hand, that these in themselves do not save anyone. We must remember that our situation is desperate. We can do nothing for ourselves. Even knowing the truth does not save us, because in our unregenerate state we are unresponsive and even hostile to it. No one can be saved who is not born again, and the work of spiritual regeneration is God's doing.

Still, we have seen that there are degrees of punishment for sin. In Romans 2:5, Paul has spoken of individuals "storing up wrath" by frequent and persistent sin. The Lord Jesus Christ made the point when he described a servant who knows his master's will and disobeys it being beaten with many blows, while another servant who does not know his master's will and therefore unintentionally disobeys it being beaten with "few blows" (Luke 12:47-48). Even the author of the letter to the Hebrews seems to make the point when he speaks of "every violation [of the law] and disobedience" receiving "its just punishment" (Heb. 2:2). So I say, if nothing else, knowing the law of God and living in the company of people who are trying to obey God's commands and encourage each other to live godly lives is of value—even if you are not saved. For it will at least mean that you will be committing fewer sins for which you will one day be punished.

2. Going to church and listening to the preaching of the Word of God, if you are in a good, Bible-believing church, will at least cause you to know the way of salvation, even if you do not respond to it.

A person might argue that knowing how to be saved and yet not responding to that revelation, in fact rejecting it, is not an advantage but a disadvantage in that it undoubtedly increases one's guilt. It is a case of the servant knowing his master's will but not doing it. This is true, of course. Moreover, it is compounded if together with your knowledge you also acquire the habit of thinking of yourself as a rather fine

Christian specimen. You are worse off if you think that God must somehow think better of you just because you know much.

But it does not need to work that way. In fact, it is meant to work quite the other way. Instead of becoming proud because of your knowledge, you should be humbled by it. The first thing you learn from the Bible, if you are really profiting from it, is that you are a sinner hopelessly lost by virtue of your own sinful nature and your deliberately wicked choices; indeed, that you are under God's just wrath and doomed to perish utterly and horribly unless God is gracious to you and reaches out to save you through the work of Christ. This is what Romans is all about thus far. Who can read the first three chapters of Romans intelligently and remain proud? Who can read these chapters and fail to see the need of throwing oneself utterly upon God's mercy? As I said, knowledge of the way of salvation, including your need of it as a sinner, in itself will not save you. But it is hard to see how you can be saved without it. This is because without such knowledge you will not even begin to seek God. Most likely, you will consider yourself already saved or at least not needing salvation.

3. The third great advantage of regular church attendance and, above all, faithful adherence to the preaching and study of the Word of God is that, although you cannot claim this as a right from God, it is through the reading and preaching of the Bible that God is most likely to save you.

How is one born again, after all? Peter writes that we are "born again, not of perishable seed, but of imperishable, through the living and enduring word of God. For,

All men are like grass, and all their glory is like the flowers of the field; the grass withers and the flowers fall, but the word of the Lord stands forever.

1 Peter 1:23-25

To hear the Word of God is the most assured path to salvation.

In the same way James wrote, "He [God] chose to give us birth through the word of truth, that we might be a kind of firstfruits of all he created" (James 1:18).

Benefiting from One's "Edge"

Years ago, when I was preaching through John, I came to the ninth chapter, where we are told the story of a man who was born blind but who was healed by Jesus from spiritual as well as physical blindness. I remember reflecting on how desperate this man's plight was and how this is intended to be a picture of our own desperate condition apart from Jesus Christ.

What was his state? For one thing, he was blind. He could not see. Others could see, but he could not. And this meant that he could not see Jesus. If Jesus had said, as Peter and John later said to a crippled man at the temple gate called Beautiful, "Look at us [me]," the man could not have looked, for he was blind. This is the state of the lost today. Jesus is preached, but they cannot see him. That is, they cannot understand who he actually is or what he has accomplished. They cannot understand the gospel. The Bible says, "The man without the Spirit does not accept the things that come from the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him, and he cannot understand them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2:14).

Again, the man whose story is told in John 9 had been blind from birth, which meant that he probably did not even greatly value sight, having never known what it was. He knew he was missing something, of course, just like many people today are vaguely aware of a missing dimension in their lives. But he did not really know what this was or even think of having his condition cured. In the story we notice that he did not ask the Lord to heal him.

Again, he was a beggar. It is a beggar's task to beg, but he did not beg for sight. He was in the habit of asking the passers-by for money, because he had none. This means that, even if sight could have been procured for some great sum, the man's case would still have been hopeless, as grim as before. For how could he buy his sight, having nothing? In his poverty the blind man reminds us of how bankrupt we are before God.

No, there is very little to be said for this man at the moment Jesus found him. He was blind, unaware, and bankrupt. But, when I was preparing my studies of this story, I came across a saying of one of the older preachers, who observed that, although little could be said for this man, there was this one thing: he was at least in a place where Jesus was likely to go. He was by the gate leading into the temple grounds, where Jesus frequently passed by, and it was there that Jesus looked at him (he could not look at Jesus), loved him, healed him, and drew him to himself.

I apply this to you if you are reading these words but are not born again:

Your condition is not good. You are lost and under God's wrath. You are blind to God's truth. You are spiritually bankrupt. But there is this one thing. Although you cannot save yourself, as long as you can hear this or any other gospel message, you are at least where Jesus is likely to go. He loves to bless the preaching and teaching of his Word. Therefore, though your condition may be desperate, it is no worse than that of any other lost sinner before he or she was saved. The mere hearing of the Word is your advantage. Do not despise it, then. Do not say, "So, then, what advantage is there in religion?" There is a great advantage in it. "Much in every way!" (Rom. 3:2). Cling to it. Wring every possible "edge" from it. Who knows but that God will use the very Word you hear to save your soul?

Chapter 32.
"Give Me That Book!"

Romans 3:1-2

In the third chapter of Romans, in what seems almost to be an incidental reference, the apostle uses a term for the Bible that ascribes to it the highest possible authority. In the New International Version the term is rendered in English as "the very words" of God. The King James Version has the word oracles. In Greek this important word is logia. It was the possession of these logia, or oracles, that constituted the chief advantage of a person's having been born a Jew, according to Paul's teaching.

God's Word or Man's Word

The fact that Paul calls this the first or chief advantage of the Jew is in itself reason to study this further—more than we were able to do in the last study. But I return to this now because of its bearing on one of the most important matters dividing today's church. The issue is the nature of the Bible. What is the Bible? Is it a divine book or a human book? Is it supernatural or natural? Is it something that is binding upon our minds and morals, or is it simply a collection of noble thoughts, which we may use or neglect according to our own perception of the issues?

Let me clarify this division by saying that there are really only three basic positions that a person can hold in regard to the Bible. Either: (1) the Bible is the Word of God, which is what this important term of Paul affirms; or (2) the Bible is a collection of the ideas and words of mere men; or (3) the Bible is a combination of the two.

The first is the classic, evangelical doctrine. That is, it is the view that has been held throughout church history. Thus, even when there were debates about the nature of Jesus Christ, the Trinity, justification by faith, and other theological issues, it was always the Bible to which those disagreeing on these matters appealed. Even heretics regarded the Bible as the Word of God. They disagreed with what the church taught, thinking the church to be wrong in its interpretation.
They themselves had to be corrected in the course of things. But everyone understood that the Bible is God's Word and is therefore entirely without error and authoritative in all it teaches. It is only in recent years that this position has been questioned.

Irenaeus, who lived and wrote in Lyons, France, in the early years of the second century, said that we should be "most properly assured that the Scriptures are indeed perfect, since they were spoken by the Word of God and his Spirit." Martin Luther said, "Scripture, although also written of men, is not of men nor from men, but from God." John Calvin wrote:

This is the principle that distinguishes our religion from all others, that we know that God has spoken to us and are fully convinced that the prophets did not speak of themselves, but, as organs of the Holy Spirit, uttered only that which they had been commissioned from heaven to declare. All those who wish to profit from the Scriptures must first accept this as a settled principle, that the Law and the prophets are not teachings handled on at the pleasure of men or produced by men's minds as their source, but are dictated by the Holy Spirit.

When we speak of the Bible as the Word of God, we do not deny that the message of the Bible is also expressed in human language, the point Luther was making in the words I quoted. We must stress this, because some have fallen into thinking that the words of the Bible were made known to the human writers in a mechanical way so that they were mere scribes, thereby bypassing their own vocabularies and thought processes. But, of course, this is not the evangelical view. Each of the writers I have quoted understood that.

When we speak of the classic church view—that the Bible is the very Word of God—we mean that by the process known as inspiration, which we freely admit we do not fully understand, God so guided the human authors that the result, in the whole and in the parts, is what God desired to be expressed. The Bible is expressed in human words; but it is also the Word of God from beginning to end, and it is entirely truthful because God is truthful.

The second view, that the Bible is the words of mere men, is the view of liberalism and neoorthodoxy, though many of the neoorthodox theologians were willing to listen to the Bible carefully. Karl Barth is a chief example. Neoorthodoxy held that God is so transcendent, so far above us, so separated from where we are, that he does not actually speak in human words but rather reveals himself in ways that we cannot even talk about. So what we have in the Bible is men testifying in their own words to what they believed God said in this nonverbal fashion.

Of course, classic liberalism is a step below this. Liberalism sees the Bible only as a collection of human writings—inspiring at times, perhaps even embodying the highest thoughts, ethics, and aspirations of the human race, but nevertheless only a human book and therefore without any absolute authority. To the liberal, the Bible can, in principle, be rejected utterly.

The third position is the one the evangelical church is particularly wrestling with today. It is the view that the Bible is the Word of God and the words of men combined—not in the sense that God has spoken infallibly through the human authors, the classic view, but in this sense: When you read the Bible you find things there that have certainly come to us from God and are therefore truthful. But we also have to admit (so the argument goes) that when we read the Bible we also find things that are not truthful, things we know to be in error. Because we know that God does not speak that which is untruthful, these things must come from mere human beings, from human beings alone. Therefore the Bible is a mixture of human words and divine words, and it is the task of scholarship to separate the two, extracting the kernels of divine truth from the human chaff.

Of course, what happens in this framework is that the scholar becomes God so far as the revelation is concerned. That is, the scholar becomes the authority who tells us what is true and what is not true, what is of God and what is not of God, what we are to believe and what we are not to believe. And the danger is that, because we are sinners (which includes the scholars who, perhaps at this point, are even greater sinners than the rest of us), we try to weed out the things we do not want to hear and so refashion the divine revelation to suit our own desires or notions. Thus the powerful, reforming voice of God in the church is forgotten.

"The Oracles of God"

Romans 3:2 has bearing on this controversy, as I said. And the reason is that it uses a word for the Scriptures that identifies them in the whole and in their parts as God's very words. The term (logia) occurs in three other passages (Acts 7:38, Heb. 5:12, and 1 Peter 4:11), and in each case the word indicates that the Old Testament Scriptures, to which these New Testament verses refer, were regarded by the New Testament authors as "oracular."

No one has written more effectively on the full authority of the Bible, nor has anyone more carefully analyzed these and other key terms, than Benjamin Breckinridge Warfield, Professor of Didactic and Polemic Theology at Princeton Theological Seminary from 1887 to 1921. During those years the full storm of German liberalism was breaking over the American churches, and Warfield set out to counter it academically, thereby producing a remarkable collection of carefully reasoned studies of the Bible's words for itself and its teaching. These have been brought together in a volume entitled The Inspiration and Authority of the Bible, which is in my opinion still the most important single work on the nature and authority of the Bible in the English (and probably any) language.

In the chapter of this work dealing with the term logia, Warfield explores four separate bodies of literature. First, he looks at the word in the classical Greek authors, that is, as it was used by such writers as Aristophanes, Euripides, Herodotus, Thucydides, and others. His conclusion is that: "In logion [the singular form of logia] we have a term expressive, in common usage at least, of the simple notion of divine revelation, an oracle, and that independently of any accompanying implication of length or brevity, poetical or prose form, directness or indirectness of delivery. This is the meaning of logion in the mass of profane Greek literature."

Next Warfield examined the Septuagint, the Greek translation of the Old Testament made between 250 and 150 B.C., and found that in this translation logia was regularly used as a rendering of ʾmerah, which means "utterances," particularly the utterances of God.

Third, Warfield examined the works of the Philo, the Hebrew-Christian philosopher of Alexandria. Philo used logia to express whatever in the highest sense was a word from God, that is, an oracle from heaven. Moreover, he identified those words with what is recorded in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments. Says Warfield, "To Philo all that is in Scripture is oracular, every passage is a logion, of whatever character or length; and the whole, as constituted of these oracles, is ta logia, or perhaps even to logion—the mass of logia or one continuous logion."

The last body of material examined by Warfield was the writings of the early Christian fathers: Clement of Rome, Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, and Ignatius. Here again he found usage consistent with what had gone before.

Warfield then gives this summary of the use of logia and logion:

No lower sense can be attached to it in these instances than which it bears uniformly in its classical and Hellenistic usage: it means, not "words" barely, simple "utterances," but distinctively "oracular utterances," divinely authoritative communications, before which men stand in awe and to which they bow in humility: and this high meaning is not merely implicit, but is explicit in the term. It would seem clear again that there are no implications of brevity in the term: it means not short, pithy, pregnant sayings, but high, authoritative, sacred utterances.... It characterizes the utterances to which it is applied as emanations from God.

In reference to Romans 3:2, which he discusses at the end of his study, Warfield says, "The very point of this use of the word is that it identifies the Sacred Books with the Oracles." He elaborates:

That is to say, we have unobtrusive and convincing evidence here that the Old Testament Scriptures, as such, were esteemed by the writers of the New Testament as an oracular book, which in itself not merely contains, but is the "utterance," the very Word of God; and is to be appealed to as such and as such deferred to, because nothing other than the crystallized speech of God.... Let him that thinks them something other and less than this, reckon, then, with the apostles and prophets of the New Covenant—to whose trustworthiness as witnesses to doctrinal truth he owes all he knows about the New Covenant itself, and therefore all he hopes for through this New Covenant.

Strength and Weakness

I do not want anyone to think, just because I have taken so much space to record Warfield's careful work in this area, that the issues are of mere academic interest. The case is exactly the opposite. The point at issue is that if the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are the Word of God, as Paul affirms by the use of the word logia in Romans 3:2, then they inevitably bear within themselves the truth, authority, and power of God. And where they are known, studied, and believed, there God is and will be powerfully at work. In other words, God will be doing what he said he would do through his word in Isaiah 55: "My word... will not return to me empty,/but will accomplish what I desire/and achieve the purpose for which I sent it" (v. 11).

I do not hesitate to say that the weaknesses of the liberal church and the strengths of the evangelical church (for all its failures) can be traced precisely to this point: their understanding of and, consequently, their use of (or failure to use) Scripture.

Several years ago I had the task of finding a person to write a foreword to a small booklet on "Freedom and Authority," written by J. I. Packer, which the International Council on Biblical Inerrancy produced as part of its ten-year program to "elucidate, vindicate and apply the doctrine of biblical inerrancy as an essential element for the authority of Scripture and a necessity for the health of the church." At once I thought of Charles W. Colson because of his years in government and his work with Prison Fellowship. I thought he could put the case for a link between freedom and authority well.

Colson agreed to write the foreword, but what I got back was not what I expected. It was better. Colson told how, when he had first heard of the International Council on Biblical Inerrancy, he thought that its cause did not concern him. He was dealing with "practical" issues, not "ivorytower theology." But he said that he changed his mind when he saw the effects of a high and low view of Scripture on the front lines of spiritual warfare in the prisons. Colson wrote:

Experiences in the past two years have profoundly altered my thinking. The authority and truth of Scripture is not an obscure issue reserved for the private debate and entertainment of theologians; it is relevant, indeed critical for every serious Christian—layman, pastor, and theologian alike.

My convictions have come, not from studies in Ivory Tower academia, but from life in what may be termed the front-line trenches, behind prison walls where Christians grapple in hand-to-hand combat with the prince of darkness. In our prison fellowships, where the Bible is proclaimed as God's holy and inerrant revelation, believers grow and discipleship deepens. Christians live their faith with power. Where the Bible is not so proclaimed (or where Christianity is presumed to rest on subjective experience alone or content-less fellowship) faith withers and dies. Christianity without biblical fidelity is merely another passing fad in an age of passing fads. In my opinion, the issue is that clear-cut.

Why is it that "believers grow and discipleship deepens" when the Bible is proclaimed as God's inerrant revelation? It is because of what God does through it. Let me list a few of the things God does.

1. Unsaved men and women are born again by the work of the Holy Spirit operating through the Bible. That is why Peter tells Christians, "For you have been born again, not of perishable seed, but of imperishable, through the living and enduring word of God" (1 Peter 1:23), and why James declares, "He chose to give us birth through the word of truth, that we might be a kind of firstfruits of all he created" (James 1:18). Nothing else will save a lost sinner—not philosophy, not history, not science. Jesus says, "Flesh gives birth to flesh, but the Spirit gives birth to spirit" (John 3:6). If we are to experience divine life, we must experience it in the only way it can come—through the Bible as the Holy Spirit works through it.

2. Christians are convicted of sin and enabled to turn from it by the power of the Holy Spirit speaking through the Bible. Paul speaks of this in 2 Timothy 3:16: "All Scripture is Godbreathed and is useful for teaching, rebuking, correcting and training in righteousness." Scripture teaches us in a general way, of course. But it also rebukes our sin, corrects us, and then leads us in righteousness.

3. Christians are sanctified, or made holy, through the Bible. Jesus spoke of this when he prayed to his Father in that great intercessory prayer for the church recorded in John 17: "Sanctify them by the truth; your word is truth" (v. 17). To be sanctified means to be "set apart" for God and his purposes; it is what every Christian should be. Jesus says that we attain this commitment or orientation by our study of and obedience to God's Word.

4. Christians learn the will of God through the Bible, and it is through the Bible that they are given wisdom to apply the details of Scripture to their daily lives. The Bible does not give us magical instructions for making the many thousands of decisions we need to make in life. But it does give sound principles to guide us in our choices. As we read and study the Bible, God speaks to us by means of these principles and leads us in the ways of truth and righteousness.

This World's Most Precious Possession

The end of this study is in the form of questions, and they are these: When you hold a copy of the Word of God in your hands, do you recognize what the Bible truly is? Do you see it as God's Book? Do you thank God for it? Do you prize it above all earthly possessions? Do you make it your chief goal in life to know it and live by it?

Let me tell you what John Wesley, that great evangelist of the eighteenth century, wrote about the Bible:

I am a creature of a day, passing through life as an arrow through the air. I am a spirit come from God and returning to God, just hovering over the great gulf 'till, a few moments hence, I am no more seen; I drop into an unchangeable eternity! I want to know one thing—the way to heaven, how to land safe on that happy shore. God himself has condescended to teach me the way. For this very end he came from heaven. He hath written it down in a book. O give me that book! At any price, give me the book of God! I have it: Here is knowledge enough for me. Let me be homo unius libri [a man of one book]. Here then I am, far from the busy ways of men. I sit down alone. Only God is here. In his presence I open, I read his book—for this end, to find the way to heaven. Is there a doubt concerning the meaning of what I read? Does anything appear dark or intricate? I lift up my heart to the Father of Lights: "Lord, is it not thy word, 'If any man lacks wisdom, let him ask of God'? Thou hast said, 'If any be willing to do thy will, he shall know.' I am willing to do, let me know thy will."

That should be the cry of your heart if you know the Bible to be what it truly is: "the very words of God."

Only the Spirit of God working through that book, the Bible, will bring you to spiritual life and save your soul. Only that book and the Spirit of God working through it will sanctify you, making you like Jesus. Only that working will avert that great downward spiral of sin, both personal and cultural, which is described in Romans.

Chapter 33.

Two More Questions

Romans 3:3-8

It is not often that you or I get to witness an exceptional mind at work, particularly in a debate or other confrontational situation. The presidential debates, which have become a staple of our election process every four years, should provide it. But they do not. Usually they are only presentations of well-rehearsed positions, with little true interaction, and they are slanted to the media and what we have come to call "image building" and "nonverbal communication." Law courts, where legal questions are argued and decided, could provide an example, but the discussions are usually humdrum and technical. Besides, few of us actually have opportunities to witness trials. The closest examples of settings in which most of us can see keen minds at work are those rare television programs like Ted Koppel's "Nightline" or William Buckley's "Firing Line."

The apostle Paul was a keen-thinking individual, perhaps one of the sharpest men who ever lived. But we do not have copious places at which to observe his mind in action. In Acts, which records the progress of his missionary journeys, we are told repeatedly that Paul went into the Jewish synagogues and "reasoned" with the Jews (cf. Acts 9:22; 17:2-3, 17; 18:4, 28; 19:8). But there is almost no record of the form these debates took or of how Paul dealt with the questions his opponents would have been asking.

As I say, there are not many places where we can see Paul's sharp mind in action. But here in the third chapter of Romans we at least get a glimpse into the kind of back-and-forth reasoning that must have taken place again and again in the setting of Paul's missionary expositions.

The first two chapters of Romans contain the bedrock teaching of the apostle as to the nature and universality of human sin. All that he has said in those chapters is to be summarized in chapter 3.

But Paul seems to have been hearing in his mind the questions that sharp Jewish opponents had thrown up at him over the years, and he is therefore reluctant to move on to his summary without dealing with at least the most important of them. We have already looked at one of these questions: "What advantage, then, is there in being a Jew, or what value is there in circumcision?" (Rom. 3:1). In following Paul's logic at this point, we have seen that there are genuine advantages to the possession of spiritual things, even though they in themselves do not guarantee salvation. In particular, it is a great advantage to possess the Word of God.

In verses 3 through 8 of this chapter Paul deals with two more questions. In the text there are actually seven question marks as the apostle phrases these questions, no doubt reflecting ways in which they had been voiced to him. But there are really only two basic questions, and it is these that Paul answers before moving on to the great summary of verses 9 through 20.

The First Question: God's Faithfulness

The question Paul raises in verse 3—"What if some did not have faith? Will their lack of faith nullify God's faithfulness?"—grows out of what was being discussed previously.

In the first verses of the chapter Paul has defended the value of circumcision (the chief Jewish sacrament) and the possession of the Old Testament (the Jews' Bible), while at the same time maintaining his chief point: namely, that Jews are not saved by these things any more than Gentiles are saved by human morality or good works, and that Jews and Gentiles all therefore equally stand under the just condemnation of God apart from faith in Jesus Christ. "But," says Paul's opponent, "if Jews are not saved by these things and are therefore perishing in unbelief (since we all know that the majority of Jews do not believe in Jesus), isn't God then proved to be unfaithful to his people—since he has made an eternal covenant with them?" If Paul is right, God would have to be unfaithful. But since God is faithful, as both Paul and his opponents would acknowledge, isn't it true that Paul's arguments about the Jews being lost without Jesus Christ are erroneous?

This is an important question. And one way we know it is important is that Paul returns to it in the second major section of Romans (chapters 9-11), where he carefully answers two questions: Has God failed with the Jews? and Is God unjust in his treatment of them?

In these later chapters Paul deals with the issue by making the following six points:

1. God is sovereign in human affairs and does all things justly, even if this means passing over the mass of Jewish people for a time (Rom. 9:1-21). Paul makes this point by reviewing God's sovereign choice of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in order to form the Jewish people and establish the Messiah's line—while passing over Ishmael and Esau. If salvation is by election and therefore by grace, there can be no injustice in God's choosing to pass over anybody.

2. God prophesied that Israel as a whole would reject Christ and that he would offer the gospel to the Gentiles (Rom. 9:22-33). This was meant to keep Israel conscious of the very nature of the gospel, namely, that it is by grace—since Jews could never claim salvation as a right. Because of these prophecies (and warnings), the unbelief of the Jews, so very evident in Paul's day, should have come as a surprise to no one.

3. The offer of the gospel to the Gentiles was nevertheless for Israel's own good, since it was intended to provoke them to jealousy and therefore faith (Rom. 10:1-21). It was a "last resort" by God to reach out to those who had already rejected him.

4. In spite of the universal offer of the gospel to Gentiles as well as Jews and Israel's jealousy of that fact, a remnant of Jews is nevertheless being saved (Rom. 11:1). Paul cites himself as an example. "I ask then: Did God reject his people? By no means! I am an Israelite myself, a descendant of Abraham, from the tribe of Benjamin."

5. This situation is no different from what it has always been, because even in earlier days all

Jews were not saved, but rather it was only a remnant that believed and was faithful (Rom. 11:224). The apostle's example here is Elijah, who in the days of Ahab considered himself to be the only faithful Israelite left, but to whom God disclosed that there were seven thousand who had not worshiped Baal. The number was larger than Elijah imagined, but it was nevertheless just seven thousand. The many other thousands of Jews living at that time were not saved.

6. Notwithstanding Israel's present and persistent unbelief, there will yet be a day of national blessing in which God's promises to Israel will be completely fulfilled (Rom. 11:25-36). This truth is so marvelous that Paul closes this important section of the letter with a doxology.

Not all these points are made in Paul's much briefer treatment in Romans 3. But I have given them here because they provide the framework in which the words Paul does give must be taken. When Paul asks the question, "Will their lack of faith nullify God's faithfulness?" and when he answers, "Not at all!" it is clear that he is embracing at least two of the points he makes later: (1) that God is sovereign and that all he does is just; and (2) that God will not break his promises and that, as a result, his pledges to Israel will certainly be fulfilled in the end. Again, when Paul says, "What if some did not have faith?" he indicates: (1) that in spite of great national unbelief, "some" Jews, now as then, have believed in the Messiah; and that (2) then as now the way of salvation is through the channel of faith in God's promises.

In our sin all of us naturally presume on God, trying to manipulate him in the sense that we try to oblige him to save us regardless of what we either believe or do. The Jew did it by claiming that God must save him because of God's promises to the nation. We Christians do it by believing that God will save us because our parents were saved, because we have been baptized or confirmed or some such thing. But we cannot do that. God is faithful. He will save those he has promised to save. But not apart from faith! And not mechanically! If you are to be saved, it must be by faith in Jesus Christ, God's Son, whom God has appointed Savior.

Later Paul will say, "... if you confess with your mouth, 'Jesus is Lord,' and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved. For it is with your heart that you believe and are justified, and it is with your mouth that you confess and are saved. As the Scripture says, 'Everyone who trusts in him will never be put to shame'" (Rom. 10:9-11).

The Second Question: Our Sin

I indicated in an indirect way when dealing with verses 3 and 4 that the question there was at least reasonable and important, for it deals with the matter of God's faithfulness and rightly asks how God can be faithful to his promises if each and every member of the covenant people of Israel is not saved. That question is so important that Paul later takes three whole chapters to answer it, as we have seen. It is not this way with the second question. Did I say, "question"? It is a quibble. It is playing around. It is toying with theological matters and, as a result, deserves the scorn Paul gives it.

Yet Paul must have heard it a lot, just as we do. We gather this from the fact that he seems compelled to present it in three forms.

1. God's role as judge. The first form of the question has to do with God's role as judge of all the earth and could be rephrased as asking, "If our unrighteousness (or sin) is the necessary background against which God displays his wisdom, love, and mercy in salvation, how can God judge us for what therefore obviously has a good end?" We might think at this point that Paul would reply with some carefully reasoned distinction or with some truth that has formerly been hidden from us. He might reply that a good end does not justify a bad means, much the way Godet does at this point in his commentary. Godet refers to this logical error as utilitarianism:

It [the argument that good ends justify evil means] has always been sought to justify the greatest crimes in history by representing the advantages they have resulted to the cause of humanity. There is not a Robespierre who has not been transformed into a saint in the name of utilitarianism. But to make such a canonization valid, one would require to begin by proving that the useful result sprang from the evil committed as its principle. Such is the teaching of Pantheism. Living Theism, on the contrary, teaches that this transformation of the bad deed into a means of progress, is the miracle of God's wisdom and power continually laying hold of human sin to derive from it a result contrary to its nature. On the first view, all human responsibility is at an end, and the judgment becomes a nullity. On the second, man remains fully responsible to God for the bad deed as an expression of the evil will of its author, and despite the good which God is pleased to extract from it. Such is scriptural optimism, which alone reconciles man's moral responsibility with the doctrine of providential progress.

This is an argument Paul might have used to answer the quibble of his opponent. But, as I say, he does not. Instead, he replies merely by a categorical statement regarding the certainty of God's judgment. "Certainly not! If that were so, how could God judge the world?" (v. 6). The argument is: If there is a world, there must be a God who made it, to whom all who live and act in this world are responsible. Therefore the judgment of God is a given, and any argument that would suggest it is not is fallacious.

2. My condemnation. The second form of the objection is like the first, but it centers more on one's own contemplated judgment than on God's role as judge. The first says, "How can God judge sin if sin actually leads to what in the end is beneficial?" Paul's answer is that God is going to judge sin regardless. The second form of the objection says, "If my sin enhances God's truthfulness and so increases his glory, how can he condemn me?" Paul does not even answer this, but instead passes on to the third form of the question, after which he concludes: "Their condemnation is deserved" (v. 8b).

3. Doing evil that good may result. The last form of the question is the most extreme, but it seems to have been the way in which Paul most heard it—both because of the way Paul refers to it here and the fact that he deals with it in other places (cf. Rom. 6:1-23). Here Paul admits that this charge had been widely disseminated against him: "Why not say—as we are being slanderously reported as saying and as some claim that we say—'Let us do evil that good may result'?" (v. 8a). That is, the more one sins, the more God is glorified. I believe this is the most extreme form of the question because, in addition merely to dismissing the judgment of God or excusing sin, this argument actually encourages the indulgence of the sinful nature and appetite by allegedly Christian people.

You have heard this argument, too. It goes by the theological name of Antinomianism: "If we are saved by grace through faith, entirely apart from any works of the law, then what does it matter whether we live righteous lives or not? Indeed, isn't it good that we sin, because then God is given even greater glory as our Savior?"

Faith, Justification, and Good Works

As soon as I put the argument in that form, we recognize—even if we have not done so before— that although Paul is answering questions put to him long centuries ago, the issue is not a past issue but a current and very critical one. Indeed, it concerns the very nature of the gospel. Is it true that the gospel of salvation by grace leads to sin? Or at least that it excuses it? Is it enough to sin and then claim glibly, "I am forgiven," without genuine repentance expressed in a repudiation of the evil and a decision to live differently, not to mention a desire to make restitution? If it is— if this is where Christianity leads—then I for one want nothing to do with it. It is a mockery. It is an offense to God's justice. But if, on the other hand, we insist on Christians doing righteous deeds—declaring, as Paul does, that we must not sin that grace may abound—how do we preserve the true gospel of grace apart from human merit?

Here is where Roman Catholic theology and Protestant theology part company most radically. Catholics have a proper concern for works; no one can ever say that it is all right to sin and yet be saved, according to true Catholic teaching. But Catholic theology brings works into salvation in the sense that God justifies us in part by producing good works in us, so that we are saved by faith plus those good works. The Catholic formula for justification is:

Faith + Good Works = Justification

Protestants reply that we are justified by faith in Jesus Christ alone. No works enter into justification; not even faith is a work. But Protestants add (or should add—there is a great deal of deficient Protestant theology at this point) that good works must follow faith if we are justified. The Protestant formula would be:

Faith = Justification + Good Works

What of the deficient Protestant theology I mentioned parenthetically? What would be the formula of Antinomianism? That formula is:

Faith = Justification - Good Works

In other words, "Let us go on sinning so that grace may increase" (cf. Rom. 6:1).

It does not take an accomplished theologian to see that this is not true Christianity. Think, for example, how Jesus insisted on a radical change of behavior for all who would follow him. He said, "If anyone would come after me, he must deny himself and take up his cross daily and follow me" (Luke 9:23). He admonished those whose "faith" was only verbal, "Why do you call me, 'Lord, Lord,' and do not do what I say? I will show you what he is like who comes to me and hears my words and puts them into practice. He is like a man building a house, who dug down deep and laid the foundation on rock. When a flood came, the torrent struck that house but could not shake it, because it was well built. But the one who hears my words and does not put them into practice is like a man who built a house on the ground without a foundation. The moment the torrent struck that house, it collapsed and its destruction was complete" (Luke 6:46-49).

Furthermore, he told the Jews of his day, "... unless your righteousness surpasses that of the Pharisees and the teachers of the law, you will certainly not enter the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 5:20).

The reason all this can be said is that God never justifies a person without regenerating him or her; that is, the person being saved is given a new nature, which must and will hate sin and strive for righteousness. Paul does not spell this out in Romans 3, being content merely to scorn the position that thinks it possible to be on good terms with God and yet continue to sin. But he gets to it later—in chapter 6. There he shows that all who are saved are joined to Christ. Because Christ lives in them, they increasingly want what Christ wants. And if they find that they are not increasingly coming to hate sin and love righteousness, they are not really Christ's. They are not true Christians.

By definition, Christianity must be the most beneficial (I would say, the only ultimately beneficial) force in the world. Why? Because it is the work of God, and only God is or can be ultimately beneficent.

Do you doubt this? If so, you have not understood the first two chapters of Romans. Those chapters have told us of the nature and extent of human sin. They have demonstrated that men and women, left to themselves, are on a path leading away from God, the only source of true good, and that the progression along that path is always and inevitably downhill. No original or ultimate good comes from any mere man or woman, only evil. Therefore, if good is to be seen anywhere, it must be from God himself and be seen in those in whom he has planted his very nature.

What a calling, if you are a Christian! What a destiny!

"Do evil that good may result"? If you find yourself thinking that way, you are no true Christian. You are no Christian if evil in yourself and in others does not distress you. You are no Christian if you can take the transgressions of God's law lightly. If you are a Christian, you will hate sin, repudiate it, fight against it, and strive for righteousness.

Chapter 34.

No One Righteous, Not Even One

Romans 3:9-11

In the third chapter of Romans, beginning with verse 9, the apostle summarizes the condition of every human being apart from the grace of God in Jesus Christ. It is not a pretty picture. According to Paul, Jews are not better than Gentiles, and neither are Gentiles better than Jews.
Instead, all are alike under sin, and all are thus subject to the wrath and final judgment of Almighty God. Quoting from Psalm 14:1-3, Psalm 53:1-3, and Ecclesiastes 7:20, Paul declares: "As it is written: 'There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God.'"

This is a serious charge, indeed a devastating picture of the race, because it portrays human beings as unable to do even a single thing either to please, understand, or seek after God. It is an expression of what theologians rightly call man's "total depravity."

The doctrine of total depravity is hard for the human race to accept, of course, for one of the results of our being sinners is that we tend to treat sin lightly. Most people are willing to admit that they are not perfect. It takes an extraordinary supply of arrogance for any mere human being to pretend that he or she has no flaws. Generally we do not do that. But this is far different from admitting that we are utterly depraved so far as our having any natural ability to please God is concerned. We are willing to admit that we are not perfect, but not that we are not righteous. We are willing to admit that there are things not known to us, but not that we are devoid of all spiritual understanding. We are willing to admit that we wander off the true path at times, but not that we are not even on the right path. Instead of admitting that we are running away from God, we pretend that we are seeking him.

It is vitally important that we come to terms with this bad tendency to run from the truth about ourselves. Without an accurate knowledge of our sin, we will never come to know the meaning of God's grace. Without an awareness of our pride, we will never appreciate God's greatness, nor will we come to God for the healing we so desperately need. The situation is a bit like being sick and needing a doctor. As long as we are convinced we are well (or at least almost well), we will not seek medical care. But if we know we are spiritually sick, we will turn to the Great Physician, Jesus Christ, who alone is able to heal us.

How Bad Is It?

In making the previous point—that we need to recognize how desperate the situation is so we will turn to God for help—I have used the analogy of being sick and needing a physician. But now I want to say, as I have already suggested, that according to Romans 3:9-11 the situation is even worse than that. As long as someone is merely sick, the situation is not hopeless. He or she may get better and survive. But, according to these verses and others, apart from the grace of God a person is not only spiritually sick but dead. The sinner is moribund.

The uniqueness of the Bible's teaching can be seen by noting that in the long history of the human race there have been only three basic views of human nature: (1) that man is well; (2) that man is sick; and (3) that man is dead. There are variations in these views, of course. Optimists will say that man is well, but they may disagree on exactly how well he is; perhaps he might not be as well as he possibly could be. Or again, although more pessimistic observers will agree that man is sick—that there is something wrong with him—they will differ over how serious the illness is. Man may be acutely sick, critically sick, mortally sick, and so on. In spite of these variations, there are nevertheless only three basic views.

The first view—that man is essentially well—is the view of Liberalism and, for that matter, of most persons today. If people admit that anything at all is wrong with man, generally it is only that he is not as fully healthy as he could perhaps be. This view holds that, morally and spiritually speaking, all people need is a little exercise, spiritual vitamins, perhaps a psychological checkup once a year, and so on. Many would say that the human race is even getting better and better. This is the view of all optimists.

The second view—that man is sick—is the view of the pessimist, which is to say: anyone who has reflected seriously on the true facts of human nature. Those who believe that man is sick have looked at the general optimism of the last hundred years and have found it wanting. In those earlier days, flushed with the heady success of the industrial revolution, encouraged by technological and medical advances, and goaded by the beguiling doctrine of universal and inevitable evolution, people began to believe that the human race was ascending like a rocket and that within a reasonable time all human problems would be solved. Wars would cease. Starvation would be eliminated. Disease would be conquered. Indeed, people would learn to live and work together in a spirit of universal brotherhood and cooperation. But those who look at this blithe optimism today are rightly critical: If human nature is only "slightly flawed," as the optimists believe, how come the world has not been perfected by now? Why are there still wars? Why hasn't starvation or disease been eliminated? Why can't people get along with one another? The pessimist looks at this and concludes wisely that the situation is not good. In fact, it is terrible.

Pessimists believe that man is very sick indeed.

But not dead!

The pessimist believes that man is sick—very sick, even mortally ill—but adds, "As long as there's life there's hope." Sure, man may be ready to blow himself off the face of the earth and even destroy the planet while he is doing it. But the situation is still not hopeless, says the pessimist. We must work hard, tackle our ills and defeat them. There is no need to call the mortician yet.

The third view, the one the Bible presents, is that we humans are not well, nor even sick. We are dead so far as our being able to do anything to please, understand, or find God is concerned. That is, we are as God declared we would be when he warned Adam and Eve against eating of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. God said, "... you must not eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, for when you eat of it you will surely die" (Gen. 2:17). Our first parents did eat of it, and they did die. Thus it is true of us, as Paul said in writing to the Ephesians, that we are "dead in [our] transgressions and sins" (Eph. 2:1). Of ourselves we are as unable to respond to God as any corpse would be if someone, believing it alive, told it to do anything.

The Moral Nature: None Righteous

In the first part of his summary of the hopeless condition of man, the apostle speaks of man's moral nature and concludes that the human race is unrighteous. This does not mean merely that man is a bit less righteous than he needs to be to please God and somehow get to heaven. We cannot have understood the first chapter of Romans and think in those terms. Actually, when Paul says that "there is no one righteous," he means that from God's point of view human beings have no righteousness at all.

I emphasize "from God's point of view," not to suggest that any view other than God's is ever ultimately valid but merely to make clear that it is from this viewpoint that we need to assess the situation. This is because, if we assess the human condition from man's perspective, we will always conclude that at least some people are good—simply because they are better than what we think we observe in others.

Our problem at this point is that we think of the good we do (or can do), our righteousness, as being the same thing as God's righteousness, when it is actually quite different. We assume that by simply accumulating human goodness we can please God.

Let me give an illustration. Suppose that during the Vietnam War a platoon of American soldiers was captured and interred by the North Vietnamese. Imagine further that at some point in their captivity a Red Cross package arrived at the camp and that it contained, among other things, a game of Monopoly. The donor simply thought the soldiers would like to while away the long hours of their imprisonment playing it. The soldiers were glad to get the Monopoly game, but not for the reason the folks back home sent it to them. They were glad to have it because it gave them "money" with which to do camp business. Before this, if someone wanted to get something from another soldier—a cigarette, for example—he had to beg, borrow, or steal it. Now he could buy it with the Monopoly money. So the soldiers distributed the gold, yellow, blue, green, and white money and went into business.

It seems always the case among a group of Americans that one person is a naturally gifted capitalist, and this platoon was no exception. Because one man was a genius at buying low and selling high, in time he accumulated almost all the money in the camp.

Suppose further that eventually there was a prisoner-of-war exchange, and a group of North Vietnamese were exchanged for this platoon of Americans. A helicopter comes, picks them up, flies them to Da Nang, and from there it is only a matter of hours before they are back in the States on the California coast. Almost immediately the successful capitalist/soldier enters the First National Bank of San Francisco and steps up to the counter. The teller is pleased to open an account for him. "We are glad to help our veterans," she says. "How much do you want to deposit?"

"About half a million," the ex-prisoner answers, as he pushes $500,382 in Monopoly money over the counter and through the teller's window. Of course, the teller reaches down, not for a deposit slip but for the alarm button that will call someone to take this poor deranged man away.

That is the difference between human righteousness, on the one hand, and the righteousness God requires of us, on the other. Human righteousness is like Monopoly money. It has its uses in the game we call life. But it is not real currency, and it does not work in God's domain. God requires divine righteousness, just as in America only United States dollars are legal tender. We are going to find a little bit further along in Romans that Paul will write of Israel's failure to find God, using this very distinction: "Since they did not know the righteousness that comes from God and sought to establish their own, they did not submit to God's righteousness" (Rom. 10:3). That is, Israel wanted God to accept their own currency rather than come to Christ for the genuine currency he alone can provide.

So the first thing Paul says about the human race in his summary of its lost condition is that it has no righteousness. Verse 12 adds, "'All have turned away, they have together become worthless; there is no one who does good, not even one.'"

The Sinful Mind: None Understands

The second pronouncement Paul makes about human beings in their sinful condition is that no one understands spiritual things. Again, we need to view this as a lack of spiritual perception and not merely a lack of human knowledge. If we think on the human level, comparing the "understanding" of one person with that of another, we will observe rightly that some people obviously understand a great deal about our world. And since we are impressed by that, we will be misled. We need to see that in spiritual matters the important thing is that no one truly understands God or seeks to know him.

The best commentary upon this phrase is found in the first two chapters of 1 Corinthians. The people in the church at Corinth were mostly Greeks. They prized the wisdom of the Greek philosophers, as virtually all Greeks did. Paul writes that when he was with them he did not attempt to impress them with such wisdom, but rather that he determined to know nothing while among them "except Jesus Christ and him crucified" (1 Cor. 2:2). Why? He explains his decision in two ways.

First, human wisdom has shown itself bankrupt so far as coming to know God is concerned. Paul says that "the message of the cross is foolishness to those who are perishing, but to us who are being saved it is the power of God. For it is written: 'I will destroy the wisdom of the wise; the intelligence of the intelligent I will frustrate.' Where is the wise man? Where is the scholar? Where is the philosopher of this age? Has not God made foolish the wisdom of the world? For since in the wisdom of God the world through its wisdom did not know him, God was pleased through the foolishness of what was preached to save those who believe" (1 Cor. 1:18-21). In making this indictment, Paul was only echoing what the best of the Greeks had themselves concluded. The philosophers already knew they had been unable to discover God through human reasoning or scholarship.

The second way Paul explains his decision to know nothing while among the Greeks but Christ crucified is the statement that spiritual matters can only be known by God's Spirit: "The man without the Spirit does not accept the things that come from the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him, and he cannot understand them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2:14).

This does not mean that a person cannot have a rational understanding of Christianity or what the Bible teaches apart from the illumination of his or her mind by the Holy Spirit. In one sense, a scholar can understand and explain theological principles as well as any other area of human knowledge. An unbelieving philosopher can lecture accurately on the Christian idea of God. An unbelieving historian can analyze to near perfection the nature of the Reformation and describe the meaning of justification by faith. When I was at Harvard University there were non-Christian professors who could present the doctrines of Christianity so brilliantly that Christians would marvel at their lectures and be edified by them, and even unbelieving students would rise to their feet and applaud. But these professors did not believe what they were teaching. If they had been asked their opinion of what they were so accurately presenting, they would have said that it was all utter nonsense. It is in this sense that they, not being "spiritual," were unable to understand Christianity.

If we return to Romans 1, we are reminded of the cause of this ignorance. It is not that the doctrine of God (or any other doctrine of the Christian faith) is difficult to comprehend. It is rather that we do not want to move in the direction these doctrines lead us. So we suppress the truth about God, refusing to glorify or give thanks to him, and as a result our thinking becomes "futile" and our foolish hearts are "darkened" (v. 21).

The Captive Will: None Seeks God

Having spoken of our moral and intellectual failures, Paul moves at last to the area of the corrupt human will and concludes rightly that no one "seeks God."

Here again we must not think in merely human terms. If we do, we will conclude, contrary to Paul's teaching, that "seeking after God" has actually been the history of our race. I have already dealt with the academic expression of this view in our analysis of Romans 1:21-23, referring to Robert Brow's Religion: Origins and Ideas. Brow maintains that study of primitive peoples suggests, not that the human race has moved from primitive conceptions of God to higher conceptions of him —thus seeking after "God" constantly—but rather that the human race has been consistently running away from ideas of a high and holy God. He argues that primitive peoples generally have a truer picture of God than we do, though they do not worship him. They believe in a great and true God who stands behind their pantheon of animistic deities or lesser gods, but they do not worship this God, because they do not fear him as much as they do the immediate and hostile powers.

F. Godet saw this and wrote, "At the root of all pagan religions and mythologies, there lies an original Monotheism, which is the historical starting-point in religion for all mankind."

But here I want to focus on the way this negative principle works in our lives and society. Consider a man who believes himself to be the perfect refutation of Paul's statement that there is no one who seeks God. "But I do seek him," this man argues. "In fact, I have been seeking him all my life. I was born into a Baptist family; but I could not find God in my Baptist home or church. So, when I grew old enough to select a church on my own, I joined a Presbyterian church. Unfortunately, that was a bad church. No one could find God there. So I joined an Episcopalian church. Over the years I have attended almost every kind of church there is. I have been to Lutheran churches, Pentecostal churches, Methodist churches, Bible churches, independent churches. I have been seeking God all my life, but I haven't found him."

The answer to this man's argument is that he has not been seeking God. He has been running away from him. When God got close to him in his Baptist home and church, he left that church and joined a Presbyterian congregation. And when things got hot for him there—God can work in Presbyterian churches—he joined an Episcopal church. When God got too close to him there, he left it for a succession of other denominations. If he gets to the end of this circle, he will probably look around carefully to see if anyone is looking and then jump back in at the beginning.

This man is not seeking God. He is merely using religious trappings to disguise his intention of running away from the Almighty and everything true commitment and faith would entail.

Pursued by God

I come back to where I was at the beginning of this study and say that according to the Bible no one unaided by the Spirit of God (1) has any righteousness by which to lay a claim upon God;

(2) has any true understanding of God; or (3) seeks God. But what we do not have and cannot do and have not done, God has done for those who are being saved.

What exactly has God done? First, God has sought us. We had run from him, but like "The Hound of Heaven" God pursued us relentlessly. Some of us ran from God for a long time and can recall the days of our waywardness well. If God had not pursued us, we would have been lost eternally. We would never have come to God by ourselves. Now we know that no one is ever saved who has not first been pursued by God and been found by him. Second, God has given us understanding. He has done this by making us alive in Jesus Christ by the power of the Holy Spirit, as a result of which our eyes have been opened to see things spiritually. This does not mean that we perfectly comprehend all things about God and his ways, but we now truly "understand" in the sense that we believe these things and respond accordingly. Last of all, God has given us a righteousness that we did not have in ourselves and, in fact, could never have had—his righteousness, which is the righteousness of Jesus Christ and is the ground of our salvation.

Chapter 35.
The Bondage of the Will

Romans 3:11

Early in my study of Paul's letter to the Romans, I had an opportunity to teach this book to two separate groups of people for a week at a time. I covered a large number of Bible doctrines, touching on everything from election to glorification. But in both of those settings the point the listeners kept coming back to in question periods was the matter of the human will and its freedom or bondage.

I had said that if we are as desperately lost in sin as Romans 1:18-3:20 says we are, then, unaided by the Spirit of God, no one can come to God, choose God, or even believe on Jesus Christ and be saved—unless God first makes that person alive in Christ and draws him or her. But this is what troubled many. It did not seem consistent with what they knew of their ability to choose what they wanted to choose or reject what they wanted to reject. What is more, it seemed inconsistent with the many free offers of the gospel found throughout Scripture. What does the Bible mean when it says that we are "dead in [our] transgressions and sins" (Eph. 2:1)? Does that mean that we are really unable to respond to God in any way, even when the gospel is proclaimed to us? Or do we still have at least that ability? If we can respond, what did Jesus mean when he said, "No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him" (John 6:44a), or "No one can come to me unless the Father has enabled him" (John 6:65)? On the other hand, if we cannot respond, what is the meaning of those passages in which the gospel is offered to fallen men and women? For example, the Lord said through the prophet Isaiah, "Come, all you who are thirsty, come to the waters; and you who have no money, come, buy and eat!" (Isa. 55:1). What about such invitations? Furthermore, how can a person be held responsible for failing to believe in Jesus if he or she is unable to do so?

These questions come to us from Romans 3:10-11 because of the words with which Paul sums up man's spiritual condition. He has said that we are all unrighteous: "'There is no one righteous, not even one.'" Now he adds: "There is no one who understands, no one who seeks God.'" The way we interpret this verse has a lot to do with how we regard man's rock-bottom inability (or ability) where spiritual things are concerned.

The Debate in Church History

We might suspect, even if we knew nothing of the past, that a question as important as this must have been discussed often in church history, and this is indeed the case. In fact, the very best way of approaching the subject is through the debates that took place between the theological giants of past days.

The first important debate was between Pelagius and Saint Augustine toward the end of the fourth and the beginning of the fifth century. Pelagius argued for free will. He did not want to deny the universality of sin, at least at the beginning. He knew that "all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3:23a), and in this he wanted to remain orthodox. But Pelagius could not see how we can be responsible for something if we do not have free will in that matter. If there is an obligation to do something, there must be an ability to do it, he argued. Pelagius believed that the will, rather than being bound by sin, is actually neutral—so that at any moment or in any given situation it is free to choose either good or evil.

This worked itself out in several ways. For one thing, it led to a view of sin as only those deliberate and unrelated acts in which the will actually chooses to do evil. Thus any necessary connection between sins or any hereditary principle of sin within the race was forgotten. Pelagius argued further that:

1. The sin of Adam affected no one but himself, and
2. Those born since Adam have been born into the same condition Adam was in before his fall, that is, into a position of neutrality so far as sin is concerned, and
3. Today human beings are able to live free from sin if they want to.

This is probably the root view of most people today, including many Christians. But it is faulty, because it limits the nature and scope of sin and because it leads to a denial of the necessity for the unmerited grace of God in salvation. Moreover, even when the gospel is preached to a fallen sinner (according to this view), what ultimately determines whether he or she will be saved is not the supernatural working of God through the Holy Spirit, but rather the person's will, which either receives or rejects the Savior—and this gives human beings glory that ought to go to God.

In his early life Augustine had thought along the same lines. But when he became a Christian and as he studied the Bible, Augustine came to see that Pelagianism does not do justice to either the biblical doctrine of sin or the grace of God in salvation.

Augustine saw that the Bible always speaks of sin as more than mere isolated and individual acts. It speaks of an inherited depravity as a result of which it is simply not possible for the individual to stop sinning. Augustine had a phrase for this fundamental human inability: non posse non peccare. It means "not able not to sin." That is, unaided by God, a person is just not able to stop sinning and choose God. Augustine said that man, having used his free will badly in the fall, lost both himself and his will. He said that the will is free of righteousness, but it is enslaved to sin. It is free to turn from God, but not to come to him.

As far as grace is concerned, Augustine saw that apart from grace no one can be saved.
Moreover, it is a matter of grace from beginning to end, not just of "prevenient" grace or partial grace to which the sinner adds his or her efforts. Otherwise, salvation would not be entirely of God, God's honor would be diminished, and human beings would be able to boast in heaven. Any view that leads to such consequences must be wrong, for God has declared: "It is by grace you have been saved, through faith—and this not from yourselves, it is the gift of God—not by works, so that no one can boast" (Eph. 2:8-9).

In defending his views, Augustine won the day, and the church supported him. But Christianity gradually drifted back in the direction of Pelagianism during the Middle Ages.

At the time of the Reformation the battle erupted again, first between Martin Luther and a Dutch humanist, Erasmus of Rotterdam, and then between Jacob Arminius and the followers of John Calvin.

The most interesting debate was between Luther and Erasmus. The latter had been sympathetic to the Reformation in its early stages because, like most wise people of the time, he saw that the church badly needed to be reformed. But Erasmus did not have Luther's spiritual undergirdings, and at last he was prevailed upon to challenge the reformer. Erasmus chose to write on the freedom of the will. He said that the will must be free—for reasons very much like those given by Pelagius. Still, the subject did not mean a great deal to Erasmus, and he counseled moderation, no doubt hoping that Luther would do likewise.

It was no small matter to Luther, however, and he did not approach the subject with detached moderation. Luther approached the matter zealously, viewing it as an issue upon which the very truth of God depended. In one place, in the midst of demolishing the Dutch humanist's views, Luther wrote: "I give you hearty praise and commendation on this... account—that you alone, in contrast with all others, have attacked the real thing, that is, the central issue."

In this work, The Bondage of the Will, which Luther considered his greatest theological writing, the reformer did not deny the psychological fact that men and women do make choices. This is so obvious that no one can really deny it. What Luther affirmed was that in the specific area of an individual's choice of God or failure to choose God, the will is impotent. In this area Luther was as determined to deny the will's freedom as Erasmus was determined to affirm it. We are wholly given over to sin, said Luther. Therefore, our only proper role is humbly to acknowledge our sin, confess our blindness, and admit that we can no more choose God by our enslaved wills than we can please him by our sullied moral acts. All we can do is call on God for mercy, knowing even as we seek to do so that we cannot even call for mercy unless God is first active to convict us of sin and lead us to embrace the Lord Jesus Christ for salvation.

In trying to convey Luther's thought, I used to say that although we have free will in many areas, we do not have free will in all areas. That is, we can choose what we want in some things—little things like what we will select from a menu, what color tie we will put on, what job we will take. But we do not have free will in the important areas. If I have an intelligence quotient of 120, I cannot make it 140 just by the exercise of my free will. Unless I am an Olympic-class athlete, I cannot choose to run a mile in four minutes or the hundred-yard dash in nine seconds. I used to say that in exactly the same way, none of us can choose God by the mere exercise of our will.

Edwards's "Freedom of the Will"

I do not present the matter that way anymore, however, and the reason I do not is that in the meantime I have read Jonathan Edwards's treatise on the freedom of the will and now think differently. Not on the basic issue or in my conclusions—but in the way I define the will.

Let me explain.

It can hardly escape anyone who looks at Edwards's treatise that at least on the surface Edwards seemed to be saying the exact opposite of what Saint Augustine and Martin Luther had said. Luther titled his study The Bondage of the Will, in opposition to Erasmus's Freedom of the Will, whereas Jonathan Edwards's treatise is titled "A Careful and Strict Inquiry into the Prevailing Notions of the Freedom of the Will." The title does not specifically state that Edwards was asserting the will's "freedom," only that he was going to investigate the prevailing ideas about it, but, it is not by chance that Edwards used words opposite to Luther's. In the end, Edwards came out on the same side as Luther and of all the great biblical theologians before him. But along the way he made a unique contribution to the subject for which the idea of the "freedom" of the will was appropriate.

In this important work the first thing Edwards did was to define the will. Strangely, no one had done this previously. Everyone had operated on the assumption that we all know what the will is. We call the will that mechanism in us that makes choices. Edwards saw that this was not accurate and instead defined the will as "that by which the mind chooses anything." That may not seem to be much of a difference, but it is a major one. It means, according to Edwards, that what we choose is not determined by the will itself (as if it were an entity to itself) but by the mind, which means that our choices are determined by what we think is the most desirable course of action.

Edwards's second important contribution was in the treatment of what he termed "motives." He asked, "Why is it that the mind chooses one thing rather than another?" His answer: The mind chooses as it does because of motives. That is, the mind is not neutral. It thinks some things are better than other things, and because it thinks that way it always chooses the "better" things. If a person thought one course of action was better than another and yet chose the less desirable alternative, the person would be acting irrationally or, to use other language, he would be insane.

Does this mean that the will is bound, then? Quite the contrary. It means that the will is free. It is always free. That is, it is free to choose (and always will choose) what the mind thinks is best.

But what does the mind think is best? Here we get to the heart of the problem as it involves choosing God. When confronted with God, the mind of a sinner never thinks that the way of God is a good course. The will is free to choose God; nothing is stopping it. But the mind does not regard submission to God and serving God as being desirable. Therefore, it turns from God, even when the gospel is most winsomely presented. It turns from God because of what we saw in Romans 1. The mind does not want God to be sovereign. It does not consider the righteousness of God to be the way to personal fulfillment or happiness. It does not want its true sinful nature exposed. The mind is wrong in its judgments, of course. The way it chooses is actually the way of alienation and misery, the end of which is death. But human beings think sin to be the best way. Therefore, unless God changes the way we think—which he does in some by the miracle of the new birth—our minds always tell us to turn from God. And so we do turn from him.

Moral Inability

The third great contribution Edwards made to understanding why the will never chooses God, although it is free, concerns responsibility, the matter that had troubled Pelagius so profoundly. Here Edwards wisely distinguished between what he called "natural" inability and what he termed "moral" inability. Let me give a simple illustration.

In the natural world there are animals that eat nothing but meat. They are called carnivores from caro, carnis, which means "meat." There are other animals that eat nothing but grass or plants. They are called herbivores from herba, which means vegetation. Imagine that we have captured a lion, a carnivore, and that we place a bundle of hay or a trough of oats before him. He will not eat the hay or oats. Why not? Is it because he is physically, or naturally, unable to eat them? No. Physically he could munch on the oats and swallow them. But he does not and will not, because it is not in his nature to eat this kind of food. Moreover, if we could ask why he will not eat the herbivore's meal and the lion could answer, he would say, "I cannot eat this food, because I hate it. I will only eat meat."

Now think of the verse that says, "Taste and see that the LORD is good" (Ps. 34:8a) or of Jesus' saying, "I am the living bread that came down from heaven. If a man eats of this bread, he will live forever..." (John 6:51). Why will a sinful man or woman not "taste and see that the Lord is good" or feed upon Jesus as "the living bread"? To use the lion's words, it is because that person "hates" such food. The sinner will not come to Christ—because he does not want to. It is not because he cannot come physically.

Someone who does not hold to this teaching (there are many today) might say, "But surely the Bible says that anyone who will come to Christ may come to him. Didn't Jesus invite us to come? Didn't he say, 'Whoever comes to me I will never drive away'" (John 6:37b)? The answer is yes, that is exactly what Jesus said. But it is beside the point. Certainly anyone who wants to come to Christ may come to him. That is why Jonathan Edwards insisted that the will is not bound. The fact that we may come is what makes our refusal to seek God so unreasonable and increases our guilt. But who is it who wills to come?

The answer is: No one, except those in whom the Holy Spirit has already performed the entirely irresistible work of the new birth so that, as a result of this miracle, the spiritually blind eyes of the natural man are opened to see God's truth, and the totally depraved mind of the sinner, which in itself has no spiritual understanding, is renewed to embrace the Lord Jesus Christ as Savior.

Old and Practical Doctrine

This is not new teaching, of course, although it seems new to many who hear it in our own quite superficial age. It is merely the purest and most basic form of the doctrine of man embraced by most Protestants and even (privately) by many Catholics. The Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England say: "The condition of man after the fall of Adam is such, that he cannot turn and prepare himself by his own natural strength and good works to faith, and calling upon God; wherefore we have no power to do good works, pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing us [that is, being present beforehand to motivate us], that we may have a good will, and working with us when we have that will" (Article 10).

In the same way the Westminster Larger Catechism states, "The sinfulness of that state whereinto man fell, consisteth in the guilt of Adam's first sin, the want of that righteousness wherein he was created, and the corruption of his nature, whereby he is utterly indisposed, disabled, and made opposite to all that is spiritually good, and wholly inclined to all evil, and that continually" (Answer to Question 25).

I suppose that at this point there are people who are willing to agree, somewhat reluctantly, that the inability of the will to choose God or believe on Christ is the prevailing doctrine of the church and perhaps even the teaching of the Bible. But they are still not certain of this teaching's value and may even consider it harmful. They ask, "If we teach that men and women cannot choose God (even if this is true), don't we destroy the main impetus to evangelism and undercut the missionary enterprise? Isn't it better just to keep quiet about it?"

It should be a sufficient answer to this worry to say that the very person who gave us the Great Commission said, "No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him."

But let me answer instead by saying that, contrary to this doctrine being a hindrance to evangelism, it is actually the greatest possible motivation for spreading the gospel. If it is true that the sinner, left alone, never naturally seeks out God, how is that individual ever going to find God unless other people, sent by God, carry the gospel to him (or her). "Ah, but even then the person cannot respond," says the objector. True enough. Not by himself. But it is through the preaching and teaching of the gospel that God chooses to call people to faith, and anyone who obeys God and takes the gospel to the lost can be encouraged to know that God will work through this means. Moreover, the evangelist will pray for the sinner, since nothing but the work of God—certainly not the eloquence or charm of man—can save him.

"But surely you must not tell the sinner that he cannot respond unless God first does a work of regeneration in him?" argues a skeptic. On the contrary, that is exactly what the sinner needs to know. For it is only in such understanding that sinful human beings learn how desperate their situation is and how absolutely essential is God's grace. If we are hanging on to some confidence in our own spiritual ability, no matter how small, we will never seriously worry about our condition. There will be no sense of urgency. "Life is long. There will be time to believe later," we say, as if we can bring ourselves to believe when we want to, perhaps on our deathbed after we have done what we wish with our lives. At least we are ready to take a chance on it. But if we are truly dead in sin, as Paul says we are, and if that involves our will as well as all other parts of our psychological and spiritual makeup, we will find ourselves in near despair. We will see our state as hopeless apart from the supernatural and totally unmerited workings of the grace of God.

And that is what God wants! He will not have us boasting of even the smallest human contribution to salvation. It is only as we renounce all such vain possibilities that he will show us the way of salvation through Christ and lead us to him.

Chapter 36.
No One Who Does Good

Romans 3:12

I do not know why God should bother to speak to us about something more than once, like a parent trying to correct a naughty child: "Johnny, get out of the mud. Johnny, stop climbing in the tree; you'll fall. Johnny, don't speak like that to your sister." But God does speak to us again and again; and it is good he does, because we need it. Indeed, most of us have trouble hearing him even then.

To my knowledge, nothing in the Bible is repeated as frequently or as forcefully as the words summing up mankind's sinful nature, which we find in Romans 3:10-12, particularly verse 12. Psalm 14:2 and Psalm 53:2, where a question is posed by the psalmist, form the basis for the apostle's answer in verses 10 and 11. Verse 12 is a verbatim quotation (from the Septuagint). Psalm 14:3 says, "All have turned aside, they have together become corrupt; there is no one who does good, not even one." Psalm 53:3 almost exactly repeats that charge: "Everyone has turned away, they have together become corrupt; there is no one who does good, not even one." Now, in Romans 3:12, the words are written out for us one more time: "All have turned away, they have together become worthless; there is no one who does good, not even one."

You would think that we might begin to get the message at this point. If God says something once, we should listen to what he says very carefully. If he says the same thing twice, we should give him our most intense and rapt attention. What if he repeats himself a third time? Then surely we should stop all else, focus our minds, seize upon each individual word, memorize what is said, and ponder the meaning of the saying intensely, attempting to apply the truth of God's revelation to our entire lives.

A More Manageable View

Yet we do not do this, and the reason we do not is that the revelation of God is too intense, too penetrating, too devastating for us to deal with it. What we do, even as Christians, is blandly to admit what God is saying while nevertheless recasting it in less disturbing terms.

I remember as a child being taught a Sunday-school lesson about sin. The teacher used a blackboard, and she began the lesson by drawing a yardstick in a vertical position on the left side of the blackboard. The yardstick was labeled "the divine measure," and a verse was written beside it: Matthew 5:48 ("Be perfect, therefore, as your heavenly Father is perfect"). A line was drawn across the top of the blackboard at the point to which the top of the yardstick reached. This was the standard. The teacher then asked, "Has anyone ever lived up to this standard?"

After a few suggestive hints, one of the students answered, "Yes, the Lord Jesus Christ lived up to it."

"That's right," said the teacher. So she drew a line parallel to the yardstick, reaching from the bottom of the blackboard to the line at the top that represented perfection. She labeled this line "Jesus Christ."

"Has anybody else lived up to this standard?" she continued. We agreed that nobody else had, although, as she pointed out, some people have done better than others. To show that some persons are better than others but that no one had reached perfection she drew a number of vertical lines, all of which fell short of the "perfection" standard. There was a line labeled "98 percent" for very good people, lines labeled "90 percent" and "80 percent" for fairly normal people, and a line labeled "40 percent" for pretty bad people. Then Romans 3:23 was added, the teacher pointing out that although some people are better than others, with God "there is no difference, for all have sinned and fall short of [his] glory."

As I look back on that lesson I do not doubt that it taught some very valuable things, primarily that although some people look quite good to us by our standards, all people nevertheless fail to please God and need a Savior. As a tool for teaching this, the lesson was effective.

But the illustration on which the lesson was based has one great weakness. By putting the lines representing "98 percent" people, "90 percent" people, "80 percent" people, and "40 percent" people parallel to the line representing Jesus Christ, the diagram inevitably suggests that human goodness is essentially the same as divine goodness and that all people really need is that little bit of additional goodness which—added to their own efforts and attainments—will make up the required "100 percent." That error needs to be repudiated.

Is that what Psalm 14:3, Psalm 53:3, and Romans 3:12 teach us? Not at all! If we are to express the teaching of these verses by our diagram, we must either eliminate the lines representing human beings from the diagram entirely or else represent them not as lines stretching upward in the direction of divine perfection, but downward in varying degrees of opposition to God and his righteousness. God does not merely say that people fail to live up to his standard, although that is also true and is one way of expressing sin's nature. He says rather that we have all "turned away." We have "together become worthless; there is no one who does good, not even one."

All, Like Sheep...

I suggested earlier that when God says something more than once we should pay the most rapt attention to it, memorizing and pondering each word. I would like to do something like that now, taking one phrase of Romans 3:12 at a time. The first is: "All have turned away."

This phrase is expressed in just two words in Greek: pantes, properly translated "all," and exeklinan, a past form of a verb meaning "to deviate," "wander" or "depart" from the right way. That "right way" is outlined in the opening chapter of Romans; it is to recognize God's eternal power and divine nature and then to glorify, thank, worship, and serve him (vv. 21, 25). But it is precisely from this right way that we have deviated. Instead of seeking God and worshiping him in thankful service, we have suppressed the truth about him and gone our own way, inventing false gods to take the true God's place and finding our intellect and morals to be increasingly debased as a result.

This indictment includes every human being. At the beginning of the verse the inclusiveness is expressed positively by the strong word all. At the end it is expressed negatively by the words not even one. One commentator writes, "As respects well-doing there is not one; as respects evildoing there is no exception."

But Paul's words do not only draw our attention to Romans 1, where the departure of men and women from the right way is spelled out. They also make us think of that well-known verse in Isaiah, where sinners are compared to sheep who cannot find their way: "We all, like sheep, have gone astray, each of us has turned to his own way..." (Isa. 53:6). Ah, that is the problem! Not only have we not gone God's way, we have not even gone in ways marked out by other people. We have each gone our own way. Consequently, each of us is basically set against all others, and we pursue our own well-being and desires to the neglect or hurt of other people.

I like some words that the great Swiss theologian Karl Barth offers at this point in his famous commentary on Romans, for they suggest that Paul's condemnation of the race is not merely a matter of biblical revelation but is the judgment of history as well. "The whole course of history pronounces this indictment against itself," Barth begins. So "how can a man be called 'historically minded' if he persistently overlooks it?" He continues:

If all the great outstanding figures in history, whose judgments are worthy of serious consideration, if all the prophets, psalmists, philosophers, fathers of the church, reformers, poets, artists, were asked their opinion, would one of them assert that men were good or even capable of good? Is the doctrine of original sin merely one doctrine among many? Is it not rather, according to its fundamental meaning..., the doctrine which emerges from all honest study of history? Is it not the doctrine which, in the last resort, underlies the whole teaching of history? Is it possible for us to adopt a "different point of view" from that of the Bible, Augustine and the Reformers? What then does history teach about the things which men do or do not do?

Does it teach that some men at least are like God? No, but that—There is none righteous, no not one.

Does it teach that men possess a deep perception of the nature of things? or that they have experienced the essence of life? No, but that—There is none that understandeth.

Does it provide a moving picture of quiet piety or of fiery search after God? Do the great witnesses to the truth furnish a splendid picture, for example, of "prayer"? No—There is none that seeketh after God.

Can it describe this or that individual and his actions as natural, healthy, genuine, original, rightminded, ideal, full of character, affectionate, attractive, intelligent, forceful, ingenuous, of sterling worth? No—They have all turned aside, they are together become unprofitable; there is none that doeth good, no, not so much as one.

Commentator Robert Haldane says, "The Prophet here teaches us what is the nature of sin [and]... what are its consequences. For as the man who loses his way cannot have any rest in his mind, nor any security, it is the same with the sinner. And as a wanderer cannot restore himself to the right way without the help of a guide, in the same manner the sinner cannot restore himself, if the Holy Spirit comes not to his aid."

Corrupt and Useless

The second phrase in Romans 3:12 is also composed of just two Greek words, and the impact is similar. The first word is hama. It means "together." It is the equivalent of "all" in phrase one. The second word is ēchreōthēsan, the past tense of a verb meaning "useless" or "corrupt." I say "useless" or "corrupt" because the word in Greek (the language in which Paul is writing) and the word in Hebrew (the language in which the word occurs in Psalms 14 and 53) have these two closely related meanings respectively. Together they say what Jesus meant when he described his followers as "the salt of the earth," adding, "But if the salt loses its saltiness, how can it be made salty again? It is no longer good for anything, except to be thrown out and trampled by men" (Matt. 5:13).

What do you do if something is corrupt or useless? You throw it away and start again. I remember a scene from the movie on the life of the great renaissance painter Michelangelo, called The Agony and the Ecstasy, which made this point. Michelangelo was unhappy with his first attempt at painting the Sistine Chapel, and he was mulling the problem over in a local bar. The bartender served a flagon of wine drawn from a new barrel, but the wine was sour.

"This wine is sour, bartender," shouted Michelangelo.

The bartender came to the table, tasted the wine, and then spit it out. Very decisively he went over to the wine barrel, struck the bung from it with a wooden hammer and allowed the many gallons of wine to pour out into the street. "If the wine is sour, throw it out," he retorted.

Michelangelo mulled this over and then applied the principle to his first inadequate designs. He went back to the Sistine Chapel, destroyed his original frescoes—and began again.

"Useless!" "Corrupt!" We do not like to hear those words applied to ourselves, but they are God's verdict all the same. We must accept them. However, when we do, we can know that God does not merely pour us out like wine to be trodden on by passers-by. Rather, like Michelangelo, he begins again and produces a brand-new work of art. He begins anew in order to make us entirely new creations, like Jesus Christ.

No One Who Does Good

The last of Paul's phrases is the most straightforward. Indeed, it is so precise and outspoken that we can hardly miss what he is saying:

"There is no one who does good, not even one." No one at all does good —no one!

This verse always takes my mind back to the Old Testament, to Genesis, where there appears a similar statement of man's utter inability to please God by any human effort: "The LORD saw how great man's wickedness on the earth had become, and that every inclination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil all the time" (Gen. 6:5). That verse says not only that men and women do not do good, as God counts goodness; they do precisely the opposite. They do evil and that continually. I have pointed out, in a detailed exposition of this text in Genesis: An Expositional Commentary, that Genesis 6:5 teaches that sin is internal (rising from the "thoughts" and inclinations of the "heart"), pervasive (affecting our "every inclination" so that our deeds are "only evil") and continuous (that is, operating "all the time").

I suppose there are people who might recognize the truth of these statements, at least in the sense that they accurately express the opinions of Paul and of Moses (who wrote Genesis). But they might dismiss them as merely the harsh and gloomy thoughts of these men. Paul had been a Pharisee—and Pharisees thought poorly of everyone, didn't they? And Moses? Well, he was the great lawgiver, so he might be inclined to pessimism. What about Jesus? What did he think? Wouldn't the gentle, loving, and compassionate Jesus have a more uplifting outlook?

I think here of a section of an address given at one of the Philadelphia Conferences on Reformed Theology by Professor Roger R. Nicole of Gordon Conwell Theological Seminary. It was called "The Doctrines of Grace in Jesus' Teaching," and the pertinent section stressed Christ's view of human evil. Nicole wrote:

Our Lord Jesus Christ, with all the concern, compassion and love which he showed to mankind, made some very vivid portrayals of man's condition. He did not mince words about the gravity of human sin. He talked of man as salt that has lost its savor (Matt. 5:13). He talked of man as a corrupt tree which is bound to produce corrupt fruit (Matt. 7:7). He talked of man as being evil: "You, being evil, know how to give good things to your children" (Luke 11:13). On one occasion he lifted up his eyes toward heaven and talked about an "evil and adulterous generation" (Matt. 12:39), or again, "this wicked generation" (v. 45). In a great passage dealing with what constitutes true impurity and true purity he made the startling statement that out of the heart proceed murders, adulteries, evil thoughts and things of that kind (Mark 7:21-23). He spoke about Moses having to give special permissive commandments to men because of the hardness of their hearts (Matt. 19:8). When the rich young ruler approached him, saying, "Good Master," Jesus said, "There is none good but God" (Mark 10:18)....

Jesus compared men, even the leaders of his country, to wicked servants in a vineyard (Matt. 21:33-41). He exploded in condemnation of the scribes and Pharisees, who were considered to be among the best men, men who were in the upper ranges of virtue and in the upper classes of society (Matt. 23:2-39).

The Lord Jesus made a fundamental statement about man's depravity in John 3:6: "That which is born of the flesh is flesh." He saw in man an unwillingness to respond to grace—"You will not come to God" (John 5:40), "You have not the love of God" (v. 42), "You receive me not" (v. 43), "You believe not" (v. 47). Such sayings occur repeatedly in the Gospel of John. "The world's works are evil" (John 7:7); "None of you keeps the law" (v. 19). "You shall die in your sins," he says (John 8:21). "You are from beneath" (v. 23); "Your father is the devil, who is a murderer and a liar" (vv. 38, 44); "You are not of God" (v. 47); "You are not of my sheep" (John 10:26); "He that hates me hates my Father" (John 15:23-25). This is the way in which our Lord spoke to the leaders of the Jews. He brought to the fore their utter inability to please God.

Following another line of approach he showed also the blindness of man, that is, his utter inability to know God and understand him. Here again we have a whole series of passages showing that no man knows the Father but him to whom the Son has revealed him (Matt. 11:27). He compared men to the blind leading the blind (Matt. 15:14). He mentioned that Jerusalem itself did not know or understand the purpose of God and, as a result, disregarded the things that concern salvation (Luke 19:42). The Gospel of John records him as saying that he that believed not was condemned already because he had not believed on the Son of God (John 3:18). "This is the condemnation, that... men loved the darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil" (v. 19). He said that only the one who has been reached by grace can walk not in darkness but have the light of life (John 8:12). The Lord Jesus emphasized that it is essential for man to be saved by a mighty act of God if he is to be rescued from his condition of misery (John 3:3, 5, 716). Even in the Lord's Prayer the Lord teaches us to say, "Forgive us our debts" (Matt. 6:12).

And this is a prayer that we need to repeat again and again. He said, "The sick are the people who need a physician" (Matt. 9:12). We are those sick people who need a physician to help us and redeem us. He said that we are people who are burdened and heavy-laden (Matt. 11:28)....

The people who were most readily received by the Lord were those who had this sense of need and who therefore did not come to him with a sense of the sufficiency of their performance. The people he received were those who came broken-hearted and bruised with the sense of their inadequacy.

After such a review of Jesus' teaching, Paul's words in Romans seem almost mild by comparison.

Grace That Is Greater Than Sin

But they are not mild, of course! They are devastating, as I indicated at the beginning of this study. Why? Why does God speak to us in these terms? The answer is obvious. It is so we might see our true condition, stop trying to excuse ourselves or whittle down the scope of God's judgment, and instead open ourselves up to God's grace. For that is what we need: grace!

Grace, grace, God's grace,

Grace that will pardon and cleanse within;
Grace, grace, God's grace,
Grace that is greater than all our sin.

We have this grace in Jesus Christ. He alone can save us from our depravity.

Chapter 37.
The Race in Ruin

Romans 3:13-18

We have already had one very grim description of the human race in the verses that end Romans 1. There humanity was described as being "filled with every kind of wickedness, evil, greed and depravity. They are full of envy, murder, strife, deceit and malice. They are gossips, slanderers, God-haters, insolent, arrogant and boastful; they invent ways of doing evil; they disobey their parents; they are senseless, faithless, heartless, ruthless" (vv. 29-31). After a list of such vices we might think that a further catalogue would be unnecessary. Yet, as Paul gets to the end of this first main section of Romans, in which the need of people for the gospel of grace is so clearly and comprehensively pointed out, he seems to sense a need to do it all over again.

So he writes:

"Their throats are open graves; their tongues practice deceit."
"The poison of vipers is on their lips."
"Their mouths are full of cursing and bitterness."
"Their feet are swift to shed blood; ruin and misery mark their ways, and the way of peace they do not know."
"There is no fear of God before their eyes."

Romans 3:13-18

The difference between this and the passage in Romans 1 is that each of these sentences is a quotation from the Old Testament, whereas the earlier passage was made up merely of the apostle's own descriptive terminology. In other words, the verses in Romans 1 are a description of the world as Paul saw it, though he is also writing as an apostle and by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. The verses in Romans 3 are more specifically and obviously God's own description of the race's depravity.

Wicked Words from Wicked Men

Verses 13 and 14 are made up of three quotations from the Old Testament: Psalm 5:9, Psalm 140:3, and Psalm 10:7, though there are other passages that are similar. What is striking about them is that they all refer to the organs of speech: throat, tongue, lips, and mouth. And they describe how the words spoken by these organs are used to harm others. In the previous verses we have been shown how people harm themselves by turning away from God. Here we learn how they also harm others by the organs of speech that God gave them.

What do you think of first when you read these verses? If you are like me, you notice the words cursing and bitterness and think, first of all, of harsh speech, which is meant to wound another person. Perhaps when you were a child and other children said hurtful things to you, you were taught this little saying by a parent or a family friend: "Sticks and stones may break my bones, but words will never hurt me."

Unfortunately, I am sure you also learned—if you thought about it—that this little saying is not really true. It is a way of bolstering our egos to help us get through some difficult times, but it is not true that words do not hurt us. Words do hurt; they hurt deeply. In fact, they often hurt permanently. When I think back on my childhood I can remember times when I suffered some physical injury. I broke my collarbone, damaged two teeth, tore the cartilage in my left leg, and suffered scores of bumps, bangs, and bruises. But, although I can sometimes recall the incidents, I cannot remember even one bit of the pain. Yet I remember the pain of words. I remember harsh things other people said, and I still hurt when I recall them. Sticks and stones do hurt our bones—temporarily. But words wound forever.

Yet, I think that what Paul is saying here goes deeper. Indeed, it is clear that it does, because the words that describe the outcome of the harmful words of the ungodly all have to do, not with psychological injury, but with death.

Martin Luther has written the most penetrating study of this passage of any commentator I have studied, and he, with characteristic insight and brilliance, relates these evil words not just to hurtful things someone may say to us, but to false teachings or heresy, which are able to kill the soul. Luther suggests that those who teach falsely do three things:

1. They devour the dead. This means that they devour those who are spiritually dead already. Here he writes vividly: "Their teaching... swallows up the dead, who have gone from faith to unbelief, and swallows them up in such a way that there is no hope of returning from the death of this unbelief, unless they can be recalled by the most wonderful power of God before they descend to hell, as the Lord showed in the case of Lazarus who had been dead for four days. He says, moreover, that the grave is 'open' because they devour and seduce many people." Luther quotes Psalm 14:4 ("Have they no knowledge, all the evildoers who eat up my people as they eat bread?"), then continues: "That is, just as there is squeamishness about eating bread, even though it is eaten more frequently than other foods, so also they do not cease to devour their dead, and their disciples are never satisfied." Luther concludes, "Heresy, or faithless teaching, is nothing else than a kind of disease or plague which infects and kills many people, just as is the case with the physical plague."

And, of course, this is precisely the business the world's purveyors of words are engaged in, even those who are highly regarded by our society. I was once talking with Josh D. McDowell, the popular Christian apologist who speaks widely on college campuses for Campus Crusade for Christ and is author of the best-selling books Evidence That Demands a Verdict and More Evidence That Demands a Verdict. McDowell was in the process of launching a nationwide campaign called "Why Wait?" whose purpose was to encourage today's teens to reject sexual experience before marriage. We were discussing this campaign and some of the pressures on today's young people. He mentioned television, pointing out that the average young person today will have seen more than ninety thousand explicit sexual encounters on television before he or she reaches the age of nineteen. Whenever anyone on television says, "I love you" to another person, the two always end up in bed. This is all "love" is allowed to mean. Moreover, the young person will probably not see even one example of anyone contracting a sexual disease as the result of such open sex practices. Nor will the TV screen show the pain or psychological damage that promiscuous sex brings. As we were talking about these things, McDowell said, "On television immorality has become morality. Sin is the norm."

But immorality kills! That is the thrust of the first three chapters of Romans and the point of Paul's specific quotations from the Old Testament. Can you see this? If you can, you need to start thinking differently about the contemporary media—television, newspapers, magazines, and movies. Their messages are not harmless entertainment, as we sometimes think. They are a death machine. They are killing our young people and many older people as well. They are an open grave for the unwary.

2. They teach deceitfully. The second thing Luther noticed about those who disseminate false teaching is that they teach deceitfully, which is what Paul says. "Their tongues practice deceit" (v. 13).

Luther notices the difference between the mouth, which has teeth and chews—it is referred to later ("Their mouths are full of cursing and bitterness")—and the tongue, which is soft. He says: ""To teach deceitfully' is to teach a pleasing and wanton doctrine, as if it were holy, salutary, and from God, so that people who have been thus deceived hear this doctrine as if from God and believe that they are hearing him. For the message appears good to them and truthful and godly.... The tongue is soft, it has no bones, and it licks softly. Thus their every speech only softens the heart of men to be pleased with themselves in their own wisdom, their own righteousness, their own word or work. As it says in Isaiah 30:10: 'Speak to us smooth things.

Prophesy not to us what is right.' "

Isn't this what we hear in the words of the world around us? The world generally does not speak warnings—except as threats to other people. On the contrary, we are encouraged to think that everything is all right with us—that we can do anything we wish, satisfy any desire, avoid any responsibility, above all, never express true repentance for anything—and everything will come out right in the end. This is damnable heresy in the literal sense! It is false teaching that will transport many to hell.

3. They kill those who have been taught such things. In the third of his three points Luther comes to the end result of false teaching, showing that it leads to death. "This... same flattering and pleasing doctrine... not only does not make alive those who believe it but [it] actually kills them. And it kills them in such a way that they are beyond recovery." Paul has already said the same thing himself in Romans 2: "But for those who are self-seeking and who reject the truth and follow evil, there will be wrath and anger... trouble and distress" (vv. 8-9). He says it even more clearly later: "For the wages of sin is death" (Rom. 6:23a).

Violent Acts from Violent Men

We are not to think that this grim description is limited to mere words, however, still less to charming (though deceptive) words. In verse 14 the deceitful and poisonous speech of verse 13 boils over into harsh "cursing and bitterness" on those who refuse to be deceived. And in verses 15-17 those who teach falsehood move from words to violent actions. These verses, quoted from Isaiah 59:7-8, describe three acts of violent men, beginning with the end result of these acts. To see the progression, we need to take them in reverse order.

1. "The way of peace they do not know" (v. 17). This relates to people as they are in themselves apart from God. They know no personal peace—"... the wicked are like the tossing sea, which cannot rest, whose waves cast up mire and mud" (Isa. 57:20). But this also describes the effects such persons have upon others. Having no peace themselves, they disrupt the peace of other people. Commentator Haldane says rightly, "Such is a just description of man's ferocity, which fills the world with animosities, quarrels and hatred in the private connections of families and neighborhoods; and with revolution, wars and murders among nations. The most savage animals do not destroy so many of their own species to appease their hunger, as man destroys of his fellows to satiate his ambition, revenge or cupidity."

There are three ways in which men and women lack peace apart from God. First, they are not at peace with God; they are at war with him. Second, they are not at peace with one another; they hate and attack one another. Third, they are not at peace in themselves; they are restless and distressed. The only way we can find peace is by coming to the cross of Christ, where God has himself bridged the gap to man and has made peace. There sinners find peace with God and within themselves. And they are drawn together into fellowship with those who have likewise found peace and who are therefore able to live in peace with one another.

2. "Ruin and misery mark their ways" (v. 16). Again, this is something wicked persons experience themselves; their way is misery and ruin. But it is also something they bring on others. In other words, this verse has an active and not just a passive sense. Without a changed nature, human beings naturally labor to destroy and ruin one another, as Paul has already shown earlier.

3. "Their feet are swift to shed blood" (v. 15). Working backward, we come to the last of these deceitful actions. Their end is death—and not just physical death, though that would be bad enough in itself—but spiritual death, which is the death of the soul and spirit in hell. Death means separation. Physical death is the separation of the soul and spirit from the body. Spiritual death is the separation of the soul and spirit from God. It is forever.

No Fear of God

The last phrase of this great summary of the human race in ruin is from Psalm 36:1, and it is an apt conclusion. It tells why all these other violent and wicked acts have happened: "There is no ear of God before their eyes."

You know, I am sure, that the word fear in this sentence does not mean exactly what we usually mean by the word. We mean "fright" or "terror," but in the Bible the word fear, when used of God, denotes a right and reverential frame of mind before him. It has to do with worshiping him, obeying him, and departing from evil. That is why we read in Proverbs 9:10: "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom, and knowledge of the Holy One is understanding." This means that if we approach God rightly, all other things will fall into their proper places. When Romans 3:18 declares that the human race has not done this, it is saying what Paul has been stating all along. Because men and women will not know God, choosing rather to suppress the truth about him, their minds are darkened and they become fools. They claimed to be wise but "exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images made to look like mortal man and birds and animals and reptiles" (Rom. 1:22).

One commentator says, "To be destitute of the fear of God is to be godless, and no indictment could be more inclusive and decisive than the charge here made."

I find it interesting, however, that Paul here also refers to "eyes." This is the sixth of the specific body references Paul makes in these verses in order to make his accusations vivid. He has referred to throats, tongues, lips, mouths, and feet. Now he mentions eyes.

Since eyes are our organs of vision, to have the fear of God before our eyes means that we have God constantly in our thoughts and in a central position in everything that concerns us. It means that we are ever looking toward him. Here I remind you of what we see in Psalm 8:5, where man is described as being "a little lower than the heavenly beings." Earlier I pointed out, in discussing man's downward path, that it is our destiny as those made in God's image to look up to the heavenly beings and beyond them to God and thus become increasingly like God. To have the "fear of God before [our] eyes" is to do just that. It is the way of all blessing, growth, and knowledge. But if we will not do that, we will inevitably look down and become like the beasts who are below us.

I began this section with a reminder that "fear" in regard to God does not mean "fright" or "terror," but rather a right and reverential frame of mind before him. But I need to add that if we will not come to God as he presents himself to us in Jesus Christ (as Savior), it is not inappropriate to be actually afraid of the Almighty. God's wrath hangs over us. His terrible judgment awaits us as the proper recompense for our unatoned sins.

The irony of the state of human beings in our sin, however, is that we do not fear the one, holy, and judging God. Instead, we fear lesser entities. The pagan of Paul's day feared the vast pantheon of Babylonian, Greek, Roman, and an assortment of other gods. The pagan in the distant jungle fears the rivers, rocks, and trees. He fears the sky, the thunder, the spirits of the night. The "civilized" pagan—that is, a contemporary man or woman—fears the future, hostile neighbors, disease, technological breakdown, and a host of other dangers.

Above all, everyone fears death.

What irony: To fear these things, all of which pass away eventually, and yet not fear God, to whom all of us must one day give an accounting. God spoke through the prophet Isaiah: "... you fear mortal men, the sons of men, who are but grass, [but] you forget the LORD your Maker, who stretched out the heavens and laid the foundations of the earth, [and] you live in constant terror every day because of the wrath of the oppressor..." (Isa. 51:12-13). No wonder the psalmist says, "Blessed are all who fear the LORD, who walk in his ways" (Ps. 128:1).

Mercy Alone

As we near the end of our studies of this first and most important section of Romans, it is helpful to note what others have written in summary about these words. One man who has written wisely is John Calvin:

In his conclusion [Paul] again repeats, in different words, what we stated at the beginning, namely, that all wickedness flows from a disregard of God. When we have forsaken the fear of God, which is the essential part of wisdom, there is no right or purity left. In short, since the fear of God is the bridle by which our wickedness is held back, its removal frees us to indulge in every kind of licentious conduct....

David, in Psalm 14:3, says that there was such perversity in men that God, when looking on them all in succession, could not find even one righteous man. It therefore follows that this infection had spread into the whole human race, since nothing is hidden from the sight of God.... In other psalms he complains of the wickedness of his enemies, foreshadowing in himself and his descendants a type of the kingdom of Christ. In his adversaries, therefore, are represented all those who, being estranged from Christ, are not led by his Spirit. Isaiah expressly mentions Israel, and his accusation therefore applies still more to the Gentiles. There is no doubt that human nature is described in these words, in order that we may see what man is when left to himself, since Scripture testifies that all who are not regenerated by the grace of God are in this state. The condition of the saints would be not better unless this depravity were amended in them. That they may still, however, remember that they are not different from others by nature, they find in what remains of their carnal nature, from which they can never escape, the seeds of those evils which would continually produce their effect in them, if they were not prevented by being mortified. For this they are indebted to the mercy of God and not to their own nature.

How could our salvation be due to anything but mercy if we really are as ruined as Paul describes us? Ruined? Yes! But we may be saved from ruin by the glorious work of our divine Savior, Jesus Christ.

Chapter 38.
Silence at Last

Romans 3:19

Now the apostle Paul comes to the end of the first main section of his letter, concluding that every human being is (1) accountable to God for what he or she has done; (2) guilty of having done countless wrong things; and (3) will never be justified by God on the basis of any supposed good works. His exact words in Romans 3:19-20 are: "Now we know that whatever the law says, it says to those who are under the law, so that every mouth may be silenced and the whole world held accountable to God. Therefore no one will be declared righteous in his sight by observing the law; rather, through the law we become conscious of sin."

These two verses are very important, because to understand them is to understand the first great foundational truths of Christianity.

A Diagnostic Question

I want to study these verses in two separate messages, however, and one of my reasons for dividing them is that verse 19 has played an important part in the conversion of many, many people.

From 1927 to 1960 the pastor of Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia (the church I now pastor), was Donald Grey Barnhouse, a gifted Bible teacher whom God used wonderfully in preaching and conference ministries throughout this country and around the world. He dealt with many people's problems in his ministry, and early on he developed what he came to call a series of diagnostic questions to help him analyze where those he was trying to help were coming from spiritually. First, he tried to determine whether or not the individual involved was a Christian. "Are you born again?" he would ask. If the person gave a clear-cut testimony to his or her faith in Christ, Barnhouse would then go on to deal with the specific problem that had been raised. If not, he would proceed as follows:

"Perhaps I can help clarify your thinking with a question. You know that there are a great many accidents today. Suppose that you and I should go out of this building and a swerving automobile should come up on the sidewalk and kill the two of us. In the next moment we would be what men call 'dead.' We brush aside that absurd folly that we are going to meet St. Peter at the gate of heaven. (That exists only in jokes about two Irishmen.) We are going to meet God. Now suppose that in that moment of ultimate reckoning God should say to you, 'What right—note my emphasis on the word right—what right do you have to come into my heaven?' What would be your answer?"

Barnhouse found, as he used this approach again and again in counseling situations, that only three possible answers can be given to it. That is, all the many varieties of answers ultimately boil down to just three. One of them involves the text I am considering, which is why I tell this story.

"Justified by Good Works"

The first answer people give to the question is a common one. It is that they have done certain good things and therefore want to be accepted by God on the basis of these achievements. Some people have a very high opinion of themselves, of course. They think they have been models of righteous conduct—that they have never done anything bad, only what is good. In fact, they believe they have done a great deal of good! Others know that they have not been consistently good, but they still want God to take note of what good works they have done and accept them into heaven on that basis. Some have kept the Golden Rule, they say—or tried to keep it. Others have tried to help their neighbors, and so on.

If a person replied to Barnhouse's question with any of those claims, he took them to Galatians
2:16b, which says that we "... put our faith in Christ Jesus that we may be justified by faith in Christ and not by observing the law, because by observing the law no one will be justified." Barnhouse showed that no one can satisfy God's perfect standards by tainted human righteousness.

Then he frequently told the following story. Early in his ministry he knew a man who lived near Tenth Presbyterian Church to whom he would often speak about the gospel. This man usually replied to the preacher's message by laughing patronizingly. He wasn't the kind of person who needed the church or any kind of religion, he would say. He belonged to a lodge, the chief function of which was to do good works. He was active in that lodge and lived up to its high moral principles. If he ever met God, he felt he would be all right on the basis of his lodge associations.

Years went by, during which the man resisted all attempts by Barnhouse to explain the gospel to him.

One day word came that the man was quite ill. He had been stricken with a fatal disease and was not expected to live out the day. Barnhouse went to see him. A member of his lodge was present on what is called "the deathwatch," since no member of the lodge was supposed to be allowed to die alone. This lodge member was seated across the room from the bed on which the other was dying. He was reading a newspaper. As Barnhouse entered, the replacement for this man also entered the room, and the shift was changed. The first man got up and left; the second took his place.

Barnhouse realized that the situation was desperate and decided on a bold course of action. He sat down by the bed and spoke along these lines: "You don't mind my staying here for a few minutes and watching you, do you? I have often wondered what it would be like for a person to die without Jesus Christ. I have known you for quite a few years, and you have always said that you do not need Christ and that your lodge obligations are enough. I would like to observe a person end his life with those beliefs and see what it is like."

The man on the bed was struck through the heart. He looked at Barnhouse like a wounded animal. "You... wouldn't... mock... a dying man... would you?" he said.

Barnhouse then asked his diagnostic question. "You are going to appear before God in a very short while. Suppose he asks you, 'What right do you have to come into my heaven?' What will you say?"

This time the man looked back in agonized silence, and great tears flowed from his frightened eyes and down his pale, wrinkled cheeks. Then, while he listened attentively, Barnhouse told him how he might approach God through the merits of the Lord Jesus Christ. The man replied that his mother had taught him those truths as a child but that he had abandoned them. He had lived without faith. But now, in his final moments on earth, he came back to God through Jesus Christ, confessed his faith in Christ and then had someone call his family members so he might give his newfound testimony to them. He asked Barnhouse to tell his story at his funeral, which took place a few days later.

You must clearly understand this. No one is going to be justified before the bar of God's justice on the basis of his or her good works, however great they may be. Your record will not save you. It is your record that has gotten you into trouble in the first place. Your record will condemn you. The only way anyone will ever be saved is by faith in Jesus Christ, who paid the penalty of our misdeeds for us and, in place of our misdeeds, offers us the gift of his own great righteousness.

"Not a Thing to Say"

The second answer that can be given to Barnhouse's question involves our text in Romans, but it, too, is connected with a story. One summer Barnhouse was crossing the Atlantic by ship, and about the second or third day out, which was a Sunday, he preached for the passengers. This led to several fruitful conversations, one with a young woman who was a professor of languages at one of the eastern colleges. In the course of their conversation Barnhouse asked his question: "If this ship should suddenly suffer some great catastrophe and sink to the bottom of the sea and we died, and if, when you appeared before God, he should ask you, 'What right do you have to come into my heaven?' what would you say?"

The woman answered, "Why, I wouldn't have a thing to say."

Barnhouse replied, "You are quoting Romans 3:19." She didn't know what he meant, so he opened his Bible and showed the verse to her: "Now we know that whatever the law says, it says to those who are under the law, so that every mouth may be silenced and the whole world held accountable to God." He explained that she had said it in American idiom: "I wouldn't have a thing to say." God had said, "Every mouth [will] be silenced." But it is the same thing. At God's judgment no one will be able to offer any good works as grounds for his or her justification or proffer any valid excuses for bad conduct. All mouths will be made mute, and everyone will know that he or she is guilty and deserves God's just condemnation.

The reason, of course, is that this is God's judgment. The person we must appear before is God. We do not have the same experiences when we appear before mere men or answer before a mere earthly tribunal.

Here we have trials by our peers. But our peers are like us. They are also sinful. Frequently juries excuse bad behavior.

Not even judges are always entirely upright in their decisions. In some cases they can be bribed. Or they simply make mistakes.

Moreover, human law is inexact and imperfect. It has loopholes. We can plead extenuating circumstances. And even if we lose our case, we can generally appeal to a higher court and to a court beyond that. If we finally exhaust our legal options and perhaps are sent to prison, we can still carry on our efforts at self-vindication. We can write letters. We can write a book. We can argue. We can refuse to be silenced.

Ah, but before God every mouth will be silenced! Then we will all know that we are not righteous and that there is not a word that can be spoken in our defense.

As evidence for this statement I bring forward the experience of the saints. Surely, if anyone could stand before God and be able to speak in his or her own defense, it would be an upright biblical character. But this is not what we find such people doing. Whenever a biblical "hero" has a glimpse of God's glory, the result is not a loosing of the tongue but a feeling of utter worthlessness before God—and of silence.

Job is an example. Job wanted answers to an important question: Why do the righteous suffer?
His friends had no satisfactory answers, although Job discussed the options with them at length. But when at last God spoke, revealing himself to Job and asking a series of probing questions that go on and on in the book that bears Job's name (chapters 38-41), Job was overcome with confusion and answered:

> "I am unworthy—how can I reply to you?
> I put my hand over my mouth.
> I spoke once, but I have no answer— twice, but I > will say no more."

Job 40:4-5

Job was silenced.

Isaiah had the same experience. When God revealed himself to Isaiah in the great vision recorded in chapter 6 of his prophecy, Isaiah replied, "Woe to me! I am ruined! For I am a man of unclean lips, and I live among a people of unclean lips, and my eyes have seen the King, the LORD Almighty" (v. 5). How interesting that Isaiah's response focused on his lips and the lips of his people! He recognized that anything he might say was unworthy, unclean, sinful. He was silenced. He said no more. It was only after God sent a seraph with a coal from the altar to purge his lips that Isaiah was freed to speak again and obey the command to take God's message to God's people.

When Habakkuk had a revelation of God, he testified:

> I heard and my heart pounded, my lips quivered at the sound;
> Decay crept into my bones, and my legs trembled.
>
> Habakkuk 3:16

Habakkuk's lips trembled, but no sound came out.
Even John, the beloved disciple of the Lord, when he saw the risen Christ in that awesome vision recorded in the first chapter of Revelation, had no words for him. Instead, he fell at Christ's feet "as though dead" and did not move until Jesus placed his hand upon him and performed something like a physical resurrection (Rev. 1:17).

In his treatment of our text Barnhouse suggests that if there will be any words spoken before the bar of God by those who have rejected the grace of God in this life and are being sent to outer darkness forever, it will be—not excuses—but a resentful acknowledgment of the truth of God and the justice of their own condemnation.

They will cry, "It was all true, God. I was wrong. I knew I was wrong when I made my excuses. But I hated and still hate the principle of righteousness by the blood of Christ. I must admit that those despised Christians were right who bowed before you and acknowledged their dependence on you. I hated their songs of faith then, and I hate them now. They were right, and I hated them because they were right and because they belonged to you. I wanted my own way. I still want my own way. I want heaven, but I want heaven without you. I want heaven with myself on the throne. That is what I want, and I do not want anything else and never, never will want anything other than heaven with myself on the throne. I want my own way. And now I am going to the place of desire without fulfillment, of lust without satisfaction, or wanting without having, of wishing but never getting, of looking but never seeing, and I hate, I hate, I hate, because I want my own way. I hate you for not letting me have my way. I hate, I hate...."

Their voices will drift off into outer nothingness, and there will be silence at last.

The Only Saving Answer

It is clear from what I have been saying that the only saving answer to the question being posed—"What right do you have to come into God's heaven?"—focuses not on the works of the sinner, but on the achievements of Jesus Christ. If we are to be saved, it will not be on the basis of anything we have ever done or can do, but solely on the basis of what he has done for us. Christ died for us. He suffered in our place. He bore the punishment of our sins. All who come to God on that basis and with that answer will be saved. No others will be. Only those who come to God trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ will enter heaven.

Some years ago there was an Arthur Murray dance instructor who had been out late on a Saturday evening. In the wee hours of the morning he staggered back to his hotel room, fell into bed, and went to sleep. The next morning he was suddenly jolted awake by his clock radio. A man was speaking, and he was asking this question: "If in the next few moments some great disaster should happen and you should be killed and if you should find yourself before God and he should ask you, 'What right do you have to come into my heaven?' what would you say?"

The dance instructor was amazed and confounded by this question. He had never heard a question like that before. He realized that he did not have an answer. He had not a single thing to say. His mouth, filled with empty words just hours before, was suddenly stopped. He sat silently on the edge of his bed while Barnhouse—he was the preacher on that radio program—explained the answer to him.

That dance instructor was D. James Kennedy, now pastor of the Coral Ridge Presbyterian Church in Fort Lauderdale, Florida, and author of the popular witnessing and evangelism program known as "Evangelism Explosion." Kennedy believed on Jesus Christ that day in his hotel room, and the question that had been used to save him became the chief tool in his evangelism strategy. Since that day many thousands of people have come to Christ through his program.

What Is Your Answer?

I end by asking that same question of you. Someday you will die. You will face God, and he will say to you, "What right do you have to come into my heaven?" What will your response be?

Perhaps you will say, "Well, here is my record. I know that I have done some bad things, but I have done a lot of good things, too. I want you to look at these and see if they are not enough for me to have deserved heaven. Add it up. All I want from you is justice." If you say that, justice is exactly what you will get. You will be judged for your sin and be condemned. Your good works, however fine they may seem in your sight or even in the sight of other people, will not save you. For, as we have seen, God has said:

> "There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God.
> All have turned away, they have together become worthless;
> there is no one who does good, not even one."

No one will be declared righteous in God's sight by the law of good works, for it is by the law that "we become conscious of sin" (Rom. 3:20).

Perhaps you will not plead your good works, but instead will stand before God silenced. This is better. At least you will have recognized that your goodness is not adequate before God. You will know you are a sinner. But it is still a most pitiful position to be in: silent before the one great Judge of the universe, with no possibility of making a defense, no possibility of urging extenuating circumstances, no hope of escaping condemnation.

So what will you say? I trust you will be able to answer—I hope this study had helped you to the point of being able to answer, if you have not come to it already—"My right to heaven is the Lord Jesus Christ. He died for me. He took the punishment for my sin. He is my right to heaven, because he has become my righteousness."

Chapter 39.
None Justified by Good Works

Romans 3:20

In the New International Version of Romans, the word therefore has already occurred two times: once in Romans 1:24, where Paul speaks of God's having given mankind up to its wickedness ("Therefore God gave them over..."), and once in Romans 2:1, where he speaks to the morally sensitive but unbelieving person ("You, therefore, have no excuse..."). However, in the Greek manuscripts, the proper and strongest word for "therefore" (dioti) occurs for the first time in Romans 3:20, which is our text. Dioti literally means "on account of which thing" (dia ho ti). So it is appropriate that it is found here, where it marks a conclusion based on all that has been said in the first major section of Paul's letter. From Romans 1:18, where the argument began, and up to this point, Paul has been proving that the entire race lies under the just condemnation of God for its wickedness. His argument is an all-embracing negative, which precedes the even greater positive statements of Romans 3:21 and what is to follow. How is this great argument summarized? Quite simply. Paul says that no one will be saved by good works: "Therefore no one will be declared righteous in [God's] sight by observing the law; rather, through the law we become conscious of sin."

But why? Why is it that no one will be saved by good works? If not the utterly immoral person, why not at least the virtuous pagan or the religious Jew? Why not you? Why not me? Paul's answer takes us back over the chief points of the preceding chapters.

Wrath: The Rejection of God

The first plank in Paul's argument is one we have already looked at several times in various forms. It is that, far from pursuing God and trying to please him (which is what most of us mistakenly think we are doing), the entire race is actually trying to get away from God and is resisting him as intensely and thoroughly as possible. You remember from our previous studies how Paul says that we "suppress" the truth about God, much of which is revealed even in nature, not to mention the written revelation of God, which is the Bible. But because we do not want to serve a deity who is like the One we know is there—the God who is sovereign over his creation, altogether holy, omniscient, and immutable—we suppress the truth about this true God and try to construct substitute gods to take his place. And, says Paul, "The wrath of God is being revealed from heaven against all [this] godlessness and wickedness" of mankind (Rom. 1:18).

"But what about the good things human beings do?" asks someone. "You can't deny that people are often kind and helpful to one another or go out of their way for others. Don't these things count for anything?"

Let me answer this question by an illustration from a book by Robert M. Horn, a staff member of British InterVarsity (the Universities and Colleges Christian Fellowship). It is entitled Go Free!
The Meaning of Justification, and the illustration is borrowed in turn from a book by Loraine Boettner (The Reformed Doctrine of Predestination), who borrowed it from W. D. Smith (What Is Calvinism?). These writers imagine a sailing ship manned by a crew of pirates. The pirates are on good terms with one another. They work hard at their jobs, are honest among themselves (according to a certain "pirate code"), help one another, and even defend one another. Their hard work really is hard work. Their kindness to each other really is kindness. But all these "good" actions are also and at the same time "bad" or wrong behavior, because they are aimed at maintaining themselves in violation of international maritime law. Their good deeds are highly selective; they do not help everyone, only themselves or those like themselves. They actually rob, maim, and murder many other people. And even their kindnesses to each other grow out of their rebellion, expressing and actually reinforcing it.

Here is a more modern example. Some years ago Mario Puzo wrote a book called The Godfather, which later became a movie, and a sequel to the movie. The book was a study of the so-called Mafia, the powerful crime families who control much of the illegal gambling, prostitution, drug dealing, and other criminal activity in America and other parts of the world. This book and the films based on it showed the tremendous violence exerted by these crime families to achieve their goals. But what made the violence particularly shocking is that it seemed to exist alongside tender and otherwise noble feelings and actions of these figures. Mafia dons are often quite kindly family men. They love their wives and children. They are loyal to each other. They defend each other. In fact, they are ruthless in righting a wrong done to a member of their own crime family. Ah, but they are still crime-oriented, and the structure and ethical code of the family is created only to enhance their own well-being in violation of the law and at the expense of other people.

That parallels our situation in respect to mankind's universal rebellion against God. We may do good things (at least "good" as they appear to us), but our good is actually bad, because it is designed to maintain our rebellion against the only sovereign God and his laws.

No Excuse: God's Law Broken

The second reason why no one will be declared righteous in God's sight by observing the law is that no one actually does observe it. This is the explanation of the apparent contradiction between Romans 2:13, which says that "it is those who obey the law who will be declared righteous," and Romans 3:20, which says that "no one will be declared righteous in [God's] sight by observing the law." Both are true because, although anyone who perfectly obeys the law would be declared righteous—the righteousness of God requires it—in point of fact no one actually does this; rather, all disobey God's law.

At this point Paul speaks in almost identical terms to both the Jew, who actually possessed the revealed law of God, and to the Gentile, who did not possess it. To the Jew he says, "You who preach against stealing, do you steal? You who say that people should not commit adultery, do you commit adultery? You who abhor idols, do you rob temples? You who brag about the law, do you dishonor God by breaking the law? As it is written: 'God's name is blasphemed among the Gentiles because of you'" (Rom. 2:21b-24). The point of these statements is that the laws these religious people broke are in their Scriptures. In fact, they are from the very heart of the Old Testament, the Ten Commandments given to Moses on Mount Sinai. It is the Ten Commandments that say, "You shall have no other gods before me" (Exod. 20:3), "You shall not commit adultery" (v. 14), and "You shall not steal" (v. 15). These were laws of which the Jews were most proud. But they had broken them, as indeed all human beings have.

It is exactly the same idea in the case of the Gentile. The Gentile of Paul's day, the Greek or Roman of the first century, did not have the Old Testament law for the most part (though some did). But Gentiles had a code of ethics of their own. They knew that they should do good. They knew that they should seek the prosperity of other human beings. They knew that stealing and all other harmful practices were wrong. But they did bad things all the same, just as we do! Paul tells the Gentile, "You, therefore, have no excuse, you who pass judgment on someone else, for at whatever point you judge the other, you are condemning yourself, because you who pass judgment do the same things" (Rom. 2:1).

This means that whenever we are offended at another person's actions, as we frequently are, we condemn ourselves before God. For what we find blameworthy in another, we also do. Is a person rude to you and are you offended? If so, your reaction condemns you, since you are often rude to other people. Are you angry when someone takes unfair advantage of you? You are right to be angry; a violation of fairness is wrong. But you still condemn yourself, because you are also unfair to others. You may not always admit it, but it is true. Whatever standard you raise by which you approve one set of actions and disapprove another set of actions in others—that very standard condemns you, because you cannot and do not live up to it.

So the second reason why no one will be declared righteous by observing the law is that no one actually does observe it. We fail to observe even the tiniest part, and we certainly do not observe the whole!

The Actual Case: Great Wickedness

The third reason why no one will be declared righteous in God's sight by observing the law is that, far from observing the law (or even trying to observe the law), we are all actually violating the law in every conceivable way and on every possible occasion and are therefore actively, consistently, thoroughly, and intentionally wicked.

This is the meaning of the two long lists of descriptive vices found in Romans 1:29-31 and Romans 3:10-18. Apart from these lists, a person might reluctantly admit that at least at times he or she breaks even the lowest possible standard for decent behavior and might say, "I do not pretend to be able to do even a single right thing all the time or in every possible situation." But that is a far cry from admitting that one is thoroughly wicked in God's sight. And as long as a person is unwilling to admit that, there is always the feeling that somehow (regardless of the person's admitted shortcomings) the good that a person does will be acknowledged by God, and justification by good works will at least become possible.

But look at how God sees human beings: "They have become filled with every kind of wickedness, evil, greed and depravity. They are full of envy, murder, strife, deceit and malice. They are gossips, slanderers, God-haters, insolent, arrogant and boastful; they invent ways of doing evil; they disobey their parents; they are senseless, faithless, heartless, ruthless" (Rom. 1:29-31). It is from this viewpoint that Paul declares:

As it is written:

> "There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God.
> All have turned away, they have together become worthless;
> there is no one who does good, not even one."
> "Their throats are open graves;

their tongues practice deceit."
"The poison of vipers is on their lips."
"Their mouths are full of cursing and bitterness."
"Their feet are swift to shed blood; ruin and misery mark their ways, and the way of peace they do not know."
"There is no fear of God before their eyes."

Romans 3:10-18

These verses do not mean that every human being has done every bad thing possible, but they do mean that the human race is like this. We are members of that human race, and, if the truth be told, the potential for every possible human vice is in everyone. We may not get a chance to murder someone. We may not even be tempted to do so. But given due provocation, right circumstances, and the removal of the societal restraints provided to limit murderous acts, we are all capable of murder and will murder, just as others have. So also with God's other commandments.

It is because of this inward potential that Scripture says, "The LORD saw how great man's wickedness on the earth had become, and that every inclination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil all the time" (Gen. 6:5).

Circumcision: No Substitutes

The fourth reason why no one will be declared righteous before God by observing the law is that God is concerned with true or actual observance—that is, with the attitudes and actions of the heart—and not with any outward acts that appear pious but actually mean nothing.

The chief example of this wrongheaded attempt at justification is the faith that certain people have placed in circumcision. This was not a case of simple pagan superstition or of the mere traditions of the elders, because the rite of circumcision was prescribed for Israel by God in the Old Testament. It was a rite given to Abraham, who was to circumcise all the males in his household and pass on this rite to those who were their descendants (Gen. 17:9-14).

Circumcision was to be a mark of membership in the special chosen family of God's people. This was such an important requirement that later in Jewish history we find a scene in which God was displeased with Moses and was about to kill him, evidently because he had neglected to circumcise his own son. He was saved only when Zipporah, his wife, performed the rite for him (Exod. 4:24-26).

Circumcision is neither extra-biblical nor unimportant. It was an important rite, just as baptism, the observance of the Lord's Supper, church membership, and similar religious practices are important today. But the error of the Jew (and the error of many contemporary Christians) is in thinking that a person can be declared righteous before God by these things. That is not possible. Sacraments do have value once one is justified; that is, they are valuable signs of something that has occurred internally (if it has occurred internally), and they are meant to remind us of that experience and strengthen it. But no one can be saved by circumcision or by any other external religious act.

Paul writes, "Circumcision has value if you observe the law, but if you break the law, you have become as though you had not been circumcised.... A man is not a Jew if he is only one outwardly, nor is circumcision merely outward and physical. No, a man is a Jew if he is one inwardly; and circumcision is circumcision of the heart, by the Spirit, not by the written code" (Rom. 2:25, 28-29a).

"But circumcision is commanded in the law!" says the Jew.

True, but not as a means by which a man or a woman can be justified.

"But aren't we commanded to be baptized?" asks the Christian.

Yes, but as an outward sign of a prior, inward faith. It is not baptism that saves us, but God who works in us inwardly.

"But aren't we told to observe the Lord's Supper?" the believer wonders.

Yes, if we have been justified by faith in him whose death the communion service signifies. But to eat the bread, which signifies the Lord's broken body, and drink the wine, which signifies the Lord's shed blood, without faith in him is to eat and drink condemnation to oneself (1 Cor. 11:29).

God is not taken in by mere externals. There are no substitutes for faith.

The Law's Good Function

I come back to our text, which says that "no one will be declared righteous in his sight by observing the law; rather, through the law we become conscious of sin." We have been looking at the first part of this sentence, the negative, and we have gone back over the opening section of Romans to see why this great negative is true.

Yet this is only one part of the sentence. The first part of the sentence makes this definite negative statement, declaring that no one will be declared righteous by observing God's law. It tells us what the law cannot do. By contrast, the second half of the sentence contains a great positive statement, telling us that, although the law is unable to justify anybody, all of us being sinners, it is nevertheless able to show where we fall short of God's standards and thus point us to the Lord Jesus Christ, in whom alone God provides salvation.

J. B. Phillips is an Englishman who has written a very lively paraphrase of the New Testament, called The New Testament in Modern English. Because he is an Englishman and not an American, Phillips has occasionally used British terms for concepts that would be described in an entirely different way by Americans. Therefore, for Americans at least, Phillips throws new light on key passages. This is true of Romans 3:20. In England what we call a ruler or yardstick is called a straightedge. So when Phillips came to this verse and wanted to show what the law does for us (even though the law is not a means by which we can be justified), he paraphrased the text by writing, "'No man can justify himself before God' by a perfect performance of the Law's demands—indeed it is the straightedge of the Law that shows us how crooked we are."

Apart from God's law we may consider ourselves to be quite upright, model citizens who are fit candidates for heaven. But when we look into the law closely we soon see that we are not fit candidates at all. We are not upright. We are morally crooked. And we discover that if we are to become acceptable to the only upright, holy God, we must be changed by him.

One commentator has compared the law of God to a mirror. What happens when you look into a mirror? You see yourself, don't you? And what happens if your face is dirty and you look into a mirror? The answer is that you see that you should wash your dirty face. Does the mirror clean your face? No. The mirror's function is to drive you to the soap and water that will clean you up.

With that analogy in mind, let me give you a verse written by Robert Herrick, an English poet who lived about the time of William Shakespeare. It uses an image drawn from classical mythology in which the great Greek hero Hercules was sent to perform what was thought to be an impossible task: to clean up the immense, filthy stables of King Augeas. Comparing his heart to those stables, Herrick wrote:

Lord, I confess that thou alone art able To purify this Augean stable.
Be the seas water and the lands all soap,
Yet if thy blood not wash me, there's no hope.

That is it exactly. If you are placing your hope in your supposed ability to keep God's law or even just in your ability to do certain good things, your case is most hopeless. Your heart needs cleansing, and no effort of your own can ever cleanse it.

Where will you find cleansing? You will find it only in Christ, to whom the law drives you. William Cowper, an eighteenth-century poet, found cleansing there and wrote:

There is a fountain filled with blood,
Drawn from Immanuel's veins;

And sinners, plunged beneath that flood, Lose all their guilty stains.

The dying thief rejoiced to see
That fountain in his day;
And there have I, as vile as he, Washed all my sins away.

I trust you also have found cleansing where Robert Herrick, William Cowper, and so many others have found it. The apostle Peter declared, "Salvation is found in no one else, for there is no other name under heaven given to men by which we must be saved" (Acts 4:12).

Part Four.

God's Remedy in Christ

Chapter 40.

But Now...

Romans 3:21

For two and a half chapters of Romans (and thirty-nine of these studies), we have been looking at the sad story of the ruin of the race because of sin. Now we reach a new and glorious point in Paul's letter. Instead of reviewing the grim story of sin and God's wrath, we turn with relief to the wonderful news of God's great grace to sinners through the Lord Jesus Christ.

Understanding the Bible depends in no small measure on understanding the Bible's main words—words like justification, redemption, faith, substitution, obedience, grace, and many others. No one can claim really to understand the Bible unless he or she knows something about the meaning of these terms. But it is also the case that understanding the Bible sometimes depends on what we might be inclined to think of as less important words. I think of the "so" in John 3:16, for instance: "For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son...." What does "so" mean? To ask that question and answer it, we must go deeper into the meaning of this most popular verse than we might at first have thought possible.

We come to two such words at the beginning of Romans 3:21: "But now"!

What tremendous words they are! One expositor calls them "the great turning point" in God's dealings with the human race, and a turning point in the letter. Another calls them "God's great 'nevertheless' in the face of man's failure." If we had not studied the first two and a half chapters of Romans carefully, we would not be in a position to appreciate these words, because the change they speak of would not seem to be a change at all. With no understanding of the past, we can never appreciate the present.

But now we can! We have studied the past. Therefore these two words become for us a cry of great joy and a paean of victory.

The Turning Point

Where should we begin? The obvious place is with the word now, which indicates that there has been a change in time or in history. Before, something bad had existed. Now that has changed.

The contrast between "then" and "now" is a very great one for Paul, as a careful study of his writings shows. The reason is plain. The change between a past sad state of affairs and a glorious present state is one that Paul had himself experienced. It occurred on the Damascus road. Before that event, Paul had been an enemy of Jesus Christ and of his followers. He had been trying to get rid of them, and he thought he was doing right, as fanatics generally do. But the future apostle was actually in great darkness, ignorant of God and opposed to him. It was on the road to Damascus that Jesus appeared to Paul, revealing himself as the Son of God, the one whom Paul was persecuting. In that moment the scales fell from Paul's eyes, the truth of heaven broke in upon his darkened heart, flooding it with new light, and he turned from his old life of pride, prejudice, and persecution to a new life of serving Christ and his gospel. Like the blind man who had been healed by Jesus, Paul could now say, "One thing I know. I was blind but now I see!" (cf. John 9:25).

In his letter to the Philippians, Paul puts this change in theological language but with precisely this emphasis: "If anyone else thinks he has reasons to put confidence in the flesh, I have more: circumcised on the eighth day, of the people of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew of the Hebrews; in regard to the law, a Pharisee; as for zeal, persecuting the church; as for legalistic righteousness, faultless. But whatever was to my profit I now consider loss for the sake of Christ. What is more I consider everything a loss compared to the surpassing greatness of knowing Christ Jesus my Lord..." (Phil. 3:4-8, italics mine).

Meeting Jesus on the way to Damascus, in the midst of his campaign to arrest and kill Christians, made all the difference between life and death for the apostle.

From Wrath to Righteousness

Yet, in the context of his letter to the Romans, Paul speaks of this great temporal or historical change not so much as something that occurred to him personally but as something that God had done to provide for the salvation of the race. If God had not done this, our present condition and future prospects would be bleak. They would be only what we have already found in Romans 1:18 through 3:20. We would be under wrath, in spiritual and moral decline, and without any possibility of helping or saving ourselves by human righteousness. We would be, as Paul said of the Ephesians in their unregenerate state, "without hope and without God in the world" (Eph. 2:12b). But now things are different. There is hope because of what the Lord Jesus Christ has accomplished. The incarnation, life, death, and resurrection of Jesus have changed everything.

What specifically has changed? Paul's use of "now" in this and other texts suggests changes in the following areas:

1. Wrath and righteousness. The first change is the one most obvious from our text. When Paul says, "But now a righteousness from God, apart from law, has been made known," it is clear that he is contrasting this with the earlier declaration: "The wrath of God is being revealed from heaven against all the godlessness and wickedness of men..." (Rom. 1:18). Before, the wrath of God was being revealed against us. Now the righteousness of God is made known.

Several weeks before writing this sermon, I was preaching to a gathering of missionaries in southern France, and one of my messages was on Genesis 3, the story of the fall of our first parents. I said in the course of that message that when God clothed Adam and Eve with the skins of animals, this was a picture (which they no doubt clearly understood) of the way in which God would one day clothe with Christ's righteousness all who would believe on the Lord Jesus Christ. When I finished, an older missionary expressed appreciation for the emphasis on being clothed with Christ's righteousness, saying, "We don't hear that often enough; it is an important teaching."

I agreed that it was certainly an important teaching. But there is a sense in which teaching about the wrath of God is almost as important. If we do not understand that apart from Jesus Christ we are under God's wrath and destined for an eternity of judgment, we can hardly appreciate the greatness of what God has done for us in providing salvation through Christ's atonement.

People in our day generally think that they are on great terms with God or that, if they are not, it is only because God is a bit out of sorts and peevish—though he will probably get over it. That is not the case at all. On the contrary, the case is as Paul presents it in the first chapter of Romans.

We have rejected God, suppressing the truth about him in spite of the fact that God has revealed it to us; as a result, God is already in the process of unleashing his wrath. He has given us up to the consequences of our sin. In Romans 1:29-31, Paul describes the end of this abandonment. There is "every kind of wickedness, evil, greed and depravity." He says that people are "full of envy, murder, strife, deceit and malice. They are gossips, slanderers, God-haters, insolent, arrogant and boastful; they invent ways of doing evil; they disobey their parents; they are senseless, faithless, heartless, ruthless." These things are an expression of what happens to the human race when God displays his wrath by abandoning us to our own evil devices.

How are we to escape from such captivity? In ourselves we cannot. "But now," says Paul, in place of wrath "a righteousness from God has been made known." This is the one single way of salvation from the wrath to which our sin has subjected us. But thank God there is this one way.

2. Condemnation and justification. The second change is from condemnation to justification. This is evident from the continuation of Romans 3, where Paul writes, "There is no difference, for all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God, and are justified freely by his grace..." (vv. 22b-24). Yet it is not only here that we see this truth; nor do these verses necessarily present it in the strongest language. Think rather of Romans 8:1: "Therefore, there is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus," and Romans 5:9, which declares, "Since we have now been justified by his blood...."

Most people do not think of themselves as being under condemnation, obviously because the sentence hanging over them has not yet been fully executed. They are alive and well. They expect to remain so. Nevertheless, they are still under condemnation and will perish eventually. Jesus said this clearly: "For God did not send his Son into the world to condemn the world, but to save the world through him. Whoever believes in him is not condemned, but whoever does not believe stands condemned already because he has not believed in the name of God's one and only Son. This is the verdict: Light has come into the world, but men loved darkness instead of light because their deeds were evil" (John 3:17-19). These words are a close parallel to what Paul says about human beings suppressing the truth about God in their wickedness. They are already under wrath.

But now, because of Christ's work, there can be justification rather than condemnation. There is justification "through the redemption that came by Christ Jesus" (Rom. 3:24).

3. Bondage and freedom. Sin does not only bring us under God's just wrath and condemnation. It also enslaves us so that we cannot live truly good lives. Yet things can be different. In Romans 7:6 Paul uses those two important words again: "But now, by dying to what once bound us, we have been released from the law so that we serve in the new way of the Spirit, and not in the old way of the written code" (italics mine). This is a very important matter, which we will look into in detail later in these studies. But the chief point is that, although apart from Christ we are under law but unable to keep it since we are bound by sin, being united to Christ by the Holy Spirit delivers us from bondage and enables us to live holy lives.

Paul says this earlier when he writes, "But now that you have been set free from sin and have become slaves to God, the benefit you reap leads to holiness, and the result is eternal life" (Rom. 6:22).

4. Exclusion and participation. The final contrast is one Gentiles should particularly appreciate. Paul expresses it best in writing to the Ephesians, saying, "But now in Christ Jesus you who once were far away have been brought near through the blood of Christ" (Eph. 2:13).

Paul never forgot that—although Jews need Christ just as much as Gentiles need him, for no one, either Jew or Gentile, can be saved apart from faith in Jesus—the Jews of his day nevertheless had great spiritual advantages that non-Jews did not possess. They had "the adoption as sons... the divine glory, the covenants, the receiving of the law, the temple worship and the promises," as Paul observes in Romans 9:4. Gentiles were cut off from these things. Nevertheless, those who had been excluded from this earthly citizenship had now come together with believing Jews into a new relationship. "Consequently," Paul says, "you are no longer foreigners and aliens, but fellow citizens with God's people and members of God's household" (Eph. 2:19).

A New But Ancient Gospel

I have been claiming that the words "but now" indicate that something new has come into the world in terms of a believing person's relationship to God. Yet I need to say also that, although this is true in one sense—something new actually happened in history through the work of Christ—there is another sense in which this is not "new" at all, but is rather only an expression of the same plan through which God had been saving people since the beginning of the world. It is new in a historical sense, but as the way of salvation it has always existed in the mind of God. Paul says this explicitly in 2 Timothy 1:9b-10, where he writes, "This grace was given us in Christ Jesus before the beginning of time, but it has now been revealed through the appearing of our Savior...."

Paul makes this same point in Romans 3:21 by saying that this "righteousness from God" is something "to which the Law and the Prophets testify." This refers to the Old Testament, of course. So we ask: Where and in what ways does the Old Testament testify to the grace that has come into the world through Jesus Christ?

It is not hard to answer that question. We think back to the earliest part of the Old Testament, which records how God came to Adam and Eve after their rebellion in eating of the forbidden tree. God pronounced a judgment on them, cursing the serpent who had brought the temptation and punishing Adam and Eve for yielding to it. But then, in the middle of these stern and frightening words, God said, speaking to the serpent: "And I will put enmity between you and the woman, and between your offspring and hers; he will crush your head, and you will strike his heel" (Gen. 3:15).

This speaks of the coming of Jesus Christ, who would be wounded by Satan. Although Satan would strike his heel, Christ would crush Satan's head, destroying Satan and his works forever. As I have pointed out elsewhere, Adam and Eve believed this prophecy and were saved by looking forward in faith to this mighty one who was to come, just as we are saved by looking back to him by the same faith.

Further on in Genesis, we see God telling Abraham more about this redeemer. From the beginning he had said to Abraham that "all peoples on earth will be blessed through you" (Gen. 12:3b). But as the story unfolds we see God adding more to that initial cryptic revelation, until finally, in that magnificent account of the test by which Abraham was commanded to offer Isaac, his only son, on Mount Moriah, we learn that it was not through Abraham himself that the nations were to be blessed but through his "offspring" (Gen. 22:18). Paul would later point out that this word is singular, indicating not the whole of the descendants of Abraham, the nation of Israel, but that one special descendant who would redeem the race by dying for it (cf. Gal. 3:8, 15-16). The near sacrifice of Isaac was a striking picture of how God would one day give his only Son for us on that identical mountain.

The ceremonial law of Israel points to Jesus Christ, for he is the Lamb of God who takes away the world's sin. He fulfilled the meaning of the sacrifices. More than that, each item of the temple furnishings and each detail of the rites of Israel's worship point to him.

In the psalms we have many great words about Jesus.

Psalm 16:10 prophesies the Lord's resurrection: "You will not abandon me to the grave, nor will you let your Holy One see decay." It was quoted by Peter at Pentecost (Acts 2:27) and by Paul before the Gentiles at Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13:35).

Psalm 22 describes the crucifixion. The Lord quoted the opening lines of this prophecy while hanging on the cross (see Matt. 27:46 and parallels).

Psalm 23 portrays Jesus as the Good Shepherd, a theme that the Lord expounded, as recorded in John 10.

Psalm 24 describes Jesus' glorious ascension into heaven.

And what of the Old Testament prophets? The many specific references to Jesus in the prophetic books are too numerous to list. But we cannot overlook the great Suffering Servant passages of Isaiah, particularly this one:

> He was despised and rejected by men, a man of sorrows and familiar with suffering.
> Like one from whom men hide their faces he was despised, and we esteemed him not.

Surely he took up our infirmities and carried our sorrows, yet we considered him stricken by God, smitten by him and afflicted.
But he was pierced for our transgressions, he was crushed for our iniquities;
the punishment that brought us peace was upon him, and by his wounds we are healed.
We all, like sheep, have gone astray, each of us has turned to his own way;
and the LORD has laid on him the iniquity of us all.

Isaiah 53:3-6

These prophecies of the salvation that was to come through Jesus Christ can be multiplied hundreds if not thousands of times throughout the Old Testament.

Saying Those Words

The important thing, however, is not so much whether you understand or even know of these Old Testament prophecies, but whether the change they speak about is a reality for you. You may not know much theology. Terms like "justification," "propitiation," and "redemption" may be only vague generalities for you. But you know what your past life has been. You remember your past sins. You are aware of your failures. Is that truly a former, past state for you? Can you say, "That was true of me once. I really was like the person described in the first two and a half chapters of Romans. But that was before. Now Christ has come. He has saved me, and I have become an entirely new creature because of him"?

D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones suggests that this is one way by which you can test whether or not you are a true Christian, and by which you can reassure and strengthen yourself if you are:

When the devil attacks you and suggests to you that you are not a Christian and that you have never been a Christian because of what is still in your heart or because of what you are still doing or because of something you once did—when he comes and thus accuses you, what do you say to him? Do you agree with him? Or do you say to him: "Yes, that was true, but now..."? Do you hold up these words against him? Or when, perhaps, you feel condemned as you read the Scripture, as you read the Law in the Old Testament, as you read the Sermon on the Mount, and as you feel that you are undone, do you remain lying on the ground in hopelessness, or do you lift up your head and say, "But now"? This is the essence of the Christian position; this is how faith answers the accusations of the Law, the accusations of conscience and everything else that would condemn and depress us. These are indeed very wonderful words, and it is most important that we should lay hold of them and realize their tremendous importance and their real significance.

Can you say those words? You can, if you trust in Jesus and his death on your behalf.

Can you say:

"Once I was blind, but now I see"?

"Once I was lost, but now I am found"?

"Once I was subject to the just wrath of God. But now I have been saved by Jesus, having received the gift of God's righteousness through faith in him"?

Chapter 41.
Righteousness Apart from Law

Romans 3:21-24

In Romans 3:21-31 we are dealing with themes that are the very heart, not only of Paul's letter, but of the entire Bible and therefore of reality itself. In all life and history there is nothing more important than these teachings. But who today thinks this way? Who is willing to acknowledge this in an age when abstract thought—indeed, even thinking itself—is suspect? Who even among the masses of Christian people really appreciates what Paul is saying here? Ours is an age in which people are self-absorbed and focus on immediate gratification. We tend to evaluate any religious teaching according to its apparent relevance to our present "needs" and short-term goals.

No one can have success teaching basic truths about man and the universe unless our closed ways of thinking are changed. But, then, this has always been the case. It was no easier for the apostle Paul to preach the message of salvation to a generation that was busy entertaining itself by sex and circuses than for today's Christians to minister that same word to an age that has anesthetized itself through television.

But we must try! We must try as Paul did! We must teach the Word of God, because it is by the Word alone that God speaks to us about what really matters.

Four Great Doctrines

We have already seen how Paul introduces this section of his letter—with the words "but now." These words indicate that something of great importance has taken place, and that this is the substance of the good news being proclaimed by Paul and the other messengers of the gospel. Here is a simple outline of this teaching:

1. God has provided a righteousness of his own for men and women, a righteousness we do not possess ourselves. This is the very heart or theme of the Word of God. Although it is new in its fulfillment, it had nevertheless been fully prophesied in the Old Testament.
2. This righteousness is by grace. We do not deserve it. In fact, we are incapable ever of deserving it.
3. It is the work of the Lord Jesus Christ in dying for his people, redeeming them from their sin, that has made this grace on God's part possible. This is the reason for the "now" in "but now." It is because of Jesus' death that there is a Christian gospel.

4. This righteousness that God has graciously provided becomes ours through simple faith. Believing and trusting God in regard to the work of Jesus is the only way anyone, whether Jew or Gentile, can be saved.

The importance of these teachings will become increasingly clear in our exposition of them. But we can see their importance even at this point by noticing that they are a nearly exact repetition of what Paul has already stated as the thesis of the letter. They were stated in his opening address, for example: "Paul, a servant of Christ Jesus, called to be an apostle and set apart for the gospel of God—the gospel he promised beforehand through his prophets in the Holy Scriptures regarding his Son, who as to his human nature was a descendant of David, and who through the Spirit of holiness was declared with power to be the Son of God by his resurrection from the dead: Jesus Christ our Lord. Through him and for his name's sake, we received grace and apostleship to call people from among all the Gentiles to the obedience that comes from faith" (Rom. 1:1-5). The teachings of Romans 3:21-31 are all there. It is the same gospel.

Again, it is also what we have found in the initial statement of Paul's diesis in Romans 1:16-17: "I am not ashamed of the gospel, because it is the power of God for the salvation of everyone who believes: first for the Jew, then for the Gentile. For in the gospel a righteousness from God is revealed, a righteousness that is by faith from first to last, just as it is written: 'The righteous will live by faith.'"

So I repeat what I said at the beginning of this study: There is nothing in all life and history that is more important than these teachings. The issues of eternity hang on these truths, and we must be faithful to them regardless of the resistance or scorn of our contemporaries.

Objective and Subjective Genitives

We begin with the first of these four doctrines, namely, that "God has provided a righteousness of his own for men and women." You will notice, if you read the text carefully, that in Romans 3:21 the New International Version speaks of "a righteousness from God," while I have implied (echoing the King James Version) that this is the "righteousness of God," that is, suggesting that it is God's own righteousness. Which is correct? Is this a righteousness from God? Or is it the righteousness of God? And is there a difference?

The variations in translations stem from the fact that the Greek text contains a simple genitive construction, which we usually translate in English by using the word "of." But in Greek, as in English, this can be either what grammarians call a subjective genitive or an objective genitive.
A subjective genitive is one in which the word following "of is the subject or source of the idea. An example is "love of God." The phrase usually means that this is God's love. He is the source of the love and the subject of the action. A nonbiblical example is the "novels of Charles Dickens." It means that Dickens is the author of the novels. He wrote them. It does not mean that they are about him. The other type of genitive is what grammarians call an objective genitive. It refers to a situation in which the word following "of is the object of the first word. An example might be "world of misery." This does not mean that misery is the source of the world or even the source of the world's problems but rather that the world is characterized by misery. It is a miserable world. The word misery functions as an adjective in this construction.

How, then, is the phrase "righteousness of God" to be interpreted? If this is a case of an objective genitive, it is a righteousness determined by God's own nature. That is, as we can also say, it is his righteousness or divine righteousness. This is what the editors of the Scofield Bible seem to have thought, for they appended a note to Romans 3:21, which reads: "The righteousness of God is all that God demands and approves, and is ultimately found in Christ himself, who fully met in our stead every requirement of the law." They support this interpretation by a reference to 1 Corinthians 1:30: "Christ... has become... our righteousness."

I find support for this idea in the text, because Paul's chief point is that the righteousness of God has been disclosed in the person and work of Christ. Before, we did not have any truly adequate way of understanding what this righteousness is like. But now we do, since we can see it in the Savior.

On the other hand, if this is a subjective genitive (rather than an objective genitive), we should then understand Paul to be teaching that God is the source of this righteousness and that it is in Jesus Christ that God makes it available to us. The translators of the New International Version seem to have preferred this idea, for they have written: "But now a righteousness from God... has been made known."

Surely this is a case where we do not have to choose between the two ideas, for both are correct. Righteousness is to be seen in the Lord Jesus Christ, but it is also his righteousness, rather than our own, that we need. Apart from him we might compare ourselves only with one another and thus have an utterly inadequate idea of what the holy God requires. This is what Paul himself had been doing prior to his encounter with Jesus on the road to Damascus. He had compared himself with other people, even the most moral people of his day, and had concluded that there was much he could boast about: "If anyone else thinks he has reasons to put confidence in the flesh, I have more" (Phil. 3:4). But when he saw Jesus in the Damascus road vision, for the first time he came to understand what true righteousness is and learned to reckon his own good deeds as worthless. "For [his] sake," wrote Paul, "I have lost all things. I consider them rubbish, that I may gain Christ and be found in him, not having a righteousness of my own that comes from the law, but that which is through faith in Christ—the righteousness that comes from God and is by faith" (vv. 8b-9).

At the same time—it is explicitly stated in the last of those three verses from Philippians—the righteousness of God, which is revealed in Christ, is also a righteousness that comes to us from God. For if God did not give it, there is no way any of us could possibly win it for ourselves. This is another way of saying that salvation is a gift. It is the ground on which the redeemed will ascribe all their praise to God for saving them.

Apart from the Law

These ideas need to be held together. And they need to be remembered in everything we say both about our inability to attain righteousness by ourselves and about the way God has provided it for us through the work of Jesus Christ.

The phrase Paul uses in our text to state how the righteousness of God can not come to us is "apart from law." This does not mean that the law has no value, of course. The very sentence reminds us of one of its values, for it says that "the Law and the Prophets" testified to the righteousness that would come (and eventually did come) in Jesus Christ. (In our last study we looked at some of the texts that do just that.) Again, at the very end of Romans 3, we find Paul returning to the subject of the law, saying, "Do we, then, nullify the law by this faith? Not at all! Rather, we uphold the law" (v. 31). The law clearly had value in the Old Testament period and continues to have value in the Christian era.

Theologians usually speak of the function of God's law in two areas: (1) to restrain evil, much as secular law is meant to do; and (2) to reveal man's sin and thus point us to the need for Jesus Christ. These are important functions. But the one thing the law cannot do and was never meant to do was save a person by his or her observance of it.

This is why Paul speaks of a righteousness of God "apart from law" and why this announcement is such good news, although hard for unsaved people to understand or accept. The law, as Paul will say later in Romans, is "holy, righteous and good" (Rom. 7:12). If we could be saved by law, the law of God would save us. But we cannot! And it cannot! We cannot keep God's commandments. If the law is to have any benefit for us, it must be by enabling us to see our inability to satisfy the standards of God by our own efforts and thus turn us to Christ. That is why Paul says that "this righteousness from God comes [not by law but] through faith in Jesus Christ to all who believe..." (Rom. 3:22).

Another way of putting this is to say that when the law was given to Israel on Mount Sinai, the very books that listed these unyielding commandments of the holy God also contained instructions for the sacrifice of the lamb on the Day of Atonement. God gave the commandments, but he also gave the altar and taught the principle of substitution. It is as if he were saying, "These are my commandments; you must keep them or be lost. But I know you cannot keep them. So, rather than trusting in your ability to do what you never will be able to do, I point you to my Son, who will die for you. It is on the basis of his future work that I am giving you a righteousness you could never achieve yourselves. Trust him."

A Unique Religion

This idea is so important that I want to state it another way, showing the utter uniqueness of Christianity in this fundamental matter. Paul has said that this righteousness from God, which we need, is "apart from law," by which he means primarily "apart from the law of God given to Israel." He means, as John Murray has said in his commentary, that "in justification there is no contribution, preparatory, accessory or subsidiary, that is given by works of law."

But "law" also embraces all human effort to attain righteousness, and this means that the fundamental principle of this verse (as well as of the Bible as a whole) is that God's righteousness is to be received apart from any human doing whatsoever.

This is the point at which Christianity is distinguished categorically from every other human religion. All religions have their distinguishing points, of course. Some call God, the Supreme Being, by a different name. Some emphasize one path to God, some another. Some are mystical, some very ritualistic. But all, except for Christianity, suppose that there is something human beings can do for the Deity to convince him to save them. They teach a human way to achieve eternity, a man-made ladder to the bliss of the life to come. Only Christianity humbles man by insisting that there is nothing at all we can do to work out our salvation.

Of course, once we are saved we have the obligation and privilege of doing much, since Jesus calls us to discipleship. But we are not saved by such doings. All our actions can bring upon us, even the best of our actions, is the judgment from God that we deserve. Therefore, it is vitally important to examine ourselves to see if we are really trusting in Jesus and what he has done, or whether we are trusting in what we suppose we can do. Commentator Donald Barnhouse has written:

Look into your own heart and see whether you are trusting, even in a small fraction, in something that you are doing for yourself or that you are doing for God, instead of finding in your heart that you have ceased from your works as God did from his and that you are resting on the work that was accomplished on the cross of Calvary. This is the secret of reality:

Righteousness apart from law. Righteousness apart from human doing. Christianity is the faith that believes God's Word about the work that is fully done, completely done....

Righteousness without law. Righteousness apart from human character. Righteousness without even a consideration of the nature of the being that is made righteous. Righteousness that comes from God upon an ungodly man. Righteousness that will save a thief on the cross. Righteousness that is prepared for you. Righteousness that you must choose by abandoning any hope of salvation from anything that is in yourself. And underline this—it is the only righteousness that can produce practical righteousness in you.

The Really Good News

When a person is first presented with this pure core of Christianity, the reaction is usually revulsion. We want to save ourselves, and anything that suggests that we cannot do so is abhorrent to us. We do not want a religion that demands that we throw ourselves entirely upon the grace and mercy of God. But Christianity is not only the religion we need so desperately. It is also the only religion worth having in the long run. Let me explain.

1. If salvation is by the gift of God, apart from human doing, then we can be saved now. We do not have to wait until we reach some high level of attainment or pass some undetermined future test. Many people think in these terms, because they know (if they are honest with themselves) that their lives and actions are far from what they should be now and they keep striving. But this means—I am sure you can see it—that salvation can never be a present experience but is something always in the future. It is something such persons hope to attain, though they are afraid they may not. It is only in Christianity that this future element moves into the present. And the reason it can is that salvation is not based on our ability to accumulate acceptable merits with God, but rather on what God has already done for us. When Jesus said on the cross, "It is finished," he meant what he said. His finished work is the sole grounds for our being declared righteous by God. And since it is a past accomplishment, salvation can be ours now, solely by the application of Christ's righteousness to us as God's gift.

This is why Paul can say, "Therefore, there is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 8:1). It is also why he declared, "I tell you, now is the time of God's favor, now is the day of salvation" (2 Cor. 6:2).

It is why Joseph Hart, one of our great hymnwriters, wrote:

Come, ye weary, heavy laden,
Bruised and broken by the Fall; If you tarry till you're better, You will never come at all:
Not the righteous, not the righteous, Sinners Jesus came to call.

Let not conscience make you linger,
Nor of fitness fondly dream; All the fitness he requireth
Is to feel your need of him:
This he gives you; this he gives you; 'Tis the Spirit's rising beam.

2. If salvation is by the gift of God, apart from human doing, then salvation is certain. If salvation is by human works, then human works (or a lack of them) can undo it. If I can save myself, I can unsave myself. I can ruin everything. But if salvation is of God from beginning to end, it is sure and unwavering simply because God is himself sure and unwavering. Since God knows the end from the beginning, nothing ever surprises him, and he never needs to alter his plans or change his mind. What he has begun he will continue, and we can be confident of that. Paul expressed this confidence in regard to the church at Philippi, saying that "he who began a good work in you will carry it on to completion until the day of Christ Jesus" (Phil. 1:6).

3. If salvation is by the gift of God, apart from human doing, then human boasting is excluded, and all the glory in salvation goes to God. I doubt any of us would want to be in a heaven populated by persons who got there, even in part, by their own efforts. The boasting of human beings is bad enough in this world, where all they have to boast of is their own good looks (for which they are not responsible), their money, their friends, or whatever. Imagine how offensive it would be if they were able to brag about having earned heaven: "Old Joe down there—he's in the other place—just didn't have what it takes, I suppose. He should have lived a good life, like me." Even if the only thing that determines a person's salvation is faith (thought of as something of which we are capable), it would still be intolerable for some people to boast of having believed, though others had refused to do so.

But it is not going to be like that! Salvation is a gift. It is receiving God's righteousness—apart from law, apart from human doing. It is, as Paul wrote to the Ephesians, "not by works, so that no one can boast" (Eph. 2:9). No one in heaven will be praising man. In heaven the glory will go to God only. Soli deo gloria!

Thank God it is that way.

Chapter 42.
Amazing Grace

Romans 3:22-24

In the last study I introduced four doctrines found in Romans 3:21-31: (1) God has provided a righteousness of his own for men and women, a righteousness we do not possess ourselves; (2) this righteousness is by grace; (3) it is the work of the Lord Jesus Christ in dying for his people, redeeming them from their sin, that has made this grace on God's part possible; and (4) this righteousness, which God has graciously provided, becomes ours through simple faith. We have already looked at the first of these four doctrines: the righteousness that God has made available to us apart from law. Now we will examine the second doctrine: that this righteousness becomes ours by the grace of God alone, apart from human merit.

That is the meaning of grace, of course. It is God's favor to us apart from human merit. Indeed, it is favor when we deserve the precise opposite. D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones has written, "There is no more wonderful word than 'grace.' It means unmerited favor or kindness shown to one who is utterly undeserving.... It is not merely a free gift, but a free gift to those who deserve the exact opposite, and it is given to us while we are 'without hope and without God in the world.' "

But how are we to do justice to this great concept today? We have too high an opinion of ourselves even to understand grace, let alone to appreciate it. We speak of it certainly. We sing, "Amazing grace—how sweet the sound—That saved a wretch like me!" But we do not think of ourselves as wretches needing to be saved. Rather, we think of ourselves as quite worthy. One teacher has said, "Amazing grace is no longer amazing to us." In our view, it is not even grace.

There Is No Difference

This is why the idea expressed in Romans 3:23 is inserted at this point. For many years, whenever I came to this verse, I had a feeling that it was somehow in the wrong place. It was not that Romans 3:23 is untrue. Obviously it is, for that is what Romans 1:18-3:20 is all about. What bothered me is that the verse did not seem to belong here. I felt that the words "there is no difference, for all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" belonged with that earlier section. The verse seemed somehow an intrusion here, because Romans 3:21-31 is not talking about sin but about the way of salvation.

I think differently now, however. And the reason I think differently is that I now understand the connection between this verse and grace. The reason we do not appreciate grace is that we do not really believe Romans 3:23. Or, if we do, we believe it in a far lesser sense than Paul intended.

Let me use a story to explain what I mean. In his classic little book All of Grace, Charles Haddon Spurgeon begins with the story of a preacher from the north of England who went to call on a poor woman. He knew that she needed help. So, with money from the church in his hand, he made his way through the poor section of the city to where she lived, climbed the four flights of stairs to her tiny attic apartment, and then knocked at the door. There was no answer. He knocked again. Still no answer. He went away. The next week he saw the woman in church and told her that he knew of her need and had been trying to help her. "I called at your room the other day, but you were not home," he said. "At what time did you call, sir?" she asked.

"About noon."

"Oh, dear," she answered. "I was home, and I heard you knocking. But I did not answer. I thought it was the man calling for the rent."

This is a good illustration of grace and of our natural inability to appreciate it. But isn't it true that, although most of us laugh at this story, we unfortunately also fail to identify with it? In fact, we may even be laughing at the poor woman rather than at the story, because we consider her to be in a quite different situation from ourselves. She was unable to pay the rent. We know people like that. We feel sorry for them. But we think that is not our condition. We can pay. We pay our bills here, and we suppose (even though we may officially deny it) that we will be able to pay something—a down payment even if not the full amount—on our outstanding balance in heaven. So we bar the door, not because we are afraid that God is coming to collect the rent, but because we fear he is coming with grace and we do not want a handout. We do not consider our situation to be desperate.

But, you see, if the first chapters of Romans have meant anything to us, they have shown that spiritually "there is no difference" between us and even the most destitute of persons. As far as God's requirements are concerned, there is no difference between us and the most desperate or disreputable character in history.

I have in my library a fairly old book entitled Grace and Truth, written by the Scottish preacher
W. P. Mackay. Wisely, in my judgment, the first chapter of the book begins with a study of "there is no difference." I say "wisely," because, as the author shows, until we know that in God's sight there is no difference between us and even the wildest profligate, we cannot be saved. Nor can we appreciate the nature and extent of the grace needed to rescue us from our dilemma.

Mackay illustrates this point with an anecdote. Someone was once speaking to a rich English lady, stressing that every human being is a sinner. She replied with some astonishment, "But ladies are not sinners!"

"Then who are?" the person asked her.

"Just young men in their foolish days," was her reply.

When the person explained the gospel further, insisting that if she was to be saved by Christ, she would have to be saved exactly as her footman needed to be saved—by the unmerited grace of God in Christ's atonement—she retorted, "Well, then, I will not be saved!" That was her decision, of course, but it was tragic.

If you want to be saved by God, you must approach grace on the basis of Romans 1:18-3:20—on the grounds of your utter ruin in sin—and not on the basis of any supposed merit in yourself.

Common Grace

It is astonishing that we should fail to understand grace, of course, because all human beings have experienced it in a general but nonsaving way, even if they are not saved or have not even the slightest familiarity with Christianity. We have experienced what theologians call "common grace," the grace that God has shown to the whole of humanity. Jesus spoke of it when he reminded his listeners that God "causes his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sends his rain on the righteous and the unrighteous" (Matt. 5:45b).

When Adam and Eve sinned, the race came under judgment. No one deserved anything good. If God had taken Adam and Eve in that moment and cast them into the lake of fire, he would have been entirely just in doing so, and the angels could still have sung with great joy: "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord God Almighty, who was, and is, and is to come" (Rev. 4:8). Or, if God had spared Adam and Eve, allowing them to increase until there was a great mass of humanity in the world and then had brushed all people aside into everlasting torment, God would still have been just. God does not owe us anything. Consequently, the natural blessings we have are due not to our own righteousness or abilities but to common grace.

Let me try to state this clearly once more. If you are not a believer in Jesus Christ, you are still a recipient of God's common grace, whether you acknowledge it or not. If you are alive and not in hell at this moment, it is because of God's common grace. If you are in good health and not wasting away in some ward of hopeless patients in a hospital, it is because of common grace. If you have a home and are not wandering about on city streets, it is because of God's grace. If you have clothes to wear and food to eat, it is because of God's grace. The list could be endless. There is no one living who has not been the recipient of God's common grace in countless ways. So, if you think that it is not by grace but by your merits alone that you possess these blessings, you show your ignorance of spiritual matters and disclose how far you are from God's kingdom.

Unmerited Grace

But it is not common grace that Paul is referring to in our Romans text, important as common grace is. It is the specific, saving grace of God in salvation, which is not "common" (in the sense that all persons experience it regardless of their relationship to God), but rather is a gift received only by some through faith in Jesus Christ, apart from merit.

This is the point we need chiefly to stress, of course, for it takes us back to the story of the preacher's visit to the poor woman and reminds us that the reason we do not appreciate grace is that we think we deserve it. We do not deserve it! If we did, it would not be grace. It would be our due, and we have already seen that the only thing rightly due us in our sinful condition is a full outpouring of God's just wrath and condemnation. So I say again: Grace is apart from good works. Grace is apart from merit. We should be getting this by now, because each of the blessings enumerated in this great chapter of Romans is apart from works, law, or merit—which are only various ways of saying the same thing.

The righteousness of God, which is also from God, is apart from works.

Grace, which is the source of that righteousness, is apart from works.

Redemption, which makes grace possible, is apart from works.

Justification is apart from works.

Salvation from beginning to end is apart from works. In other words, it is free. This must have been the chief idea in Paul's mind when he wrote these verses, for he emphasizes the matter by repeating it. He says that we are "justified freely by his grace through the redemption that came by Christ Jesus" (v. 24, italics mine).

One of the most substantial works on grace that I have come across is by Lewis Sperry Chafer, the founder of Dallas Theological Seminary, and it goes by that title: Grace. In the very first chapter Chafer has a section captioned "Seven Fundamental Facts About Grace." I am not happy with everything he says in this section, particularly the last two of these points. But I refer to him here because of what he says about grace and demerit:

1. "Grace is not withheld because of demerit" and
2. "Grace cannot be lessened because of demerit."

These are important points, since they emphasize the bright side of what usually appears to us as undesirable teaching.

Most of us resent the thought of "free" grace. We want to earn our own way, and we resent the suggestion that we are unable to scale the high walls of heaven by our own devices. We must be humbled before we will even give ear to the idea.

But if we have been humbled—if God has humbled us—the doctrine of grace becomes a marvelous encouragement and comfort. It tells us that the grace of God will never be withheld because of anything we may have done, however evil it was, nor will it be lessened because of that or any other evil we may do. The self-righteous person imagines that God scoops grace out of a barrel, giving much to the person who has sinned much and needs much, but giving only a little to the person who has sinned little and needs little. That is one way of wrongly mixing grace with merit. But the person who is conscious of his or her sin often imagines something similar, though opposite in direction. Such people think of God's withholding grace because of their great sin, or perhaps even putting grace back into his barrel when they sin badly.

Thank God grace is not bestowed on this principle! As Chafer says:

God cannot propose to do less in grace for one who is sinful than he would have done had that one been less sinful. Grace is never exercised by him making up what may be lacking in the life and character of a sinner. In such a case, much sinfulness would call for much grace, and little sinfulness would call for little grace. [Instead] the sin question has been set aside forever, and equal exercise of grace is extended to all who believe. It never falls short of being the measureless saving grace of God. Thus, grace could not be increased, for it is the expression of his infinite love; it could not be diminished, for every limitation that human sin might impose on the action of a righteous God has, through the propitiation of the cross, been dismissed forever.

Grace humbles us, because it teaches that salvation is apart from human merit. At the same time, it encourages us to come to God for the grace we so evidently need. There is no sin too great either to turn God from us or to lessen the abundance of the grace he gives.

Abounding Grace

That word abundance leads to the final characteristic of grace to be included in this study. It is taught two chapters further on in a verse that became the life text of John Newton: Romans 5:20. Our version reads, ".... But where sin increased, grace increased all the more." But the version Newton knew rendered this, "But where sin abounded, grace did much more abound" (KJV).

John Newton was an English clergyman who lived from 1725 to 1807. He had a wide and effective ministry and has been called the second founder of the Church of England. He is best known to us for his hymns.

Newton was raised in a Christian home in which he was taught many great verses of the Bible. But his mother died when he was only six years old, and he was sent to live with a relative who mocked Christianity. One day, at an early age, Newton left home and joined the British Navy as an apprenticed seaman. He was wild and dissolute in those years, and he became exceedingly immoral. He acquired a reputation of being able to swear for two hours without repeating himself. Eventually he deserted the navy off the coast of Africa. Why Africa? In his memoirs he wrote that he went to Africa for one reason only and that was "that I might sin my fill."

In Africa he fell in with a Portuguese slavetrader in whose home he was cruelly treated. This man often went away on slaving expeditions, and when he was gone the power in the home passed to the trader's African wife, the chief woman of his harem. This woman hated all white men, and she took out her hatred on Newton. He tells us that for months he was forced to grovel in the dirt, eating his food from the ground like a dog and beaten unmercifully if he touched it with his hands. For a time he was actually placed in chains. At last, thin and emaciated, Newton made his way through the jungle, reached the sea, and there attracted a British merchant ship making its way up the coast to England.

The captain of the ship took Newton aboard, thinking that he had ivory to sell. But when he learned that the young man knew something about navigation as a result of his time in the British Navy, he made him ship's mate. Even then Newton fell into trouble. One day, when the captain was ashore, Newton broke out the ship's supply of rum and got the crew drunk. He was so drunk himself that when the captain returned and struck him in the head, Newton fell overboard and would have drowned if one of the sailors had not grabbed him and hauled him back on deck in the nick of time.

Near the end of the voyage, as they were approaching Scotland, the ship ran into bad weather and was blown off course. Water poured in, and she began to sink. The young profligate was sent down into the hold to pump water. The storm lasted for days. Newton was terrified, sure that the ship would sink and he would drown. But there in the hold of the ship, as he pumped water, desperately attempting to save his life, the God of grace, whom he had tried to forget but who had never forgotten him, brought to his mind Bible verses he had learned in his home as a child. Newton was convicted of his sin and of God's righteousness. The way of salvation opened up to him. He was born again and transformed. Later, when the storm had passed and he was again in England, Newton began to study theology and eventually became a distinguished evangelist, preaching even before the queen.

Of this storm William Cowper, the British poet who was a close friend of John Newton's, wrote:

> God moves in a mysterious way, His wonders to perform;
> He plants his footsteps in the sea And rides upon the storm.

And Newton? Newton became a poet as well as a preacher, writing some of our best-known hymns. This former blasphemer wrote:

> How sweet the Name of Jesus sounds In a believer's ear!
> It soothes his sorrows, heals his wounds, And drives away his fear.

He is known above all for "Amazing Grace":

> Amazing grace—how sweet the sound— That saved a wretch like me!
> I once was lost, but now am found— Was blind, but now I see.
>
> 'Twas grace that taught my heart to fear, And grace my fears relieved;
> How precious did that grace appear The hour I first believed.
>
> Through many dangers, toils, and snares, I have already come;
> 'Tis grace has brought me safe thus far, And grace will lead me home.

Newton was a great preacher of grace. And no wonder! He had learned what all who have ever been saved have learned: namely, that grace is from God, apart from human merit. He deserved nothing. But he found grace through the work of Jesus.

Chapter 43.
Bought with a Price

Romans 3:24

In September 17, 1915, the distinguished Professor of Didactic and Polemic Theology at Princeton Theological Seminary, Benjamin Breckinridge Warfield, stood in Miller Chapel to deliver an address to the newly arrived students. The subject had been announced: "'Redeemer' and 'Redemption,'" and the young men were probably prepared for a difficult and weighty presentation. Instead Warfield talked about how wonderful the two words Redeemer and redemption are.

"There is no one of the titles of Christ which is more precious to Christian hearts than 'Redeemer,'" the professor began. True, other titles are more often on our lips: "Lord," "Savior," others. But "Redeemer" is more intimate and therefore more precious. Warfield explained:

It gives expression not merely to our sense that we have received salvation from [Jesus], but also to our appreciation of what it cost him to procure this salvation for us. It is the name specifically of the Christ of the cross. Whenever we pronounce it, the cross is placarded before our eyes and our hearts are filled with loving remembrance not only that Christ has given us salvation but that he paid a mighty price for it.

How do we know this is true? In proof of his statement, Warfield appealed, not to great works of theology dealing with the cross—though there are many of them—but to the church's hymnody. Many of the hymns in the hymnbook used that day at Princeton celebrated the Lord as Redeemer, and Warfield listed them:

> Let our whole soul an offering be To our Redeemer's name;
> While we pray for pardoning grace, Through our Redeemers name;
> Almighty Son, Incarnate Word,
> Our Prophet, Priest, Redeemer, Lord;...
> O for a thousand tongues to sing My dear Redeemers praise;...
> All hail, Redeemer, hail, For thou hast died for me;...

All glory, laud and honor To thee Redeemer, King.

Those are only six of the hymns he listed. He cited twenty-eight. But then, in case the students had missed his point, he did the same thing all over again with the words ransom and ransomed, which are near synonyms of "redeem" and "redeemed." He found twenty-five examples.

"Redemption" and "Redeemer" are the words to which we now come in our phrase-by-phrase exposition of Romans 3:21-31—"God's Remedy in Christ." We have outlined the passage by citing four great doctrines found in it: (1) the righteousness of God, (2) grace, (3) redemption, and (4) faith, by which these blessings are conveyed to the individual. This is the third doctrine. It is most precious to us, because it describes what the Lord Jesus Christ did for us by dying.

A Misunderstood Doctrine

In his address Warfield spoke of the "cost" of redemption. But here a problem develops for some people. "Isn't salvation supposed to be free?" they ask. "Haven't you just talked about grace, the unmerited favor of God toward us? Salvation can't be bought or sold. If you talk about God extracting a price for his favor, you make God cheap, begrudging, and mercenary. How can anyone believe that this is accurate?"

Because of such reasoning some scholars have tried to change the meaning of "Redeemer" and "redemption" from what I have suggested these words mean (and do mean) to something more like "release" or "deliverance," that is, to the process of setting someone free without any idea of paying a price for it. They point to Luke 24:21 in which the Emmaus disciples used the word redeem in their conversation with Jesus, saying, "We had hoped that he was the one who was going to redeem Israel." Obviously they were thinking of a political deliverance, not a commercial transaction. Or they point to Ephesians 1:14, "... a deposit guaranteeing our inheritance until the redemption of those who are God's possession." They argue that there is no suggestion of a price in that statement. Rather, it is speaking only of our deliverance from the power of sin at the return of Christ.

Three Great Words

How should we respond to this objection? There are a number of ways. We could point out that the Emmaus disciples obviously misunderstood the nature of Christ's redemptive work. We could emphasize that, although redemption includes the idea of deliverance and is a word sometimes used for "deliverance," it is nevertheless a larger and more embracing concept. We might observe that, even though in the Bible a price for redemption is paid, it is never a case of our paying for redemption—we have no means of paying for it—but rather of God's paying the price in Christ, so that salvation might be free for us.

These points are all valid. Nevertheless, in my judgment, the best way of getting to the meaning of redemption is by a careful examination of the biblical words used for it. There are three Greek words, plus two important Hebrew words or concepts.

The first Greek word is agorazō. It comes from the noun used to describe an open marketplace in Greek-speaking lands, an agora. An agora is where all sorts of things—wine, grain and oil, pottery, silver and gold ornaments, horses, slaves, clothing and household wares—were bought and sold. The verb agorazō, which is based upon the word agora, meant "to buy" something in such a marketplace. Clearly a price was involved. Not long ago I discovered that the Greek Orthodox community of Philadelphia was using the word for an annual outdoor bazaar at which those of Greek descent raise money for their church. It is advertised as "A Greek Agora." Agorazō suggests that Christ's saving work involves his purchasing us for himself in this world's marketplace.

The second Greek word for "redemption" is related closely to the first. It is exagorazō. Clearly it is only the first word with the addition of the prefix ex, which means "out of." So exagorazō means "to buy out of the marketplace," with the idea that the object or person purchased might never have to return there again.

It is hard to illustrate this in terms of contemporary purchases. The closest we can come is redeeming an object from a pawnshop. But if we remember that in the ancient world some of the chief objects of commerce were slaves and that slaves could be purchased out of the marketplace (redeemed) by the payment of a price, this becomes a rich idea for us. According to the Bible, we are all slaves to sin. By ourselves we cannot escape from this slavery. But Jesus has freed us. He has done it by paying the price of our redemption by his blood. That is why Peter writes, "For you know that it was not with perishable things such as silver or gold that you were redeemed from the empty way of life handed down to you from your forefathers, but with the precious blood of Christ, a lamb without blemish or defect" (1 Peter 1:18-19). Here the idea of Christ's death being the cost or price of our redemption is inescapable.

The third pertinent Greek word is actually a group of words based on the root verb yō. They carry further the idea of being purchased out of the marketplace, for the chief thought of these words is "to loose" or "to set free." These words have an interesting development. Yō itself meant only "to loose or loosen," as in taking off a suit of clothes or unbuckling one's armor. When used of persons, it signified loosening bonds so that, for example, a prisoner might be released. It was usually necessary to pay a ransom price to free a prisoner, however. So in time a second word developed from yō to signify this "ransom price." It was lytroō. From it another verb developed: lytroō which, like yō, meant "to loose" or "to set free" but, unlike yō, always meant to free by paying the redemption price. From these last two words the proper Greek term for redemption came about: lytrōsis (and the cognate word apolytrōsis). These words always had to do with freeing a slave by paying for him. In Christian vocabulary they mean that Jesus freed us from sin's slavery by his death. Thus:

> Long my imprisoned spirit lay
> Fast bound in sin and nature's night; Thine eye diffused a quick'ning ray,

I woke, the dungeon flamed with light: My chains fell off, my heart was free, I rose, went forth and followed thee.

As long as we know that the death of the Lord Jesus Christ accomplished that, we will love him for being our Redeemer.

Old Testament Background

Important as a study of these Greek words for redemption may be, it is nevertheless true that the richest words for understanding the redemptive work of Christ are in the Old Testament. I refer here to two of them.

First, kōpher, which, like lytron, means "a ransom price." But it is richer than the Greek idea, because it refers to the redemption of a person who, apart from that redemption, would die. Let me explain. Suppose a person in Old Testament times owned an ox that had gored somebody to death. Under certain circumstances (we might describe this as manslaughter rather than homicide), the owner of the ox would be fined. But suppose there had been negligence. Suppose the ox was known to be dangerous and the owner had failed to secure the animal properly. In this case the owner of the ox could be killed. That is, he would have to forfeit his life for the one whose life had been taken. There would be little to be gained by one more death, of course. So Old Testament law provided a way by which, if the owner could come to an agreement with the relatives of the dead man, it would be possible for him to pay a ransom price, an indemnity, instead of dying. This ransom price was called the kōpher.

As I say, this term enriches our understanding of what the Lord Jesus Christ did in dying for us. For it is not only that in some way his death freed us from sin's power. Christ did deliver us from sin's power, but he also delivered us from death, which is the punishment God had established for transgressions ("The soul who sins... will die," Ezek. 18:4b). Therefore, for us to be redeemed means life.

The final words I bring into this study of "redemption" are gāʾal, which means "to redeem," and the related noun, gōʾel, which means "kinsmanredeemer." This latter term requires explanation.

It was a principle of Jewish law that property should remain within a family as much as possible. Therefore, if a Jewish person lost his or her share of the land through debt or by some other means, a solemn obligation evolved on a near relative (if there was one) to buy the property back again. This person, because of close relationship to the one who had lost the property, was a "kinsman," and if willing and able to purchase the property and restore it to the family, he became a "kinsman-redeemer." In some cases, where there was no male heir to inherit the property, the duty of the kinsman extended to marrying the widow in order to raise up heirs.

A kinsman-redeemer had to fulfill three qualifications:

1. He had to be a close relative (a stranger would not do),
2. He had to be willing to take on this responsibility (nobody could be compelled to do this work), and
3. He had to be able to pay the ransom price (he had to have sufficient means at his disposal).

A Romance of Redemption

Those three conditions apply to and were fulfilled in the case of Jesus Christ. But to make them vivid, let me develop them in the context of an Old Testament story, the only story in the Bible in which we see a kinsman-redeemer in action. It is the story of Ruth and her "redeemer," Boaz.

In the days of the Judges there was a famine in Israel, and a man from Bethlehem, whose name was Elimelech, left Judah with his wife, Naomi and two sons to live in Moab. Not long after this, Elimelech died, and shortly after that the sons married Moabite women. One was Orpah, and the other was Ruth. About ten years later the sons also died, and Naomi and the two daughters-inlaw were left. Apparently the three were quite poor, so when Naomi heard that the famine in Judah had passed and that there was food there, she decided to go back to her homeland and live again in Bethlehem. Orpah took her mother-in-law's advice and went back to her family, but Ruth insisted on staying with Naomi. Her entreaty (Ruth 1:16-17), which Naomi heeded, is one of the most beautiful passages in the Bible. Ruth said:

"Don't urge me to leave you or to turn back from you. Where you go I will go, and where you stay I will stay. Your people will be my people and your God my God. Where you die I will die, and there I will be buried. May the Lord deal with me, be it ever so severely, if anything but death separates you and me."

Back in Bethlehem, Naomi and Ruth were still quite poor, in spite of the fact that Naomi seems to have owned a piece of land (cf. 4:3), and the only way they could survive was by Ruth's going into the fields at harvest time to "glean" behind the reapers. Gleaning means that she was allowed to follow the workmen and pick up any small bits of grain they discarded. The law of Israel established this right for poor persons.

Ruth went to a field belonging to an affluent man named Boaz who, as it turned out, was a close relative of Naomi, a kinsman of her deceased husband Elimelech. Boaz was kind to Ruth, in spite of the fact that she was a foreigner. He encouraged her to remain in his fields and instructed the workmen to protect her and be generous to her, allowing a good supply of the grain to fall behind.

Can we say that Boaz fell in love with Ruth the Moabitess? Yes, we can, even though these are not the words in which the ancients recounted such events. (Strikingly, the word love does not occur in the entire Book of Ruth, though it is a love story.)

Naomi seems to have recognized what was happening as well as realizing that God was arranging circumstances so that Boaz could perform the office of a kinsman-redeemer for herself, in regard to her inheritance, and for Ruth, in regard to raising up an heir. So she advised Ruth how to make her claim known to Boaz. When she did, Boaz was delighted, for it meant that Ruth was interested in him also and had not, as he said, "run after the younger men, whether rich or poor" (Ruth 3:10). Unfortunately, there was a kinsman closer to Naomi and Ruth than himself. Boaz promised to raise the matter with this kinsman and to perform the office of kinsmanredeemer if the other was unable or unwilling.

As it turned out, the other relative was interested in the land but was unable to fulfill the obligation to Ruth. So Boaz willingly bought the land and married Ruth. The story ends by relating that they had a son named Obed, who became the father of Jesse, who was the father of King David.

What a beautiful story! What a beautiful redemption for Ruth! J. Vernon McGee comments:

From the very beginning there was a marvelous development in the status of Ruth. First, she was found in the land of Moab, a stranger from the covenants of promise, without hope and without God in the world. Next she was brought by providence into the field of Boaz, under the wings of the God of Israel. Then she was sent to the threshing floor of Boaz; and there she was seen asserting her claim for a kinsman-redeemer. Finally, in this last chapter of the Book of Ruth, she is seen as a bride for the heart of Boaz and as a mother in his home. What splendid progress! What scriptural evolution! From a very lowly beginning she was lifted to the very pinnacle of blessing. All this was made possible by a goel who loved her.

In redeeming us, Jesus fulfilled a similar set of qualifications: (1) He became our kinsman by the incarnation, being born in this very town of Bethlehem; (2) he was willing to be our Redeemer, because of his great love for us; and (3) he was able to redeem us, because he alone could provide an adequate redemption price by dying. We rightly sing:

> There was no other good enough To pay the price of sin;
> He only could unlock the gate Of heaven, and let us in.

The redemption of Ruth may not have cost Boaz a great deal, at the most only money, but our redemption cost Jesus Christ his life.

The Death of Great Words

At the beginning of this study I referred to the address of the gifted theologian B. B. Warfield, given to the incoming class of students at Princeton Seminary in 1915. I return to it now because of something else it contains. Warfield had spoken of "Redeemer" and "redemption" as being among the most precious words in the Christian vocabulary. But he confessed, as he came to the end of his address, that this seemed to be changing. The precise biblical meanings of these words was being lost, and with them something precious about Christianity. Warfield said:

What we are doing today as we look out upon our current religious modes of speech, is assisting at the deathbed of a word. It is sad to witness the death of any worthy thing—even of a worthy word. And worthy words do die, like any other worthy thing—if we do not take care of them.... I hope you will determine that, God helping you, you will not let them die thus, if any care on your part can preserve them in life and vigor.

But the dying of the words is not the saddest thing which we see here. The saddest thing is the dying out of the hearts of men of the things for which the words stand.... The real thing for you to settle in your minds, therefore, is whether Christ is truly a Redeemer to you, and whether you find an actual redemption in him.... Do you realize that Christ is your Ransomer and has actually shed his blood for you as your ransom? Do you realize that your salvation has been bought, bought at a tremendous price, at the price of nothing less precious than blood, and that the blood of Christ, the Holy One of God? Or, go a step further: do you realize that this Christ who has thus shed his blood for you is himself your God?

We have fallen a great deal further away from these great concepts since Warfield's time, and we are spiritually impoverished as a result. Yet the issue is the same. The questions are unchanged. Is Jesus truly your Redeemer? Are you trusting in him? Your answer to those questions will determine your entire life and destiny.

Chapter 44.
Propitiation: The Forgotten Doctrine

Romans 3:25

There are a number of texts in Romans that have been especially used by God in the conversion of important Christian leaders. We have already studied one: Romans 1:16-17, which was used to bring Martin Luther to faith. It became his life text. Romans 13:11-14 was used to save Saint Augustine. In Romans 3:25 we come to a verse that has opened the door of Paradise to many.

William Cowper and John Bunyan

William Cowper was an eighteenth-century English poet who authored some of our most beloved hymns. He had a miserable childhood. His mother died when he was only six years old, and he was immediately bundled off to a boarding school where, being slight of build and of a sensitive nature, he was mercilessly badgered, bullied, and beaten by the older boys. Cowper struggled through this time and through his later early years as a law student. But terrors overwhelmed him, and on more than one occasion his mind seemed to fail. Twice he tried to commit suicide. At last, in the year 1756, the twenty-five-year-old Cowper was committed to a private asylum under the care of a man whose name was Dr. Cotton.

Two hundred years ago, being confined to an asylum often meant receiving the most terrible treatment. But Cowper's doctor was a devout old gentleman, and he treated the distraught poet in a way that brought him out of his depression and introduced him to salvation through the work of Christ.

Cowper had been much troubled by his sin, often crying out, "My sin! My sin! Oh, for some fountain open for my cleansing!" But he had known of no such fountain. Now, under the care of this gentle Christian doctor, he discovered the only fountain that has ever washed away one's sins.

Here is how Cowper himself told about it:

The happy period which was to shake off my fetters and afford me a clear opening of the free mercy of God in Christ Jesus was now arrived. I flung myself into a chair near the window, and, seeing a Bible there, ventured once more to apply to it for comfort and instruction. The first verses I saw were in the third chapter of Romans: "Being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation, through faith in his blood, to manifest his righteousness." Immediately I received strength to believe, and the full beams of the Sun of Righteousness shone on me. I saw the sufficiency of the atonement he had made, my pardon in his blood, and the fullness and completeness of his justification. In a moment I believed and received the gospel.

Cowper said afterwards that he could have died with gratitude and joy, so overwhelmed was his spirit in that moment. He was utterly transformed. Later he wrote of his conversion:

> There is a fountain filled with blood
> Drawn from Immanuel's veins;
> And sinners, plunged beneath that flood, Lose all their guilty stains.
> The dying thief rejoiced to see
> That fountain in his day;
> And there have I, as vile as he, Washed all my sins away.
> E'er since by faith I saw the stream
> Thy flowing wounds supply, Redeeming love has been my theme, And shall be till I die.

It is an interesting sidelight to this story that it was exactly one hundred years before this, in 1656, that the same text brought deliverance to John Bunyan, the author of Pilgrim's Progress. Bunyan's account of his conversion reads, "As I was walking up and down in the house, as a man in a most woeful state, the Word of God took hold of my heart." Here he quotes our text. Then he says, "Oh, what a turn it made upon me! I was as one awakened out of some troublesome dream."

The Modern Revolt

Obviously, there is power in a text that has been so greatly used in the conversion of these and other Christian leaders. But how are these ideas received today? How many in our day are likely to be saved by Romans 3:25?

One difficulty is with the word propitiation (the word used in the King James Version of Rom.
3:25). Few understand what propitiation means, let alone love and respond to the concept. "Redemption" we can understand, at least in part. It is an image for Christ's work drawn from the world of buying and selling, and since we do so much of both, the idea of redemption is at least not foreign to us. But "propitiation" is drawn from the world of ancient religion. It signifies what the worshiper does when he or she presents a sacrifice to a deity. It is an "atoning sacrifice," an act by which the wrath of the offended deity is appeased or turned aside. Because this ancient world of sacrifices is so far from our experience, the idea of propitiation is hard to understand.

Then, too, there are our "theological" objections. Propitiation (as commonly defined) presupposes the wrath of God—a wrath that needs to be appeased or turned aside. But right here many modern thinkers stop, regarding wrath as highly inappropriate for Christianity. Such persons might say, "We can understand how the idea of propitiation might be appropriate in an ancient, pagan society, where God was not known and was thought to be vacillating, capricious, and often angry. But certainly this is not the God of Christianity. According to the Christian revelation, God is not angry. He is loving. He does not need to be appeased by us. All we need to do is recognize that he loves us and receive his forgiveness."

One theologian states sharply: "[Those who hold to] the 'fire and brimstone' school of theology, who revel in ideas such as that Christ was made a sacrifice to appease an angry God, or that the cross was a legal transaction in which an innocent victim was made to pay the penalty for the crimes of others, a propitiation of a stern God, find no support in Paul. These notions came into Christian theology by way of the legalistic minds of the medieval churchmen; they are not biblical Christianity." How extraordinary!

One result of this modern objection to the biblical idea of propitiation has been a retranslation of Bible passages that use it. The chief culprit here is the well-known British theologian C. H. Dodd. According to Dodd, it is not God who is to be propitiated but ourselves. So the important idea is not the turning aside of God's wrath toward us, but rather the covering over of our guilt which, according to Dodd, is best expressed by the word expiation. As a result of this argument, "expiation" rather than "propitiation" has been used in the relevant passages of the Revised Standard and the New English versions of the Bible, upon which Dodd has had an influence (Rom. 3:25; Heb. 2:17; 1 John 2:2; 4:10).

But is this interpretation correct? Can words rightly be reassigned new meanings in this fashion? Surely, as Leon Morris says in his discussion of the term, "When we reach the stage where we must say, 'When the [writers] used "propitiation" they did not mean "propitiation,"' it is... time to call a halt."

It is certainly that time for anyone who has been studying Romans, for if anything is clear at this point (after having made our way through the first two and a half chapters of the letter), it is that it is precisely the wrath of God that is our problem. We are under wrath because of sin. Therefore, if the wrath of God cannot be turned aside by someone or in some way, we are lost. It is precisely this concept that we should be looking for. John Murray wrote, "Instead of stumbling at this concept we should rather anticipate that the precise category suited to the need and liability created by the wrath of God would be enlisted to describe or define the provision of God's grace."

We can rightly express some appreciation for Dodd, of course, for he has distinguished between the mistaken pagan ideas of a god who is capricious and easily angered and the Christian God who is not. The Lord is indeed gracious. Besides, Dodd has made clear that it is not in our power to turn God's wrath aside or in any way alter his attitude toward us. But this is not the whole of the matter, and the correct approach is not to reinterpret the biblical data, but rather to seek a deeper and correct interpretation of it. Here are two important points to remember:

1. Although God's wrath is not like the capricious anger of the pagan deities, his wrath is nevertheless a true wrath against sin; and it is this true and proper wrath that must be dealt with.

We may feel, because of our particular cultural prejudices, that the wrath of God and the love of God are incompatible. But the Bible teaches that God is both wrathful and loving at the same time. What is more, his wrath is not just a small and insignificant element alongside his far more significant and overwhelming love. Actually, God's wrath is a strong character element. God hates sin and must punish it. The wrath of God is revealed in the Bible all the way from the opening chapters of Genesis to the final cataclysmic judgments recorded in the Book of Revelation.

2. Although propitiation means turning the wrath of God aside, in the biblical framework this is never a case of mere human beings appeasing the divine wrath, but rather of God himself satisfying his wrath through the death of his own Son, Jesus.

In pagan rituals, sacrifices were made by people trying to placate God. In Christianity, it is never humans who take the initiative or make the sacrifice. It is God himself who, out of his great love for sinners, provides the way by which his wrath against sin may be averted. In Jesus, God placates his own wrath against sin so that his love may go out to save sinners. As John Stott points out, "This was already clear in the Old Testament, in which the sacrifices were recognized not as human works but as divine gifts. They did not make God gracious; they were provided by a gracious God in order that he might act graciously towards his sinful people. 'I have given it to you,' God said of the sacrificial blood, 'to make atonement for yourselves on the altar' (Lev. 17:11)."

The Ark of the Covenant

Having mentioned the Old Testament system of blood sacrifices, I come to one of the most beautiful pictures of the work of Christ to be found in all the Bible. When God gave Moses the law, he told him to build a portable tabernacle to house the Ark of the Covenant and be the focal point of Israel's worship. The tabernacle was an enclosure of skins that could be easily assembled and disassembled whenever the people camped or marched. Within it was an enclosure consisting of an outer chamber called the Holy Place and an inner chamber called the Most Holy Place. The Ark of the Covenant was placed within this inner chamber.

The Ark was a gold-covered wooden box about a yard long, containing the stone tables of the law that Moses had received on Mount Sinai. (The first set of tables had been broken, but a new set had been written. It was these that were placed there.) This box had a cover called the Mercy Seat, and upon the Mercy Seat, at each end and facing one another, were statues of cherubim (angels) whose wings stretched upward and then forward, almost meeting directly over the Ark. In a symbolic way, God was imagined to dwell above the Ark, over or between the outstretched wings of the cherubim.

As it stands, the Ark is a picture of terrible judgment, intended to produce dread in the worshiper through a disclosure of his or her sin. For what does God see as he looks down upon earth from between the outstretched wings of the cherubim? Clearly, he sees the law of Moses, which each of us has broken. He sees that he must act toward us in judgment. God cannot ignore sin; sin must be punished.

But this is where the Mercy Seat comes in, and why it is called the Mercy Seat. Once a year, on the Day of Atonement, the Jewish high priest entered the Holy of Holies to make atonement for the people's sins. He entered to make propitiation, the very word that (in Greek) was used to translate "Mercy Seat." Moments before, he had offered a sacrifice for his own sin and the sins of his family in the outer courtyard of the tabernacle. Then he had sacrificed a second animal. Now he took the blood of that second animal and very carefully—lest he somehow violate the laws surrounding the sacrifice or intrude unworthily upon God's holiness and be struck down, as others who had done so had been—he entered the Most Holy Place and sprinkled the blood of the sacrifice on the Mercy Seat.

What is symbolized here? Now, as God looks down from between the outstretched wings of the cherubim, he does not see the law of Moses that we have broken, but instead sees the blood of the innocent victim. He sees that punishment has been meted out. Propitiation has been made. And his love goes out to save all who come to him, not on the basis of their own righteousness or good works, but through faith in that sacrifice.

We know, of course, that the blood of animals did not take away sin. The Bible tells us so (see Heb. 10). But the animal sacrifice pointed forward to the only sufficient sacrifice of Jesus Christ, who by his atoning death became our true propitiation.

"God, Be Mercy-Seated"

There are not many places in the Bible where the concept of "propitiation" occurs, but I turn to one of them in closing. It is a passage in which the idea is embedded in a story recorded in Luke 18:9-14.

Jesus told a parable about two men who went to the temple to pray. One was a Pharisee. The other was a publican, or tax collector. (We have a bad opinion of Pharisees today because of some of the things Jesus said about them, but they were highly regarded by their contemporaries.) The Pharisee stood up to pray—as everyone would have agreed he had the right to do. In fact, if he had not prayed, he would probably have been asked to do so: "Come here, Mr. Pharisee. Stand up where we can all hear you. Now be quiet, everybody. The Pharisee is going to pray."

Pray he did. He prayed about himself: "God, I thank you that I am not like all other men— robbers, evildoers, adulterers—or even like this tax collector. I fast twice a week and give a tenth of all I get" (vv. 11-12). I do not think the Pharisee was lying. I think he really did give a tenth of his income to the temple and really did fast twice a week. I do not believe he was a thief or an adulterer. Moreover, I think others would have concurred in this evaluation. Here was an outstanding citizen, a credit to his community. If anyone could be accepted by God on the basis of his character or good works, it was this Pharisee.

But then there was that other person, the tax collector. He "stood at a distance"—where he belonged. Most people regarded him as a no-good, money-grubbing, cheating, Roman collaborator. Jesus said of him, "He would not even look up to heaven, but beat his breast and said, 'God, have mercy on me, a sinner'" (v. 13). And why not? He was a sinner. He had plenty to beat his breast about.

It is hard to imagine a greater contrast than the one between these two men. As to occupation, noble versus base. As to bearing, proud versus shameful. As to self-evaluation, self-confident versus cringing. Yet, when the Lord concluded his parable, he reversed the judgment every one of his listeners had been making and declared: "I tell you that this man [the tax collector], rather than the other [the Pharisee], went home justified before God. For everyone who exalts himself will be humbled, and he who humbles himself will be exalted" (v. 14).

No dime-store novel, no cinematic melodrama ever had a more surprising ending than this parable.

And yet, it is an illustration of the very purest gospel! Can you see the point? Why did the tax collector, rather than the Pharisee, go home

"justified"? At first glance we might suppose that we have been overly hasty in our appraisal of the two men. The Pharisee appeared righteous, but perhaps he was not. Perhaps he had done things he was pretending he had not done. Perhaps he was a thief. Perhaps he was an adulterer. As for the tax collector—well, maybe he was better than he seemed. Perhaps, like the fictitious prostitute, he had "a heart of gold." Or perhaps he was actually doing good in the guise of a tax collector. Perhaps he was a Zealot operating "under cover."

We know perfectly well that this is not the way the story should be taken. It is true that the Pharisee was not justified. He was a sinner. But so was the tax collector. The only differences between the two men were that (1) the tax collector knew he was a sinner, while the Pharisee did not know it; and (2) the tax collector approached God, not on the basis of his good works (which he did not have), but on the basis of the provision of God for him, symbolized by the Mercy Seat and by the propitiation that took place there. Literally, his prayer was, "God, be 'Mercy-Seated'

[propitiated] to me, a sinner."

That prayer is worth exploring. It is one of the shortest prayers in the Bible—only seven words in English (NIV), six in Greek—but it is one of the most profound.

Consider the beginning and ending. The first word is "God." The last word is "sinner." Those alone are profound, because they show what results when a human being actually becomes aware of the true God. When anyone becomes conscious of God, he (or she) does not proceed unchanged in his supposed "righteousness," as the Pharisee did. (It is how we know that the Pharisee did not know God.) Rather, he is conscious of sin, and the more so, the closer to God he comes. We know that despite his reputation the tax collector knew God—because he came to God as a sinner.

Then—this is the great part of the prayer—between the beginning of the prayer ("God") and the end of it ("me, a sinner") are the words "have mercy on me," or "be Mercy-Seated to me."

Can you see what was involved? This tax collector did not only know God and know himself as a sinner, the starting point of all true religion. He also knew the heart of the gospel, since he understood propitiation, he knew that between the presence of the Holy God, who looked down in judgment upon the law that he had broken, and himself, there needed to come the blood of the sacrificial victim. And this meant that he was not actually pleading for mercy—though the prayer sounds like it—but was coming to God on the basis of the mercy already provided by God through the sacrifice. He was saying, "Treat me on the basis of the blood sprinkled upon the Mercy Seat."

That is why we must preserve this and the other great words describing the achievement of the Lord Jesus Christ for our salvation. We cannot be saved without propitiation. The wrath of God must be turned aside. God has shown how it is turned aside. He has made propitiation. Will you pray that prayer, the tax collector's prayer? No one will ever be saved without it.

Chapter 45.
Just and the Justifier

Romans 3:25-26

The Australian scholar Leon Morris points out, in The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross, that the first impression one has in turning to the subject of justification, after dealing with the words for salvation already treated in Romans, is the abundance of the material to be considered.

The word propitiation, though of great importance for understanding the nature of the atonement, is found only four times in all the New Testament (and not in all translations). Redemption, though frequent in contemporary Christian vocabulary and in the Old Testament, is not used very often in the New Testament. Reconciliation occurs in just five passages, all of them Pauline. "By contrast," says Morris, "he who would expound justification is confronted with eighty-one occurrences of the adjective dikaios, ninety-two of the noun dikaiosynē, two of the noun dikaiōsis, thirty-nine of the verb dikaioō, ten of the noun dikaiōma, and five of the adverb dikaios." Thus, the frequency of the words alone would indicate that "justification" is the central or pivotal idea in the doctrine of salvation.

John Calvin, the father of the Presbyterian and Reformed churches, called justification "the main hinge on which salvation turns."

Thomas Cranmer, the framer of the Church of England, believed that justification is "the strong rock and foundation of Christian religion." He declared that "whosoever denieth [this doctrine] is not to be counted for a true Christian man... but for an adversary of Christ."

Thomas Watson, one of the finest of the Puritans, said, "Justification is the very hinge and pillar of Christianity. An error about justification is dangerous, like a defect in a foundation.
Justification by Christ is a spring of the water of life. To have the poison of corrupt doctrine cast into this spring is damnable."

The great Reformer Martin Luther, in the words quoted earlier in this volume, wrote, "When the article of justification has fallen, everything has fallen.... This is the chief article from which all other doctrines have flowed.... It alone begets, nourishes, builds, preserves, and defends the church of God; and without it the church of God cannot exist for one hour." Luther said that justification is "the master and prince, the lord, the ruler, and the judge over all kinds of doctrines."

These statements are not exaggerations. They present simple truth, because justification is indeed God's answer to the most important of all human questions: How can a man or a woman become right with God? We are not right with God in ourselves. We are under God's wrath. Justification is vital, because we must become right with God or perish eternally.

A Salvation Triangle

Here is another question—one that is also important, at least so far as our understanding of the Book of Romans is concerned. If justification is as critical a doctrine as the frequency of the words for justification and the quotations from Calvin, Cranmer, Watson, and Luther seem to indicate, why have we not encountered it before now? Why have we not been studying justification earlier—in Romans 3 at least, if not in the previous chapters?

The answer, of course, is that this is precisely what we have been doing. The Greek word for "justification" (dikaiosynē) is built on the word for "right" or "righteousness" (dikaios), and it is a lack of precisely this righteousness and our need for a righteousness (or justification) not our own that has concerned us. As far back as Romans 1:17, we saw that "in the gospel a righteousness from God is revealed, a righteousness that is by faith from first to last...." What is this if not justification? Or again, in Romans 3, we saw that "a righteousness from God, apart from law, has been made known, to which the law and the prophets testify" (v. 21). This also is a reference to justification. In between those two verses—between Romans 1:17 and Romans 3:21—is a long section showing that no one is able to be justified by his or her own merits or good works. In fact, this section ends by saying, "Therefore no one will be declared righteous [that is, no one will be justified] in his [God's] sight by observing the law; rather, through the law we become conscious of sin" (Rom. 3:20).

In other words, thus far at least, the entire Book of Romans has been about this doctrine.

Another way of showing this is to indicate how each of the ideas that describes Christ's work in dying for us—redemption and propitiation—which we have already studied, is tied into justification. It is not possible to have any one of these without the others.

I find it helpful to portray this by what I call the salvation triangle. Imagine a triangle with one of its three sides on the bottom. Imagine further that the three points of the triangle represent (1) God the Father (the point at the top of the triangle), (2) the Lord Jesus Christ (the point on the bottom and to the left), and (3) ourselves (the point on the bottom and to the right). Imagine in addition that each of the three sides of the triangle represents one of the three salvation doctrines that we have been studying.

The line at the bottom stands for "redemption." It links the Lord Jesus Christ and mankind, because it describes what Jesus does in relation to his people. He redeems them. He purchases them at the price of his own shed blood. Because this describes what Jesus does for us, and not what we do, turn that bottom line into an arrow pointing from Jesus to us. He is the subject of the action. We are the objects.

The line on the left, connecting the Lord Jesus Christ and God the Father, stands for "propitiation." It is there because propitiation describes what the Lord Jesus Christ did for us in relationship to his Father. As we saw when we studied that word, it is not ourselves that need to be propitiated. It is God. His wrath against sin needs to be turned aside. Moreover, we are unable to make propitiation. The work is beyond us. God himself must make propitiation, and this is what he does in Christ. Jesus, who is God, turns God's wrath aside. This line can also be turned into an arrow too —an arrow pointing from Jesus to the Father. As in the former case, Jesus is the subject of this action, but here the Father is the object.

The final line of the salvation triangle connects God the Father with ourselves, and this (as we anticipate) represents "justification." This arrow points toward us, for God is the subject of the action—he justifies us—and we are the object—we are justified.

This diagram tells us a great deal about how God saves fallen men and women. As you picture it in your mind, you will see that two of these actions (redemption and propitiation) issue from the Lord Jesus Christ. This indicates that he is the one who has achieved our salvation. It is his work. We are the recipients of two actions (redemption and justification). We contribute nothing to salvation. "Salvation comes from the LORD" (Jonah 2:9b). God the Father is the recipient of one action (propitiation) and the author of one action (justification). This makes clear that it is on the basis of Christ's work of propitiation that we are justified. It is because Jesus paid the price of our salvation by dying in our place that God can justify the ungodly—as we will see.

The point I am making here, however, is that these three works are inextricably bound together. It is not possible to have even a single one without the others. Consequently, everything we have been studying is in one sense a part of justification.

An Image from the Law Courts

But what does justification refer to specifically? Redemption, as we saw, is a term borrowed from the marketplace. It concerns buying and selling and indicates the price Jesus paid for our deliverance. Because the word was so often used in ancient times for buying slaves, it has overtones of delivering us from sin's slavery. Christ freed us from sin's slavery by his death. Propitiation, as we saw in the previous study, is a term borrowed from the world of ancient religion. It describes the sacrifice by which the wrath of God is turned from us. In ancient times pagan worshipers thought they could turn aside God's wrath by themselves, presenting sacrifices commensurate with their transgressions. But, although the idea is the same, in Christianity it is understood that no mere human being can placate or turn aside God's wrath. Only God can do that, and that is precisely what he has done through the only sufficient sacrifice of Jesus Christ.

What about justification? This word comes from the world of the law courts and describes the act of a judge in acquitting an accused person.

As Leon Morris says, "Justification... is a legal term indicating the process of declaring righteous."

It is important to note those two legalistic words: "acquitting" and "declaring." This is because the single most serious error in trying to understand justification is to suppose that it means "to make righteous" in the sense of actually producing righteousness in the one justified. As we will see in our final study of Romans 3, actual righteousness does follow on justification—so closely that we are correct in saying that if it does not, the one involved is not justified. But justification in itself does not refer to this change. The English word might lead us to think so. It is composed of the two Latin words: justus, meaning 'just" or "righteous," and facio, meaning "to make." At first glance this is precisely what the word seems to indicate: "to make righteous." But, as I say, this is not the right idea. Justification only indicates that the person involved has a right standing before the bar of God's justice. It does not indicate how he or she got that way, which is why the other terms—redemption and propitiation—are so necessary.

Let me put it in another way. Justification is the opposite of condemnation. When a defendant is found to stand in a wrong relationship to the law, he or she is condemned or pronounced guilty by the judge. Condemnation of that defendant does not make the person guilty. He or she is only declared to be so. In the same way, in justification the person is declared to be just or in a right relationship to the law, but not made righteous. A person could be declared righteous on the basis of his or her own righteousness; such a one would be pronounced innocent in a court of law. But in salvation, since we have no righteousness of our own and are not innocent, we are declared righteous on the grounds of Christ's atonement.

A Well-Developed Doctrine

It helps to realize that the full New Testament doctrine of justification is not merely justification alone but, to state it fully: justification by grace through faith in Jesus Christ.

This is exactly what Paul is declaring in the verses that are the basis of this study, Romans 3:2426: "[Those who believe] are justified freely by [God's] grace through the redemption that came by Christ Jesus. God presented him as a sacrifice of atonement, through faith in his blood. He did this to demonstrate his justice, because in his forbearance he had left the sins committed beforehand unpunished—he did it to demonstrate his justice at the present time, so as to be just and the one who justifies those who have faith in Jesus."

Let's take that definition a step at a time, as John R. W. Stott does in his treatment of it in The Cross of Christ.

1. The source of our justification is the grace of God (v. 24). Since "there is no one righteous, not even one" (Rom. 3:10), it is patently clear that no one can make or "declare [himself or herself] righteous" (v. 20). How, then, is salvation possible? It is possible only if God does the work for us—which is what "grace" means, since we do not deserve God's working. As we saw earlier, Paul emphasizes this by adding the word freely to the word grace, which is redundant but nevertheless good writing.

2. The ground of our justification is the work of Christ (v. 25). We have seen this in our discussion of the words propitiation and redemption, both of which are used by Paul here (redemption in v. 24, and propitiation [KJV] in v. 25). It is because these works have been done that God is able to forgive justly.

"Justification," writes Stott, "is not a synonym for amnesty, which strictly is pardon without principle, a forgiveness which overlooks—even forgets (amnestia is 'forgetfulness')— wrongdoing and declines to bring it to justice. No, justification is an act of justice, of gracious justice.... When God justifies sinners, he is not declaring bad people to be good, or saying that they are not sinners after all; he is pronouncing them legally righteous, free from any liability to the broken law, because he himself in his Son has born the penalty of their lawbreaking.... In other words, we are 'justified by his blood.' "

I fear that this pivotal doctrine is slipping away from people today. But it was not always in such low esteem. It was precious to Charles Haddon Spurgeon, to name just one past warrior—and it was the means of his conversion. Here is how he tells it:

When I was under the hand of the Holy Spirit, under conviction of sin, I had a clear and sharp sense of the justice of God. Sin, whatever it might be to other people, became to me an intolerable burden. It was not so much that I feared hell, but that I feared sin. I knew myself to be so horribly guilty that I remember feeling that if God did not punish me for sin he ought to do so. I felt that the Judge of all the earth ought to condemn such sin as mine.... I had upon my mind a deep concern for the honor of God's name, and the integrity of his moral government. I felt that it would not satisfy my conscience if I could be forgiven unjustly. The sin I had committed must be punished. But then there was the question how God could be just, and yet justify me who had been so guilty.... I was worried and wearied with this question; neither could I see any answer to it. Certainly, I could never have invented an answer which would have satisfied my conscience.

But then, as the great Baptist preacher recounted, light dawned on his soul. He saw that "Jesus has borne the death penalty on our behalf.... Why did he suffer, if not to turn aside the penalty from us? If then, he turned it aside by his death, it is turned aside, and those who believe in him need not fear it. It must be so, that since expiation is made, God is able to forgive without shaking the basis of his throne."

It is not difficult to see that this was precisely the problem Paul was dealing with in his cryptic reference to God's leaving "the sins committed beforehand unpunished" and "to demonstrate his justice at the present time." Paul was thinking in temporal terms, acknowledging that before the incarnation and death of Christ there had been something like a stain on God's name. For centuries he had been refusing to condemn and instead had actually been justifying sinful men and women—men like Abraham, who was willing to compromise his wife's honor to save his own life; Moses, who killed an Egyptian; David, who committed adultery with Bathsheba and then murdered her husband, Uriah, to cover it up; and women like Rahab, the prostitute of Jericho. God had been saving these people. When they died he did not send them to hell. It would seem to anyone looking on that he had merely been passing over their sins—forgiving them, yes, but unjustly.

Was God unjust?

No, says Paul. In the death of Christ, God's name is vindicated. It is now seen that on the basis of his death, God had been just when he justified the ungodly (and is just when he continues to justify them).

3. The means of our justification is faith (vv. 25-26). Faith is the channel by which justification comes to us or becomes ours. This is the subject of our next study, but here we need to say at least two things.

First, faith is not a good work. It is necessary, absolutely essential. But it is not a good work. In fact, it is not a work at all. Faith is itself God's gift, as Paul makes clear in Ephesians 2:8-9. "For it is by grace you have been saved, through faith—and this not from yourselves, it is the gift of God—not by works, so that no one can boast."

Second, although faith is the means of our justification, it is also the only means. Luther expressed it by the words sola fide ("by faith alone"), thus adding a word not present in the text of Scripture but nevertheless catching the essence of the idea. Clearly, if faith is not a good work but only receiving what God has done for us and freely offers, then it is by faith alone that we can be justified—all other acts or works being excluded by definition. The only means by which any person can ever be justified is by believing God and receiving what he offers.

4. The effect of our justification is union with Christ. This idea is not stated explicitly in our passage, being held for Paul's later unfolding of the full nature of the gospel. But it does come later. It is the grounds of the benefits of salvation unfolded in Romans 5:1-11 and of our victory over sin explained in Romans 5:12-8:17.

John Stott explains it this way:

To say that we are justified "through Christ" points to his historical death; to say that we are justified "in Christ" points to the personal relationship with him which by faith we now enjoy. This simple fact makes it impossible for us to think of justification as a purely external transaction; it cannot be isolated from our union with Christ and all the benefits which this brings. The first is membership of the Messianic community of Jesus. If we are in Christ and therefore justified, we are also the children of God and the true (spiritual) descendants of Abraham.... Secondly, this new community, to create which Christ gave himself on the cross, is to be "eager to do what is good," and its members are to devote themselves to good works....

To be sure, we can say with Paul that the law condemned us. But "there is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus."

The question is—it is the third of my questions in this study—are you in Christ? Are you justified through faith in what he achieved for you at Calvary? There are many important questions in this world: Who am I? What am I here for? Where am I going? Who is God? How can I please God? But the greatest questions are: How can I become right with God, justified in his sight? And: Am I justified?

If you are not, you need to come to God as the tax collector came to him, confessing your sin and asking that he be merciful to you on the basis of Christ's atonement. Jesus said of the tax collector that "this man... went home justified before God" (Luke 18:14a). So may you be. It is that easy.

Chapter 46.
Faith

Romans 3:25-26

It is time to talk about faith. Wonderful as the salvation that has been accomplished by Jesus Christ may be, it is of no use to us unless it becomes ours personally—and the way the work of Christ becomes ours personally is through faith. That is why the Bible says, "And without faith it is impossible to please God..." (Heb. 11:6) and why the apostle Paul speaks of faith so often in the section of Romans we are now studying—eight times in verses 21 through 31.

When we began our study of this section, I suggested a four-part outline of the doctrines Paul was presenting here. The outline was not inclusive, but it indicated the general direction of the passage. The points were these: (1) God has provided a righteousness of his own for men and women, a righteousness we do not possess ourselves; (2) this righteousness is made available to us by grace; that is, we do not deserve it and in fact are incapable ever of deserving it; (3) it is the work of the Lord Jesus Christ in dying for his people, redeeming them from their sin, that has made this grace on God's part possible; and (4) the righteousness that God has graciously provided becomes ours through simple faith. In pursuing this outline we looked at the third point carefully—considering the various ways in which the work of Christ is presented to us—and this led to a study of justification, which is another way of talking about God's gift to us of his righteousness.

But we have done that, and we have now come to the fourth and last point of the outline: "The righteousness that God has graciously provided becomes ours through simple faith."

You can hardly miss this point if you read Romans 3:21-31 with care (but I will nonetheless add italics for emphasis). In those verses Paul tells us: "This righteousness of God comes through faith in Jesus Christ to all who believe" (v. 22). He says that "God presented him as a sacrifice of atonement, through faith in his blood" (v. 24). He teaches that God "justifies those who have faith in Jesus" (v. 26), maintaining that "a man is justified by faith apart from observing the law" (v. 28). Paul concludes that "there is only one God, who will justify the circumcised by faith and the uncircumcised through that same faith" (v. 30). This message is clear. Faith is not a good work. It does not earn salvation. It does not put God in debt to us. Nevertheless, faith is essential, for only those who believe on Jesus Christ are saved.

What Is Faith?

What exactly is faith? There have been many attempts to define faith, some of them misleading. Here are several good ones.

First, a definition by John Calvin: "We shall possess a right definition of faith if we call it a firm and certain knowledge of God's benevolence toward us, founded upon the truth of the freely given promise in Christ, both revealed to our minds and sealed upon our hearts through the Holy Spirit." Calvin emphasizes what is stated by Paul in Romans, namely, that true faith is in God's freely offered salvation through the work of Christ. But he adds, as Paul suggests in Ephesians 2:8-10 though not in Romans 3, that this is the work of the Holy Spirit in us.

Here is another definition—by Charles Haddon Spurgeon: "Faith is believing that Christ is what he is said to be. and that he will do what he has promised to do, and then to expect this of him."

I like that definition, but I remember something Spurgeon said in the chapter of All of Grace in which he provides it. He told of an uneducated preacher who read a chapter of the Bible to his people at the start of his sermon and then said that he was going to "confound" it. He meant "expound" it. But Spurgeon noted that there is always danger of doing that where faith is concerned. We can explain it until no one understands it. "Faith is the simplest of all things," he said. It is perhaps its very simplicity that makes it so hard to comprehend.

How can we explain faith? How can we make the very complex definitions of the textbooks manageable?

The First Element: Knowledge

Most theologians and Bible teachers divide faith into three parts: "knowledge, belief and trust" or

"awareness, assent and commitment" or some variation of those ideas. But, in nearly every case, the point with which they begin is "knowledge of the truth" or what I call "content." Faith without content is no true faith at all.

Of the writers on faith, Calvin is perhaps strongest on this point, for he found it necessary to oppose a very serious error about faith that had developed in the teaching of the medieval church. In the years before the Reformation the church had been derelict in teaching the Scriptures to the people. Consequently, most people were ignorant of the true gospel of salvation, and most clergy were ignorant of it also. How, then, were such ignorant communicants to be saved? The church answered that it was by "implicit" faith. That is, it was not necessary for the faithful actually to know anything. All they had to do was trust the church implicitly. The church and its teachings were right, even if its members did not know what those right teachings were, and they would be all right, too, if they just believed or trusted the church.

The situation reminds me of a contemporary story in which a man was being interviewed by a group of church officers before being taken into membership. They asked him what he believed about salvation, and he replied that he believed what the church believed.

"But what does the church believe?" they probed.

"The church believes what I believe," he answered.

The committee was a bit exasperated by this time. But they tried again: "Just what do you and the church believe?"

The man thought this over for a moment and then replied, "We believe the same thing."

The situation was not unlike that of most people in the Middle Ages. So this was what Calvin attacked. He argued that "the object of faith is Christ" and that "faith rests upon knowledge, not upon pious ignorance." Calvin wrote, "We do not obtain salvation either because we are prepared to embrace as true whatever the church has prescribed, or because we turn over to it the task of inquiring and knowing. But we do so when we know that God is our merciful Father, because of reconciliation effected through Christ (2 Cor. 5:18, 19), and that Christ has been given to us as righteousness, sanctification and life. By this knowledge, I say, not by submission of our feeling, do we obtain entry into the Kingdom of Heaven."

This ancient debate has bearing upon the "faith" of many persons today, for although many probably do not exercise "implicit" faith in the church or in any other authority, they seem to have implicit faith in themselves or merely "faith in faith," which turns out to be almost the same thing.

The greatest offender at this point is Norman Vincent Peale, who has popularized a subjective faith in his best-selling book The Power of Positive Thinking. He suggests that we collect a few of the Bible's strong statements about faith—statements like "All things are possible to him who believes" (Mark 9:23) and "If you have faith as a grain of mustard seed, you will say to this mountain, 'Move from here to there,' and it will move; nothing will be impossible to you" (Matt. 17:20)—memorize them and then let them sink down into our subconscious minds and transform us. In this way, says Peale, we will become believers in God and in ourselves: "According to your faith in yourself, according to your faith in your job, according to your faith in God, thus far will you get and no further." His last words are: "So believe and live successfully."

But believe what? And believe whom?

The advice Peale gives may be very useful for a salesman or for a person who is worried about doing well at school or at work. But this is not biblical faith. It is, as John Stott notes, only another word for "self-confidence" or "optimism."

To anyone who thinks that faith in God is roughly the same thing as faith in his or her job success or in oneself, the Christian must reply that this is not so. If it were, the object of faith would be irrelevant. But in the gospel the object of faith is the all important thing. Our faith must be in Christ and his work rather than in ourselves. We are inadequate for what needs to be done. Therefore, we must trust Christ, whom God has sent to be the Savior.

Faith and the Word of God

In his Institutes of the Christian Religion, Calvin is so concerned about stressing the importance of knowledge as the first element in faith that he rightly presents it in another way, showing the necessary link between faith and the Word of God, or the Bible. Reduced to its basics, Calvin shows that: (1) faith is defined by God's Word; (2) faith is born of God's Word; and (3) faith is sustained by God's Word.

The first of these points is particularly clear in Romans 3. For Paul speaks of faith after having spoken of the righteousness of God (that is, the gospel) "to which the Law and the Prophets testify" (v. 21). It is after this that he says, "This righteousness from God comes through faith in Jesus Christ to all who believe" (v. 22). In other words, the faith in Christ about which he is speaking is faith in that work of Christ previously revealed in and explained by the Old Testament. It has this specific content. It is not nebulous. Moreover—lest we miss this—the next chapter of Romans proves that the way of salvation was disclosed in the cases of Abraham and David who, Paul says, were saved by the same faith with which we are saved. He cites Genesis 15:6 and Psalm 32:1-2 as evidence.

There cannot be any true faith without the Word of God, for it is in the Word alone that we learn what we are to believe. Calvin says, "There is [therefore] a permanent relationship between faith and the Word.... Take away the Word and no faith will then remain."

The second way in which faith is linked to the Word of God is that faith is created, born, or awakened in us by that Word. Apart from the Word, we are like Lazarus—as dead in our transgressions as he was dead in his cold Judean tomb. What will awaken us from that sleep of death? Nothing but the voice of Christ calling to us: "John, come forth!...

Mary, come forth!... Charles, come forth!" Only the call of the life-giving God can produce such new life. But where can we hear that call? Not in the words of mere men or women. Not in human books. The only place we can hear it is in the pages of the Bible, where alone God speaks.

That is why Peter speaks of our being "born again, not of perishable seed, but of imperishable, through the living and enduring word of God" (1 Peter 1:23).

The third link between faith and the Bible is that it is through the Bible that faith is strengthened or sustained. Why? Because the Bible directs us to God and his promises, and only God is strong enough to support us in this matter of salvation. Calvin says, "Therefore, if faith turns away even in the slightest degree from this goal toward which it should aim, it does not keep its own nature, but becomes uncertain credulity and vague error of mind." The conclusion is that if you wish to be strong in faith and grow in it, you must spend time studying the Bible and appropriating the promises of God that are found there.

The Second Element: Moving of the Heart

The second element in true biblical faith is what I call the "moving of the heart" or what others have called "belief (Spurgeon) or "assent" (Lloyd-Jones). The idea here is that, important as the biblical content of faith is and which Calvin stressed so strongly, it is nevertheless possible to know this content and yet be lost—if it has not touched the individual personally. An example is the devil, who undoubtedly knows the Bible and understands theology better than we do, yet who does not believe it in this fuller sense. "Even the demons believe" but "shudder" (James 2:19).

The best example of what this second element in faith means comes from the conversion of John Wesley, the great evangelist. This took place in May 1738. Wesley had been an active preacher and evangelist for years before this. He knew Christian doctrine, but it had not affected him at a genuinely personal level. Although he "believed" in a sense, he did not really love Christ or trust him personally. However, one evening he went to a little meeting in Aldersgate Street in London, where someone was reading Luther's "Preface" (actually a sermon) to the Epistle to the Romans. Here is what happened, as Wesley tells it: "About a quarter before nine, while he was describing the change which God works in the heart through faith in Christ, I felt my heart strangely warmed. I felt I did trust in Christ, Christ alone for my salvation. And an assurance was given me that he had taken away my sins, even mine, and saved me from the law of sin and death." Some might argue that Wesley had been saved before this and only came to know it at this point. That may be the case, but Wesley testified that this "warming of the heart" was an important part of what is meant by trusting Christ.

Here is how Calvin put it—after a long section (forty out of fifty pages on "faith") dealing with the element of knowledge or content: "It now remains to pour into the heart itself what the mind has absorbed. For the Word of God is not received by faith if it flits about in the top of the brain, but when it takes root in the depth of the heart that it may be an invincible defense to withstand and drive off all the stratagems of temptation."

The Third Element: Commitment

The third element of faith, which Spurgeon calls "trust" and Lloyd-Jones calls "commitment," is a real yielding of oneself to Christ, which goes beyond having knowledge, however full or accurate, or even being personally moved by the gospel. (Many are moved, even to tears, but are not saved.) It is the point at which we pass over the line from belonging to ourselves (as we think) and become the Lord's disciples. It is what was seen in Thomas when he not only believed in Jesus and his resurrection but fell at his feet in worship, exclaiming, "My Lord and my God!" (John 20:28).

It is at this point that faith joins hands with love, which it closely resembles, and hope is born from that union.

This leads me to the best of all possible illustrations: the way in which a young man and a young woman meet, fall in love, and get married. The first stages of their courtship correspond to the first element in faith; that is, knowledge or content. At this stage each is getting to know the other and trying to determine whether the other is the kind of person whose qualities will contribute to a good and lasting marriage. The second stage is falling in love. It corresponds to the "moving of the heart" element, that is, to the point at which the other person begins to affect the lover in a personal and usually emotional way. The final stage comes when the couple stands in church before the minister and recites the vows by which they pledge themselves to one another.

Jesus pledges himself to us; he has already done it. We pledge ourselves to him through the third element of faith: commitment.

In the wedding service that I use, the vows go: "I, John, take thee, Mary, to be my wedded wife; and I do promise and covenant, before God and these witnesses, to be thy loving and faithful husband: in plenty and in want, in joy and in sorrow, in sickness and in health, as long as we both shall live." The bride says the same words back.

This is how our faith is expressed to Jesus Christ. He died for us, demonstrating the nature of his true love and sterling character. He wooed us, getting us to love him who first loved us. Now he takes the wedding vow, saying, "I, Jesus, take thee, [whoever you may be; put your own name in the space], to be my wedded wife; and I do promise and covenant, before God the Father and these witnesses, to be thy loving and faithful Savior and Bridegroom: in plenty and in want, in joy and in sorrow, in sickness and in health, in this life and for all eternity."

We then look up into his face and repeat the words. "I, [whoever you are; add your own name], take thee, Jesus, to be my loving Savior and Lord; and I do promise and covenant, before God the Father and these witnesses, to be thy loving and faithful wife: in plenty and in want, in joy and in sorrow, in sickness and in health, for this life and for all eternity."

God the Father (not an earthly minister) then pronounces the marriage, and you become the Lord Jesus Christ's forever.

Have you done that? Have you believed on Jesus Christ? Do you love him? Do you know yourself to have been made his forever?

You may say, "Well, I do not know if I have or not."

If you do not know, settle the matter right now. For most wedding services today there are months of preparation during which a church and minister are selected, a guest list is drawn up, clothes are purchased, a license is procured, and many other details are handled. But nothing remains to be done before you are able to make your commitment to Christ. He has done it all. The Father is there. The wedding is prepared. All you must do now is say your vow to him. You must believe and follow Jesus.

Perhaps you say, "But I am unworthy."

Of course you are. How could anybody possibly be worthy of the love of the Lord Jesus Christ?
All are unworthy, but it is precisely your awareness of your unworthiness that makes it possible for you to know you need a Savior. Paul reminds us that God has shown "his love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:8).

Now you might say, "But my faith is so weak."

Yes, and your love and hope and everything else are weak, too. But it does not take strong faith to be saved, just faith. Spurgeon wrote, "The weakness of your faith will not destroy you. A trembling hand may receive a golden gift."

Reach out your hand. Place it in that pierced hand that is stretched out to you. Clasp it to your heart, and love Jesus forever.

Chapter 47.

Faith in His Blood

Romans 3:25

In the last few studies we have explored the multifaceted salvation achieved for us by Jesus Christ, looking at it by such terms as propitiation, redemption, and justification, and showing its application to us through saving faith. But there is one phrase we have overlooked and to which we must now return: "in his blood." It occurs in Romans 3:25: "God presented him as a sacrifice of atonement, through faith in his blood." This is the key idea and yet one of the most opposed ideas in Romans 3.

Opposition to the words is obvious. A number of years ago I was preaching about the atonement and mentioned the blood of Jesus Christ in my sermon. When I had finished I was accosted by a man who was very antagonistic toward such teaching. "Why are you Fundamentalists always talking about the blood of Jesus?" he objected. "Why do you wallow in something so repulsive?" He felt—and his later comments expressed it energetically—that modern Christianity should forget about such ancient concepts and focus instead on things like God's beauty. We should do away with hymns like Robert Lowry's "What can wash away my sin? Nothing but the blood of Jesus." Or William Cowper's "There is a fountain filled with blood Drawn from Immanuel's veins...." According to this man and those who think like him, these hymns are not worthy of "modern" Christianity.

Are they correct in their opinion? I hope to show that not only are they incorrect, but in taking this view they actually miss the very heart of Christianity.

An "Evangelical" Error

Before I do that, however, I need to mention another problem that has arisen with the word blood—not from so-called modernists but from people within the evangelical camp. Evangelicals have traditionally believed that the phrase "blood of Christ" is a way of talking about the death of Christ, much like the word cross. But the troublesome view I am referring to maintains that Christ's blood stands not for his death but for his life, which was released through his death and thus made available to us.

The idea seems to have originated—of all places—in a work by the great English churchman Brooke Foss Westcott, The Epistles of St. John. Westcott wrote:

The blood is the seat of life in such a sense that it can be spoken of directly as the life itself.... By the outpouring of the blood the life which was in it was not destroyed, though it was separated from the organism which it had before quickened.... Thus two distinct ideas were included in the sacrifice of a victim, the death of the victim by the shedding of its blood, and the liberation, so to speak, of the principle of life by which it had been animated, so that this life became available for another end.

After Westcott, the idea was picked up by a number of other British Bible scholars, among them Vincent Taylor, C. H. Dodd, and P. T. Forsyth.

What are the grounds for this view? The biblical basis, as Westcott noted in his commentary, is in Leviticus 17:11, "For the life of a creature is in the blood" and Deuteronomy 12:23, "The blood is the life." Unfortunately, these texts do not mean what the proponents of this rather eccentric view suppose.

Beginning with James Denney's The Death of Christ, published originally in 1902 but issued many times since, a number of very careful studies of the use of the word blood in Scripture have appeared, including: (1) H. E. Guillebaud, "The Meaning of the Blood of Christ" in Why the Cross? , (2) Alan M. Stibbs, The Meaning of the Word "Blood" in Scripture , and (3) Leon Morris, "The Blood" in The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross. These studies recognize the scriptural connection between "blood" and "life." But, as Guillebaud says, "Blood is never mentioned except in connection with the shedding of it, or with the use of it after it has been shed.... The blood shed is the life poured out, and the poured out life may be used only for atonement."

Morris says about the same thing: "In both the Old and New Testaments the blood signifies essentially the death.... [It is] another, clearer expression for the death of Christ in its salvation meaning."

Salvation by Substitution

If you have never heard of the mistaken notion examined above, do not worry about it at all. Dismiss it from your mind. The important thing is to remember that the shedding of Christ's blood has to do with Christ's death, and that the death of Christ in Scripture is always and everywhere set forth as substitutionary. It is by his death that you and I can be saved.

I have referred several times to John R. W. Stott's fine study of The Cross of Christ. It is an achievement of this work that, although it thoroughly investigates the biblical images for the meaning of the death of Jesus Christ, it never forgets that the basic idea in every single one of them is substitution—and that by the shedding of Christ's blood.

Let us consider each of the pertinent doctrines once more:

1. Propitiation. We have already noted that propitiation has to do with turning aside the wrath of God against sin. But how is that to be accomplished? God's wrath is against sin, and God's justice demands the death of sinners. The soul that sins must die. If the sinner is to escape that fierce wrath of God, the judgment of God upon sin must be poured out upon a substitute. An innocent must die in the guilty person's place. This is what Jesus did for us, and it is why Paul introduces the phrase "in his blood" at this particular place in Romans: "God presented him as a sacrifice of atonement through faith in his blood." Since "sacrifice of atonement" is the New International Version's rendering of "propitiation," the phrase "faith in his blood" in this verse means "faith in his propitiation" or "faith in the atonement."

When we studied "propitiation" I pointed out that the concept is linked to the Mercy Seat of the Ark of the Covenant and that propitiation was made in Israel when the high priest sprinkled the blood of a slain animal between the symbolic presence of God above the Mercy Seat of the Ark and the law of God within the Ark below it. The blood testified to the substitutionary death of the victim.

It is with this in mind that the author of Hebrews writes, "When Christ came as high priest of the good things that are already here, he went through the greater and more perfect tabernacle that is not man-made, that is to say, not a part of this creation. He did not enter by means of the blood of goats and calves; but he entered the Most Holy Place once for all by his own blood, having obtained eternal redemption. The blood of goats and bulls and the ashes of a heifer sprinkled on those who are ceremonially unclean sanctify them so that they are outwardly clean. How much more, then, will the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself unblemished to God, cleanse our consciences from acts that lead to death, so that we may serve the living God!" (Heb. 9:11-14).

2. Redemption. The idea of blood (and therefore also of death and substitution) is present in references to redemption, too. Redemption has to do with purchasing the sinner from sin's slavery so that he or she does not have to return to sin's marketplace. How is this to be accomplished? Sinners have no resources by which to purchase their redemption. All sinners are bankrupt. Not so the Lord. The Lord is infinitely rich. So he substitutes for us, purchasing our redemption by his own death, or "blood." Here are some pertinent texts (in which I have italicized the key words):

Ephesians 1:7-8: "In him we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, in accordance with the riches of God's grace that he lavished on us with all wisdom and understanding."

Acts 20:28: "Keep watch over yourselves and all the flock of which the Holy Spirit has made you overseers. Be shepherds of the church of God, which he bought with his own blood."

Above all, 1 Peter 1:18-19: "For you know that it was not with perishable things such as silver or gold that you were redeemed from the empty way of life handed down to you from your forefathers, but with the precious blood of Christ, a lamb without blemish or defect."

3. Justification. Justification, as we have seen, is a legal term, denoting the act by which a judge declares a defendant to be in a right standing before the prevailing law. But here the judge is God. We are the defendants. We want to be declared right before God's holy law. Yet we are not right. We are violators of God's law. How can we be "justified"—declared right? Obviously, only if another makes things right, which is what Jesus has done for us by his death. This is why two chapters further on in Romans we find Paul writing, "We have now been justified by his blood" (Rom. 5:9). It is by Jesus' substitutionary death and the propitiation achieved by it that we are justified.

Here is the way John Stott puts it in his summary, referring to redemption, propitiation, justification, and reconciliation (which we have not yet studied in detail since it is not included in Romans 3:21-31):

All four images plainly teach that God's saving work was achieved through the bloodshedding, that is, the substitutionary sacrifice of Christ.... Since Christ's blood is a symbol of his life laid down in violent death, it is also plain in each of the four images that he died in our place as our substitute. The death of Jesus was the atoning sacrifice because of which God averted his wrath from us, the ransom-price by which we have been redeemed, the condemnation of the innocent that the guilty might be justified, and the sinless One being made sin for us.

Where Is the Lamb?

These ideas are so foreign to the thinking of most modern people that it is a difficult matter even to make them comprehensible. But it was not always so. I want you to see in closing that they were actually the steadfast, earnest, and joyful expectation of Old Testament believers, leading up to the coming of Jesus Christ.

To make my point I take you to a question recorded in a passage quite near the beginning of the Bible. Genesis 22 contains the story of Abraham's near-sacrifice of his only son, Isaac, on Mount Moriah, which was a picture of the eventual sacrifice of God's own Son Jesus at that very location several thousand years later. I direct you to it because of the exchange that took place between Abraham and his son while they were making their way up the mountain. Isaac was carrying the wood for the sacrifice. Abraham was carrying the fire and knife. Isaac noticed that there was no animal for the sacrifice.

"Father?" he said.

"Yes, my son," answered Abraham.

"The fire and wood are here," Isaac said. "But where is the lamb for the burnt offering?"

Abraham answered, "God himself will provide the lamb for the burnt offering, my son" (vv. 7-8).

I refer to this exchange because the question asked by Isaac was the most profound question anyone could have asked during the Old Testament period. Indeed, it must have been the chief question of the Old Testament saints. In the same way during this same period, the answer of Abraham was the most profound answer anyone could have given. Think it through with me:

When Adam and Eve sinned in the Garden of Eden, eating from the tree that God had told them not to eat from, God came to them—not to judge them with immediate death as he had said he would, but to show them the way of salvation. He took two animals, probably lambs, killed and skinned them and then clothed our first parents with the fresh skins. Adam, who was probably great in his spiritual understanding, no doubt saw the point immediately. The fact that the animals died showed that sin does indeed bring death. "For the wages of sin is death..." (Rom. 6:23). But it also showed that it is possible to have a substitute die in the sinner's place.

Moreover, God promised a deliverer in his judgment on the serpent: "And I will put enmity between you and the woman, and between your offspring and hers; he will crush your head, and you will strike his heel" (Gen. 3:15).

Combining the two revelations, Adam must have reasoned along these lines. "I understand what God is teaching. The principle is substitution, the death of one for another. But I also understand that this can only be a type or symbol of what is coming, since a lamb is not the equivalent of a human being. The death of a lamb does not atone for the sin of a rational man or woman. If a genuine salvation is to be achieved for us, an actual deliverer must come. But when? When will he come?" Adam might well have asked Isaac's question: "Where is the lamb for the burnt offering?"

Abraham was not present on that occasion, of course. But if he had been, he could have answered exactly as he answered Isaac so many years later: "God himself will provide the lamb for the burnt offering." He would have meant, "I do not know when God will do it; but he has promised to do it, and he will certainly send the true lamb at the right time."

I press ahead through the centuries and come to Moses, another great man of God. When God was about to lead the people of Israel out of Egypt into their own land, he passed through Pharaoh's kingdom with one final plague, striking down the firstborn. Only the Jews were spared this fierce judgment, and then only if they had first killed a lamb and had sprinkled its blood upon the doorposts and lintels of their homes. Again, when they had been taken from Egypt and been brought to Mount Sinai, God gave instructions for the Day of Atonement, indicating that on that day other animals were to be killed as sacrifices for the people.

Moses must have understood these symbols, too, just as Adam must have understood the symbols given to him in the garden. If not, there would have been no point in God's having supplied the revelations. But Moses might still have asked Isaac's question. "I understand the principle of substitution," he might have testified. "Animals are being killed in our place. But surely the blood of bulls and goats can never take away sin. The animals point ahead to something finer and more lasting. They point to the true lamb, the great lamb. But where is the lamb for the burnt offering?"

Again, if Abraham had been present, he could have replied, "God himself will provide the lamb for the burnt offering."

David, too, could have asked Isaac's question. He understood the principle of substitution. When he sinned in regard to Bathsheba and later confessed his sin and wrote the great fifty-first Psalm as a pointer to the path to salvation, he put down: "Cleanse me with hyssop, and I will be clean; wash me, and I will be whiter than snow" (v. 7). Hyssop was the plant used by priests to dip into the blood of the sacrifice to sprinkle its blood. So when David wrote, "Cleanse me with hyssop," he was pleading salvation by the blood of the sacrifice. Still, he could have queried its relevance: "I recognize that God has appointed sacrifice as the way of cleansing. But surely a mere lamb does not take away sin. It points to something greater. Where is that greater sacrifice? Where is the lamb for the burnt offering?"

Abraham would have answered, "God himself, in his own time, will provide the lamb for the burnt offering."

Isaiah could have asked Isaac's question, although his prophecy included the greatest statement of the principle of substitutionary sacrifice, or vicarious atonement, in all the Bible: Isaiah 53.

> Surely he took up our infirmities and carried our sorrows, > yet we considered him stricken by God, smitten by him, and afflicted.

> But he was pierced for our transgressions, he was crushed for our iniquities;
> the punishment that brought us peace was upon him, and by his wounds we are healed.
> We all, like sheep, have gone astray, each of us has turned to his own way;
> and the LORD has laid on him the iniquity of us all.
>
> (vv. 4-6)

Still, he might have asked—indeed, in one sense that chapter does ask—"Where is the lamb for the burnt offering?"

Abraham would have answered, "God will provide a lamb for the burnt offering."

Jeremiah, Hosea, Habakkuk, Zechariah, Malachi—all the prophets—could have asked this question. And at the time of Jesus there were other faithful people who were asking it, people like Simeon (Luke 2:25-35) and Anna the prophetess, both of whom represented those who were looking for "the redemption of Jerusalem" (Luke 2:38).

"Behold the Lamb"

At last there came a day—the fourth gospel writer tells us about it—when John the Baptist was baptizing by the Jordan River and a relative of his from the north, a man named Jesus, walked by. John, instructed by the Holy Spirit, pointed to Jesus and declared, "Look, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world!" (John 1:29).

What is that you said, John? Did you say, "Lamb of God"? Are you telling us that the sacrificial lamb we have been looking for and waiting for all these long centuries has come? Has the one who will save us by the shedding of his blood finally arrived on this earth? John answered that this is exactly what he said and that this is indeed the case.

Three short years later, while tens of thousands of lambs were being driven to Jerusalem for Passover, probably in the year a.d. 30, Jesus himself went up to the city on the day we call Palm Sunday. Later that week, at the precise moment when the Passover lambs were being killed, Jesus died in our place, shedding his blood for our salvation.

The world does not like the very idea of the "blood of Jesus," and it is not surprising. His blood represents that for which we have the most extreme aversion: salvation from someone else, the sacrificial death of another in our place. We want to save ourselves, to be our own saviors. But we cannot save ourselves. If we are to be saved at all, it must be by faith in that sacrifice.

"What can wash away my sin?"

It may not be great poetry, but Lowry's hymn answers truthfully and conclusively when it says, "Nothing but the blood of Jesus."

Chapter 48.
No Grounds for Boasting

Romans 3:27-28

In most modern translations of the Bible, the New International Version included, Romans 3:27 begins a new paragraph—and rightly so. The section it introduces (vv. 27-31) is part of the latter half of the third chapter, in which the way of salvation is fully and brilliantly expounded. But it is also a postscript to verses 21-26. The earlier verses, the first paragraph, tell of the plan God has devised to save men and women. It is by the work of the Lord Jesus Christ, and can be summed up in the words "justification by grace through faith alone." The next five verses, which make up a second paragraph, present three consequences or implications of this plan.

The first is that this way of salvation "by grace through faith" excludes boasting.

The second is that it provides one way of salvation for everybody.

The third is that, far from allowing a person to indulge in immorality or lawbreaking, as some suppose, it actually upholds the law. God's way of salvation provides a level of morality of which mere adherents to law, apart from the grace of God in the gospel, cannot even dream.

These three consequences of the doctrine of justification by grace through faith will occupy us in this and the next two studies, which conclude the section of my commentary I have called "God's Remedy in Christ."

The Greatest of All Sins

It is appropriate that the first implication of the doctrine of justification by faith concerns boasting. For boasting is related to pride—it is an expression of it—and pride is the greatest of all sins, according to biblical Christianity. If pride is the greatest of all sins and God's plan of salvation does not destroy pride—rooting it up, casting it out, and even dusting off the place where it stood—then it is not a good plan. It has failed, and we need a faith other than Christianity.

In the Middle Ages pride was identified by churchmen as the first of the seven deadly sins. This evaluation seems quaint and overstated today. But pride should never be thought of as a harmless flaw, because pride is actually quite deadly.

I do not know of anybody who has written more perceptively about pride in modern times than C. S. Lewis, so let me share a bit of what he had to say on this topic. Lewis begins by calling pride the place where Christian morality differs most sharply from all other moral systems:

There is one vice of which no man in the world is free; which everyone in the world loathes when he sees it in someone else; and of which hardly any people, except Christians, ever imagine that they are guilty themselves. I have heard people admit that they are bad-tempered, or that they cannot keep their heads about girls or drink, or even that they are cowards. I do not think I have ever heard anyone who was not a Christian accuse himself of this vice. And at the same time I have very seldom met anyone, who was not a Christian, who showed the slightest mercy to it in others. There is no fault which makes a man more unpopular, and no fault which we are more unconscious of in ourselves. And the more we have it ourselves, the more we dislike it in others. The vice I am talking of is Pride.

That is self-evidently true. But it is also a strange thing, isn't it? Why are we so unconscious of this vice in ourselves? And why do we hate in others that of which we are all so guilty?

The answer is in the very nature of pride. Lewis described pride as:

essentially competitive—competitive by its very nature—while the other vices are competitive only, so to speak, by accident. Pride gets no pleasure out of having something, only out of having more of it than the next man. We say that people are proud of being rich, or clever, or goodlooking, but they are not. They are proud of being richer, or cleverer, or better-looking than others. If everyone else became equally rich, or clever, or good-looking there would be nothing to be proud about. It is the comparison that makes you proud: the pleasure of being above the rest....

The Christians are right: it is Pride which has been the chief cause of misery in every nation and every family since the world began. Other vices may sometimes bring people together: you may find good fellowship and jokes and friendliness among drunken people or unchaste people. But Pride always means enmity—it is enmity. And not only enmity between man and man, but enmity to God.

Pride was the very first sin. It was the sin of Satan, who said,

> "I will ascend to heaven;
> I will raise my throne above the stars of God;
> I will sit enthroned on the mount of assembly, on the utmost heights of the sacred mountain.
> I will ascend above the tops of the clouds;
> I will make myself like the Most High."
>
> Isaiah 14:13-14

Pride made Satan want to ascend into heaven to the very throne of God, but the Bible says it actually brought him "down to the grave, to the depths of the pit" (v. 15).

Pride was the sin of Eve, who wanted to "be like God, knowing good and evil" (Gen. 3:5). But she did not rise up to become like God. Instead she became like Satan in her perverted and fallen knowledge.

Pride was the sin of Adam, who could not abide even the slightest restriction on his quest for complete autonomy. He could not stand God's law. Adam wanted to be a law unto himself; so he sinned and brought the entire human race into misery.

Pride in Religion

Where in the range of human experience and relationships is pride most evident and at the same time most clearly wrong and inappropriate? Is it in the sphere of daily work? Do we show our pride most in thinking of ourselves as better than other people in what we make or do? Is it in our social relationships? Do we show pride most by thinking that we are more sophisticated or more charming than someone else? Is the person who wants to be the center of attention at the New Year's Eve party the most prideful of the persons we know?

No, the sphere of life in which people show the most pride is religion. And there is a good reason for this. Religion—not true Christianity, but religion in the generic sense—is the ultimate setting for the very worst expressions of pride. For it is in religion alone that we are able to claim that God, and not mere human beings, sets his approval on us as superior to other human beings. Moreover, the more demanding or rigorous our "religion" is, the more prideful we become.

Do we need an example? The Lord Jesus Christ provided one when he compared the humility of the tax collector, who was saved by faith in the mercy of God made known in the sacrifices, with the pride of the Pharisee, who boasted of his goodness: "God, I thank you that I am not like other men—robbers, evildoers, adulterers—or even like this tax collector. I fast twice a week and give a tenth of all I get" (Luke 18:11-12). What is the problem here? Was the Pharisee lying? Was he only pretending to give a tenth of all he had to God when actually, like lying Ananias and Sapphira, he was keeping back a part? I do not think so. As mentioned in a previous study, I think he really did fast twice a week. I think he really did give a tenth of all he received to the temple. By outward standards he was significantly superior to the despised tax collector, who even admitted that he was a "sinner" needing mercy.

But that is just it, you see. If the Pharisee had merely been asking a fellow human to appraise his achievements and declare him superior to the tax collector, it would have been unpleasant and perhaps inappropriate. But it could have been done. If we were being asked our opinion, we might have agreed with the Pharisee's assessment—but with a very bad taste in our mouths. We would have acknowledged it but disliked it, without even knowing why.

But the Pharisee was not asking a mere human being for approval. He was demanding it of God. And if it is unpleasant and inappropriate to think of submitting one's pride to a human tribunal, it is infinitely more unpleasant and inappropriate—a horror—to think of expecting the holy God to endorse one's own self-inflated judgment. Before God—if he could ever have become truly aware of God—the Pharisee's attainments would have faded away to nothing and he would have seen himself as no different from the tax collector. The fact that he did not see himself as a sinner in need of mercy shows that he did not actually know God at all.

Here is the way Lewis puts it:

How is it that people who are quite obviously eaten up with Pride can say that they believe in God and appear to themselves very religious? I am afraid it means they are worshiping an imaginary God. They theoretically admit themselves to be nothing in the presence of this phantom God, but are really all the time imagining how he approves of them and thinks them far better than ordinary people: that is, they pay a pennyworth of imaginary humility to him and get out of it a pound's worth of Pride towards their fellow-men....

Whenever we find that our religious life is making us feel that we are good—above all, that we are better than someone else—I think we may be sure that we are being acted on, not by God, but by the devil. The real test of being in the presence of God is that you either forget about yourself altogether or see yourself as a small, dirty object. It is better to forget about yourself altogether.

A Boast-Free Gospel

But how can we possibly forget about ourselves—we who are so filled with pride? It is the very nature of pride to do the opposite. The answer is that in ourselves we cannot. That is what being saved by grace means; it means that we cannot save ourselves. We are no more able to save ourselves or forget about ourselves than are other human beings. But we are enabled to forget about ourselves when God turns our attention to Jesus, who died for us and binds the whole of our hope and life to him through faith.

Which brings us to our Romans 3 text: "Where, then, is boasting? It is excluded. On what principle? On that of observing the law? No, but on that of faith. For we maintain that a man is justified by faith apart from observing the law" (vv. 27-28). Salvation by grace is the one doctrine that undercuts all boasting.

Think of the possible grounds for boasting that the doctrine of salvation by grace has "excluded."

1. Morality. The chief ground on which people suppose they can save themselves is morality, the doing of good things. If they believe that they are saved by this, and others are not similarly saved, they believe that they are approved by God because they are better people. That was the case with the Pharisee, as well as with certain "religious" people today. They look upon religion as the ultimate arena for human achievement. Others—they are very proud here—can achieve in business and gain the acclaim of entrepreneurs and others in high finance. Or they earn accolades in art or literature or an academic field. Ah, but to be acclaimed by God! That is the greatest prize of all. So these people draw up their own little systems of morality, scrupulously adhere to their own sets of laws, and expect God to praise them. They fast and tithe and pray and do "good works" and suppose that by doing those things they become good people—good enough for God to save them—while others, who do not do them, are not good enough and so (quite rightly, they think) perish.

Salvation through the work of Christ undercuts all that. For not even the best of our righteousness can be righteous enough. In fact, it is worse than "not good enough." It is actually evil, for it feeds the pride that lies at the heart of the evil in us all.

Over pride in morality, the Bible writes: "'There is no one righteous, not even one.... All have turned away, they have together become worthless; There is no one who does good, not even one'" (Rom. 3:10, 12).

2. Pious feelings. In past ages people worried about doing good, and for them the danger of trusting in one's morality was very great. People really did think that they could be saved by being better than other people. This has changed somewhat today, along with our declining standards of morality, and it is far more likely now that a person might have pride in his or her feelings. "I have such warm thoughts about God whenever I come to church," such a person might say. "I know I am not a very moral person. But my heart is so tender. I feel so close to God. At times tears even come to my eyes. Surely God must save such a sensitive person as myself."

Must he? If he "must," salvation is not of grace. It is a matter of debt or works. But since, as Romans tells us, salvation is not of good works, it is certain that no one will be saved by pious feelings.

Charles Haddon Spurgeon once wrote on this point:

Souls, souls, this is work-mongering in its most damnable shape, for it has deluded far more than that bolder sort of work-trusting, which says,

"I will rely upon what I do." If you rely upon what you feel, you shall as certainly perish as if you trust to what you do. Repentance is a blessed work of grace, and to be convinced of sin by God the Holy Ghost is a holy privilege, but to think that these in any way win salvation, is to run clean counter to all the teachings of the Word, for salvation is of the free grace of God alone.

Over pride in pious feelings, the Bible writes: "'[There is]... no one who seeks God'" (Rom. 3:11).

3. Knowledge. Some people think that they are going to be saved by their superior religious knowledge and take pride from that. They are not particularly moral or even especially sensitive people. But they know a great deal of doctrine and have a very sound creed. How could God possibly condemn them when they understand the doctrine of the Trinity so well and when they talk or even teach for hours on such themes as redemption, propitiation, justification, the atonement, election, faith, and perseverance? How can God reject them when they have spent the best years of their lives in Sunday school or memorized "The Westminster Shorter Catechism" or mastered the lists of the kings of Israel?

Ah, but no one will be saved by mere knowledge. Although knowledge is a part of faith, knowledge is not faith itself. The devil understands doctrine far better than we do, yet he is perishing. Besides, if we are not born again, we do not know God (which is what counts) even if we have such knowledge.

Over pride in our knowledge, the Bible writes: "'There is no one who understands.... There is no fear of God before their eyes.'" (Rom. 3:11, 18)

4. Faith. The most pernicious ground of all for human boasting is faith. This is a particular danger for the evangelical. For the most part the evangelical knows that he (or she) is not saved by works—he has been taught that since his youth. Usually he does not trust in his feelings, though he thinks rather highly of them. He is even > willing to give up on extensive biblical knowledge or sound doctrine as ground for his hope. But it is entirely different with faith. Faith is the distinguishing mark of the evangelical. So even though he has been taught there is to be no boasting in heaven, and even though he does not want to boast—and it really pains him to do so—when pressed in his doctrine the evangelical will admit that in the final analysis the reason he is going to be in heaven, and another person is not, is that he believed God and trusted Jesus while those who are perishing spurned him.

Sometimes evangelicals express their ideas in the following fashion. They say that God first gave the law to see if anyone could keep it. But since no one did or can, God now comes to us with a slimmed-down or much-facilitated gospel, as if he were saying: "I know you can't keep my law. So let me ask instead for something you can do. Just believe in Jesus. If you believe in Jesus, I'll save you."

I am sure that by now you can see clearly what is wrong with that idea. If that is the way God operates, faith becomes a work—something you or I do on the basis of which we are saved—and there is ground for boasting. We may not want to boast. But if we are in heaven a million years from now and someone comes up to us and asks why we are there and another person is not, and if we are pressed about it, we will have to admit that we are there because we had faith and the other person had none. Faith is our distinguishing mark. So, although we may not want to boast, honesty will compel us to boast just a little.

But that is not what faith is. Listen to D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones on this subject:

Faith is nothing but the instrument of our salvation. Nowhere in Scripture will you find that we are justified because of our faith; nowhere in Scripture will you find that we are justified on account of our faith. The Scripture never says that. The Scripture says that we are justified by faith or through faith. Faith is nothing but the instrument or the channel by which this righteousness of God in Christ becomes ours. It is not faith that saves us. What saves us is the Lord Jesus Christ and his perfect work. It is the death of Christ upon Calvary's Cross that saves us. It is his perfect life that saves us. It is his appearing on our behalf in the presence of God that saves us. It is God putting Christ's righteousness to our account that saves us. This is the righteousness that saves; faith is but the channel and the instrument by which his righteousness becomes mine. The righteousness is entirely Christ's. My faith is not my righteousness and I must never define or think of faith as righteousness. Faith is nothing but that which links us to the Lord Jesus Christ and his righteousness.

So let's have done with boasting in the church of Jesus Christ—"except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Gal. 6:14).

Christians are all nothing but sinners saved by grace. If you do not believe that, you are not saved. You are still trusting in your own good works, your feelings, your superior religious knowledge or your faith—not in Jesus.

Jesus saves! That is the message of Christianity. If you believe that, you will forget about yourself and bow low before him.

Chapter 49.
One Way for Everybody

Romans 3:29-30

When the world seemed larger than it does today and the peoples of the world did not have much contact with one another, the fact that there were many religions hardly troubled anyone. Europeans had their religious doctrines and practices, and it did not bother them that the peoples of Africa or Asia had different ones. Orientals were not troubled by the different faiths of the Europeans. People were not troubled by other people's belief systems, because in most cases they knew very little about them. Today this is different. We know a great deal about the major world religions and often even something about the minor ones. So for many people the question "Which of the world's religions are right and which are wrong?" is very puzzling.

There are three major ways of dealing with this problem.

The first is to suggest that religions are all more or less equal—at least if they are pursued sincerely. Many people in the past anticipated us in thinking along these lines. Edward Gibbon composed a cynical expression of it in The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, saying that to the common people all religions were "equally true"; to the philosophers they were "equally false"; and to the magistrates they were "equally useful." Today the view is sometimes expressed by the image of a mountain. "God is on the top of the mountain," people say, "and the religions of the world are like roads going up the mountain from the various sides. Some go up one side, some another, but they all get to the same place in the end." This is the characteristic solution of American religious pluralism.

The second way of dealing with this problem is to say that, although the religions of the world all probably have some value (at least to their adherents), some are nevertheless better than others. It follows from this that one of these religions, whatever one it might be, must be the best of all. This view allows everyone to believe that his or her religion is, if not best, at least superior to some others. But it imposes the task of seeking out the "best," which is what many people believe they are doing.

The third view, the Christian one, is that there is only one way to come to God—it is through faith in Jesus Christ—and that the other religions of the world are really only ways of running away from him.

One Way of Salvation

This third solution is so contrary to the accepting or permissive spirit of our times that it is hardly safe to utter it, except behind the strong stone walls of one's church. This is because any such claim to truth, which Christianity certainly makes, is perceived to be narrow, bigoted, hateful, ignorant, wicked, cruel, base, vile, and intolerant—the kind of thinking that has always led to genocide, religious wars, or witch hunts. But it does not lead to any of these things, as we will see.

The teaching that there is only one way to come to God is merely the natural outcome of the basic gospel of grace, which Paul has been expounding in Romans. He has spoken of human failure to live up to God's standards, showing that "'there is no one righteous, not even one.... no one who seeks God'" (Rom. 3:10, 11). He has unfolded God's plan of salvation through the redemptive work of Jesus Christ, proving that the salvation provided by God through the work of Christ becomes ours by simple faith. Now, in the second paragraph of Romans 3, he is providing three natural conclusions or inferences from these doctrines, among which is the teaching that in terms of salvation there is but one way of salvation for everybody. These conclusions are:

1. Salvation by grace through faith excludes boasting (vv. 27-28),
2. Salvation by grace through faith means that there is one way of salvation for everybody, whoever he or she may be or whatever he or she may have done or not done (vv. 29-30), and
3. Salvation by grace through faith upholds the law of God rather than subverting it, as some suppose it does (v. 31).

The second point is the one Paul develops in Romans 3:29-30, where he writes, "Is God the God of Jews only? Is he not the God of Gentiles too? Yes, of Gentiles too, since there is only one God, who will justify the circumcised by faith and the uncircumcised through that same faith." These verses teach that the fact that there is only one way of salvation follows from the fact of their being only one God. God is the God of all. So the salvation he provides is but one salvation for all. Far from being narrow or sectarian, this truth actually swings the grand door of salvation wide open for everybody.

The Lord Our God Is One

Each nation has its own set of prejudices, of course. And it is helpful in trying to appreciate this text to realize that Paul was running up against two entirely different sets of prejudices as he composed these verses: those of the Jew, who believed in one God but not in salvation for Gentiles, and those of the Gentile, who believed in salvation for everyone (or at least the possibility of salvation for everyone) but not in one God.

Let us take the Jew first.

The chief theological tenet of Judaism was its monotheism, and it still is today. Judaism is a religion of prayers and sayings, and chief among all the prayers or sayings is the Shema, (Hebrew for "Hear"), recited somewhat as a confession of faith prior to the reading of the formal prayers in synagogues each Sabbath: "Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God, the LORD is one" (Deut. 6:6). This is among those great sayings that were to be kept before the people always: "Impress them on your children. Talk about them when you sit at home and when you walk along the road, when you lie down and when you get up. Tie them as symbols on your hands and bind them on your foreheads. Write them on the doorframes of your houses and on your gates" (vv. 7-9).

Nothing so distinguished the Jew from his pagan neighbors as his fierce and uncompromising monotheism. Nothing made his life more difficult, but nothing was so much to his credit. While the nations about worshiped the debased deities described in Romans—"images made to look like mortal man and birds and animals and reptiles" (Rom. 1:23)—the Jew maintained the highest conceptions of the one God and contended for him.

But with this conviction went what one commentator calls "a degenerate theocratic exclusiveness." That is, a scorn of Gentiles to the point of supposing them to be scorned by God also. In the liturgy for morning prayers there was a sentence in which Jewish men thanked God that he had not made them "a Gentile, a slave, or a woman." The Jew said, "God loves Israel alone of all the nations of the earth." A Gentile could be saved, of course, but he had to become a Jew first. Jewish monotheism did not extend so far as to save the Gentile as a Gentile without Judaism.

But the Gentile had overwhelming problems of his own.

Whereas Israel had monotheism with an accompanying exclusiveness, the Gentile had tolerance without monotheism. And what thoughtful person could prefer that? It was said of Athens that there were more gods in the city than people. What is worse, these many and diverse gods permitted and even encouraged the most debased moral practices. Greece was a moral cesspool by the start of the Christian era, and Rome soon became worse. To those who know the characteristics of these times, the portrait of pagan society drawn by Paul in Romans 1:29-32 and Romans 3:13-18 is no exaggeration.

What can be done? If we are firm in our conceptions of one great and moral God, the source of all good, we seem to become narrow, self-righteous, and bigoted. And it is not only the Jew who has been like this.

If we are broad in our doctrines, believing that all are equally right in believing in whatever god or gods suits their fancy, we plunge into polytheism and depravity. What is the solution? How can anyone find a way out of this dilemma?

The solution is the gospel that Paul has been expounding. It maintains the great high principle of monotheism, for it is the gospel of this one God. It flows from his grace. It has been accomplished by his Son, who died for us. It requires us to be like him. At the same time, the gospel does not promote any kind of exclusiveness, for it is a gospel offered to all alike—apart from their religious advantages or disadvantages, understanding or lack of understanding, good works or very evil deeds.

Here is Charles Hodge's comprehensive statement of this principle:

We have here the second result of the gospel method of justification: It presents a God as equally a God of the Gentiles as of the Jews. He is such, because "it is one God who justifies the circumcision by faith, and the uncircumcision through faith." He deals with both classes on precisely the same principles; he pursues, with regard to both, the same plan, and offers salvation to both on exactly the same terms. There is, therefore, in this doctrine, the foundation laid for a universal religion, which may be preached to every creature under heaven, which need not, as was the case with the Jewish system, be confined to any one sect or nation. This is the only doctrine which suits the character of God and his relation to all his intelligent creatures upon earth. God is a universal and not a national God, and this is a method of salvation universally applicable.

No One Cast Out

And that is what I want to do now. I want to apply the gospel developed in Romans 3 as universally as possible. My method is simple. I want to tell you that whoever you are or whatever you may or may not have done, this gospel is for you, because it is for everybody. I want you to see that if you will come to God in the way he has appointed for you to come—that is, through faith in his Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, who died for you—he will receive you and will never cast you out.

Let me ask three important questions and then answer them:

1. Who may come? The answer is: everybody. All alike are lost in sin, and yet all alike are the objects of Jesus' saving love. The preceding portions of Romans show that the gospel is for the very great sinner as well as for the apparently moral person. It is for the pagan as well as for the one who considers himself or herself to be religious. Even if you are a very great sinner, you may come. Those described in the first chapter of Romans were great sinners, but the way of salvation through faith in the death of Jesus Christ was for them. Even if you are extremely self-righteous, you may come—if you shed your self-righteousness. Those described in Romans 2 were selfrighteous, but Paul is expounding the gospel for this type of person also.

What is your sin? Pride? Murder? Stealing? Adultery? It does not matter. If you will come to Jesus, you will be received. It is Jesus who said, "Whoever comes to me I will never drive away" (John 6:37b).

What is your profession? Minister? Gambler? Businessman? Housewife? It does not matter. You may come to God through faith in the atoning work of Jesus Christ.

What is your condition? Are you seeking God? Running away from God? Fighting God?
Questioning God? Job was questioning God, but God was never closer to him than when he was.

Are you an indifferent sort of person? Some years ago I met a man who came to Tenth Presbyterian Church occasionally, saying that this was "whenever my friends think I need a dose of religion." That kind of exposure will only inoculate you against true faith in Christ and will give you a false sense of security and well-being. Religion saves no one. It is Jesus Christ who saves. So don't come "to church." Come to Christ. The gospel is for you if you are one of these indifferent people.

2. How may I come? You may come as you are. Some years ago there was a fad in the United States known as "come as you are" parties. People would get an invitation to a party occurring a week or so later, but they were to come to it in exactly the state of dress (or undress) they were in when they got the invitation. Were they dressed to change the oil in the car? They were to come with oil stains. Were they covered with paint from some do-it-yourself household project? They were to come bespeckled. Swimsuits or formal wear! It did not matter. They were to come like that.

In the same way, you are invited to come to Christ in whatever mental or spiritual attire you may find yourself in.

Some come running to Jesus. I have known some. The gospel is preached, and they come like Zacchaeus, who climbed a tree to get a saving view of Jesus Christ. Or they come like Peter, who jumped into the water to swim to Jesus across the Sea of Galilee. Preaching the gospel to people like this is like putting seventy-five cents in a soft-drink machine. The result is immediate. Moreover, they seem to come in full faith and with substantial knowledge. Catholics, many of whom have learned much doctrine but perhaps have not yet quite understood the gospel of grace, often come in this manner. For them the gospel is like the key in the lock that opens the entire treasure house of God at one turning.

Others come limping along with poor, faltering, hesitating steps. But that is all right. They may come, too.

Some years ago members of the staff of Campus Crusade for Christ at the University of Pennsylvania began speaking about Jesus Christ to a young black student. He was not very much interested in spiritual matters. His chief interest was in making the freshman basketball team, and he kept working at this goal all through the fall. They invited him to go to a fall conference at which I had been invited to speak, but he did not want to go. He had no money. They offered him a scholarship. He said he did not have a way of getting there. They provided a ride. When he got to the conference center he was late and had not had any dinner, so he decided to go out for hamburgers instead of going to the first meeting. He came in when the meeting was about half over. I did not notice when he came in, but I was told later that he entered thinking about the tryouts for the team, which were to be held that Monday. I was saying, "God loves you, whoever you are; and he has a special plan for your life." These words struck him as a direct word from God. He sat down and listened. That evening he gave his life to the Lord, and after that he became an extremely effective witness for Christ to the black community.

Some people come kicking and screaming. Paul was reluctant. Saint Augustine resisted until God finally reached him in the garden of a friend's estate near Milan, Italy. C. S. Lewis described himself as "the most dejected and reluctant convert in England."

3. When may I come? You may come at any time. Come as a child. I am delighted when children show an interest in the gospel, which many do, especially if they are being raised in a devout Christian home. Some persons think that children cannot understand the gospel or believe on Jesus meaningfully. But that is not true. Children can understand a great deal if someone will just take the time to explain the things of God to them. Jesus commended the faith of children, saying that we must all come as little children to be saved.

Are you a child? If you are and if you can understand what I am saying now, you can understand three things: (1) you are old enough to sin; (2) you are old enough to die; and (3) you are old enough to come to Jesus. For Jesus himself said, "Let the little children come to me, and do not hinder them, for the kingdom of heaven belongs to such as these" (Matt. 19:14). If you are a child, won't you believe in Jesus and follow him? The way older people are to be saved is for you also.

You may be older. You may be thinking that you probably should have come as a child but that it is too late for you now. "I am getting along in years," you say. "It is hard to change when you are old." True enough! The old do get set in their ways; it is why it is good to come young. But although it is harder to come to Christ when you are older, it is not impossible. And it is never too late. You may not be able to do much for Jesus because of your advanced years, but he can do everything for you. You will not have much time on earth to serve him, but you will have an eternity in heaven to praise him.

Charles Haddon Spurgeon, that great Baptist preacher, wrote:

Oh, my dear hearers, come to Jesus! Come in the morning when the dew is on your branch, for he will not cast you out. Come in the heat of noon, when the drought of care parches you, and he will not cast you out. Come when the shadows have grown long, and the darkness of the night is gathering about you, for he will not cast you out. The door is not shut; for the gate of mercy closes not so long as the gate of life is open.

Will You Come?

I give this appeal, too: Come to Jesus!

Is God the God of Jews only? Is he not the God of Gentiles, too? Yes, of Gentiles too, since there is only one God, who will justify the circumcised by faith and the uncircumcised through that same faith.

Is God the God of Americans only? Is he not the God of Asians, too? Yes, of Asians, too, since there is only one God, who will justify the Caucasian by faith and the Asian through that same faith.

Is God the God of Catholics only? Is he not the God of Protestants, too? Yes, of Protestants, too, since there is only one God, who will justify the Catholic by faith and the Protestant by that same faith.

Is God the God of upper-middle class people only? Is he not the God of working-class people, too? Yes, of working-class people, too, since there is only one God who will justify the uppermiddle class by faith and the working class through that same faith.

Is God the God of elderly people only? Is he not the God of children, too? Yes, of children, too, since there is only one God who will justify the elderly by faith and children through that same faith.

I can only think of one thing that could possibly turn you away from this gracious, embracing, "all are welcome" gospel. And that is that you do not want to go into the Father's house with all those other types of people. But if that is so, do not call Christianity narrow or bigoted or mean or self-righteous or sectarian. It is you who are sectarian, and Christianity is the only thing I know of that can cleanse you of that blight. Only Jesus can give you grace to place your pride aside and step through that wide door of salvation as the rebellious sinner you truly are.

No one else will go through—only sinners who have confessed their sin, turned from it, and believed on Jesus Christ as their Savior.

Chapter 50.
The Law Upheld by Faith

Romans 3:31

Two studies back, I began to explain the final paragraph of Romans 3 (vv. 27-31), pointing out that it contains three conclusions from or implications of the gospel. Let us review them. They may be expressed by saying that the doctrine of justification by grace through faith in Jesus Christ:

1. Excludes boasting (vv. 27-28),
2. Establishes one way of salvation for everybody (vv. 29-30), and
3. Upholds the law of God rather than subverting it, as some seem always to suppose it does (v. 31).

I have called these points "conclusions" from or "implications" of the doctrines of salvation established in verses 21-26. But, strictly speaking, the last of these points is an answer to a false conclusion or erroneous implication that some people, particularly religious people, might draw from the gospel. The apostle has spoken forcefully about salvation by grace apart from law. He has repeated the idea of salvation being apart from law twice, once in verse 21 ("apart from law") and once in verse 28 ("apart from observing the law"). "Well, then," such a person might argue, "if salvation is apart from law, as you say, doesn't the doctrine of salvation by grace set God's law aside and thus show it to be worthless? And if it does that, shouldn't your gospel be rejected as being quite false? Aren't we obliged to reject any doctrine that would nullify the revealed law of God?"

Paul's reply is that the gospel of grace does not nullify God's law. God forbid that it should! If it did that, it would be a false gospel, one rightly to be rejected. But it does not nullify the law of God. On the contrary, it establishes the law and is, in fact, the only thing that does or could establish it.

The Law and Sanctification

There are two ways in which this objection to the gospel may be raised, however. One is answered later on in the letter; the other is stated here. The first could be deferred for now, but for the sake of completeness it is worth looking at both of them at one time, although we will consider the first one briefly.

The first (and most obvious) objection concerns the imagined negative impact of the teaching of salvation by grace on the Christian life. In Romans this error is exposed in chapter 6. There Paul imagines a person saying, "Let us go on sinning so that grace may increase" (cf. v. 1). In Galatians, which deals with the problem at even greater length, he imagines a person who says, "Let us use our freedom to indulge the sinful nature" (cf. Gal. 5:13). In both cases the argument is: "If we do not have to keep the law of God in order to be saved, why should any of us want to keep it? If we are saved by grace apart from obeying the law, we must be free to sin. So let's all sin. Let's indulge ourselves by doing any and every sinful thing we want to do—because, after all, we will get to heaven anyway."

It should not be too difficult to see what is wrong with this argument. It is wrong psychologically, if for no other reason. It assumes that the only motivation for right moral conduct is fear of hell or of losing heaven, when actually those are the least significant motivations.

The situation here is similar to what students of corporate management, like Peter F. Drucker, teach about vocational motivation. Many people, perhaps most people, suppose that the best way to motivate an employee is to offer him or her more money. But those who have studied this idea know that such is not the case. Actually, money ranks very low as a work motivator. Feelings of personal worth, being part of something important, respect, pride in the company, or hope for advancement all rank higher. In the same way, it is erroneous to suppose that a person will live a moral life only if by doing so he or she can earn heaven. The highest motivation for godly conduct comes not from fear of hell but from love of God. It is because God has saved us by grace entirely apart from any merit in ourselves that we love and want to please him. Moreover, we recognize the importance of what we have become a part of by God's grace—the kingdom of God on earth—and we want to advance the goals of that kingdom.

The second error is theological. It is the false assumption that when a person is justified by grace through faith in Jesus Christ, he or she is personally unchanged by that process. Or, to put it in other terms, it is to suppose that one can be justified without being regenerated, or born again. Actually, the one effect never occurs without the other. So the one who is justified always shows it by striving for righteousness. If a person does not strive to live a moral life according to the law of God, the failure proves that he or she is neither regenerated nor justified.

Here is the way John R. W. Stott puts it. "The justifying work of the Son and the regenerating work of the Spirit cannot be separated. It is for this reason that good works of love follow justification and new birth as their necessary evidence."

The Law and Justification

Yet, as I indicated earlier, this is not the form of the objection that the apostle was thinking of when he composed Romans 3:31. This is because the theme of Romans 3:21-31 is not sanctification (important as that is) but justification, which is achieved for us by the work of Christ. So it is not that the law is upheld by "our faith" in the sense that we inevitably live moral lives if we are living by faith, true as that is, but that the "faith" Paul is describing—that is, the doctrine of justification by grace through faith—upholds the law.

This is so important I need to state it again in different language. The point is not that the law is somehow established by what we do as Christians by the power of the new life of God within. It is rather that the Lord Jesus Christ has established the law in the process of providing salvation for us by his death on the cross.

Or, to put it in still other language, God has established the law by seeing that the demands of the law were met in the way he provided salvation for us.

This needs to be taken in three parts.

1. The doctrine of justification by grace through faith establishes the law by showing that the law is so high and holy that we who are sinners could never have fulfilled it.

To see this, let us take a contrary situation. Suppose God had declared the cross of Jesus Christ to be unnecessary. Suppose he had said, "I do not think it will be necessary for me to send my Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, to die for sinners. Rather than saving them in this manner—by grace—I will allow them to be saved in the way they obviously want to be saved, that is, by doing good deeds and by trying to keep the law. They cannot keep the law perfectly, of course, but I will set a certain standard that they will have to attain. We will call it a 'passing grade.' If they reach that, I will save them. If not, they will be lost." Obviously, if God had acted in that fashion, the law would not have been established but rather would have been diminished or nullified—or at least parts of it would have been.

Suppose God set the "passing score" at seventy percent of the law's just requirements. In that case, isn't it evident that he would have nullified the other thirty percent of the law?

If he had put the passing score at fifty, half would have been set aside.

If the passing score were ten percent, ninety percent of the law would have been made worthless.

Of course, the real scenario would actually have been even worse than that. Because, according to the Bible, not one of us keeps even one tiny part of the law of God perfectly, since everything we are and all we do is ruined by our radical and pervasive sin. If the cross were unnecessary and God saved us on the basis of what we could do, since we do not keep even one part of the law perfectly, God would actually be setting aside the entire law, declaring that it is an unimportant standard after all. Instead, the doctrine of justification by faith establishes the law, because it shows that God continues to take each requirement of the law seriously, even though none of us can fulfill it. The law is "holy,... righteous and good" (Rom. 7:12). Moreover, it remains the standard and would have condemned everybody, if a way of fulfilling its requirements (by someone other than a mere human being) had not been found.

2. The doctrine of justification by grace through faith establishes the law by showing that the punishment of sinners by death, as required by the law, has been executed.

The law had two chief spiritual functions, apart from its more basic role in regulating the civic life of the Jewish nation.

First, it taught that all are sinners. We need to be taught that, of course, because one effect of sin on the mind is to blind us to our true condition. The law was meant to convince us—by its high demands—that there is indeed "no one righteous, not even one... no one who understands, no one who seeks God" (Rom. 3:10-11). It teaches us this because, if we are serious about trying to keep its commandments, as Martin Luther was, to give just one example, we soon discover that we cannot.

Second, the law taught that the punishment for sin is death. This teaching goes back as far as the early chapters of Genesis, where God told Adam and Eve, "You must not eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, for when you eat of it, you will surely die" (Gen. 2:17). It is found in Ezekiel 18:4b: "The soul who sins... will die." Indeed, in one way or another it is found throughout the Old Testament.

Again, let us imagine a situation contrary to what is actually the case. Let us suppose God to have said, "I know that no one can keep the law. So I will exercise my grace and save people apart from meeting the law's requirements. I will just love sinners into heaven." If God had said that, he would not only have undermined the high and holy standards of the law, suggesting, as we saw above, that thirty percent, half, or even all of the law could be dispensed with. He would also have shown that the punishments for disobeying the law were also arbitrary and that, in the final analysis, they are dispensable. He would have been like a father threatening to spank his child if he or she did not do something he commanded, when he actually had no intention of punishing the child in any way. The law could only have been established by carrying out the penalty of spiritual death—if not on us, then on Jesus Christ as our substitute.

Isn't that obvious? Take a current example. The law of a city specifies that the maximum speed permissible within the bounds of the city is thirty-five miles per hour. A man drives across the city line and continues on into the downtown area, going fifty miles per hour. He is stopped by a policeman. How is the law to be established in the case of the lawbreaker?

By letting him go? Obviously not.

By suggesting that the standard is perhaps too high and that fifty miles per hour actually is close to what probably should be required? No.

By making the offender promise to drive slower the next time? No, that is not a case of establishing the law either.

The only way the law can be established in the case of the speeding motorist is for him to get a ticket and for the necessary fine to be paid. Supposing the motorist had no money? To establish the law in that case, he would have to go to jail, unless someone could be found to pay the fine for him.

It is exactly the same spiritually. When the Lord Jesus Christ died on the cross for us, he showed that God took the law with full seriousness. The law demanded death for infractions. Jesus met that demand by suffering the law's penalty in our place. Therefore, by basing salvation on what was accomplished by Jesus' death rather than on what we could (or, in fact, could not) do, God established the law while at the same time providing a way by which sinners could be saved. Robert Haldane, one of the great commentators on this epistle, asks rhetorically and rightly, "Can there be any greater respect shown to the law, than that when God determines to save men from its curse, he makes his own Son sustain its curse in their stead, and fulfill for them all its demands?"

In this respect, Romans 3:31 is a natural expression of the principle announced in verse 26: "He [that is, God] did it [that is, sent Jesus to be a sacrifice of atonement] to demonstrate his justice at the present time, so as to be just and the one who justifies those who have faith in Jesus." What is the standard of the justice established by Christ's atonement? Obviously, it is the law. So what Romans 3:26 tells us, to use different language, is that God established the law by having Jesus bear the penalty of the law for those he was saving.

3. The doctrine of justification by grace through faith establishes the law by showing that it is on the basis of a true righteousness, righteousness that is an exact fulfillment of the law, that we are justified.

Justification by faith means 'justification by faith in Christ," and Christ fulfilled the law perfectly. Do you remember the exchange between the Lord Jesus Christ and John the Baptist on the occasion of the Lord's baptism in the Jordan River? John did not want to baptize Jesus, saying that he ought rather to be baptized by Jesus. But Jesus replied, "Let it be so now; it is proper for us to do this to fulfill all righteousness" (Matt. 3:15). The Baptist was right insofar as the meaning of his own baptism was concerned. His was a baptism of repentance, and since Jesus had done nothing sinful there was nothing for him to repent of. John was the sinner. He needed from Jesus a baptism of repentance for his sins.

But Jesus was teaching a greater truth. He was teaching that, having become man, he wanted willingly to submit to the righteous demands of the law of God. He wanted to take these upon himself. Galatians 4:4 describes him as being "born of a woman, born under law, to redeem those under law...." That is, Jesus deliberately placed himself under law as a man, setting out to fulfill the law in each of its particulars.

When God saves us, therefore, it is not just by having the Lord Jesus Christ die in our place, bearing sin's penalty. That is part of it. But the other part, the part I am discussing now, is that God saves us also by imputing to us this actual righteousness of Christ. We do not have it of ourselves. We are sinners. We have fallen short of God's lawful standards. But Jesus has not fallen short. He fulfilled the law perfectly, and his actual righteousness is now, by the grace of God, credited to our account. That is why Paul would later write to the Philippians, "... I consider everything a loss compared to the surpassing greatness of knowing Christ Jesus my Lord, for whose sake I have lost all things. I consider them rubbish, that I may gain Christ and be found in him, not having a righteousness of my own that comes from the law, but that which is through faith in Christ—the righteousness that comes from God and is by faith" (Phil. 3:8-9).

This righteousness is not something other than true righteousness. It is that real righteousness possessed and achieved by Jesus Christ. By saving us through this righteousness, and not by any lesser standard, God establishes the law that defines this righteousness.

Haldane asks, "Do we make law void when we conclude that through his faith he [the believer] receives a perfect righteousness, by which, in all its demands and all its sanctions, it is fulfilled?" He answers rightly, "No, it is in this very way we establish it."

The Heart of Scripture

With the exposition of Romans 3:31, which we have now completed, we have come to the end of the most important single passage in the Word of God. As we said at the beginning of our study of verses 21-31, this section of Romans is the very heart of the Bible, the most important and critical passage in all Scripture. We need to end by recalling what it teaches.

There are four great doctrines:

1. God has provided a righteousness of his own for men and women, a righteousness we do not possess ourselves. This is the very heart or theme of the Word of God.

2. This righteousness is by grace. We do not deserve it. In fact, we are incapable ever of deserving it.

3. It is the work of the Lord Jesus Christ in dying for his people, redeeming them from their sin, that has made this grace on God's part possible. Redemption describes the work of Jesus Christ in relation to ourselves; propitiation describes the work of Jesus Christ in relation to the Father; justification describes the act by which God the Father declares us to have met the demands of the law on the basis of Christ's work for us. It is because of Jesus' death that there is a Christian gospel.

4. This righteousness, which God has graciously provided, becomes ours through simple faith. Believing and trusting God in regard to the work of Jesus is the only way anyone, whether Jew or Gentile, can be saved. Faith is essential. "And without faith it is impossible to please God..." (Heb. 11:6).

These points were stated at the very beginning of the letter, where Paul wrote: "I am not ashamed of the gospel, because it is the power of God for the salvation of everyone who believes: first for the Jew, then for the Gentile. For in the gospel a righteousness from God is revealed, a righteousness that is by faith from first to last, just as it is written: 'The righteous will live by faith'" (Rom. 1:16-17).

The important point is: Have you been saved by what is described in these doctrines? Have you been saved from your sin by Jesus Christ? Do you know that he died in your place to bear the punishment for your sin and offer you, in its place, his own perfect righteousness? Have you believed on the Lord Jesus Christ as your Savior?

We live in a day—perhaps every age has been like this—when people are trying their best to establish other "gospels," other ways of salvation. Some are into good works, some into yoga or reincarnations or crystals or something else. But the Bible's gospel is not a human gospel, as those all are. The Bible is God's Word, and this is God's gospel. It is the only true gospel. It is the only way in which a sinful man or woman can be saved. But, praise God, it is the way by which any man or woman may be saved—yourself included.

Believe it. And thank God for it.

Part Five.

The Gospel Proved from Scripture

Chapter 51.
The Case of Father Abraham

Romans 4:1-5

As Americans living in the twentieth century, we have two things working against us as we begin a study of the fourth chapter of Paul's great letter to the Romans. First, we value what is new more than what is old, and Paul's purpose in this chapter is to prove that the gospel he has explained in Romans 3 is not something new, but is that by which God has been saving people from the dawn of history. Second, we dislike rational proofs, and Romans 4 is an example of classic reasoning.

But it is important that we overcome our cultural liabilities at this point and actually listen to and believe what Paul is saying.

No New Doctrine

It might help us to understand what Paul is doing. When Peter preached the first Christian sermon on the day of Pentecost, he had a method that was the exact opposite of the one used by the apostle Paul. Peter's method was to quote an Old Testament text and then explain it, something he does three times in just the one sermon. That is: Scripture first, then explanation. Paul, by contrast, first establishes contact with his readers, analyzing the desperate condition of the human race without God and explaining the gospel as God's answer to that dilemma. Then, after he has analyzed the problem, he proves what he has taught from the Old Testament.

He has done this once already. After describing the dreadful depravity of the race in Romans 1 and 2, using the pagans' own terms for this corruption in 1:29-31, Paul established the same thing by the use of six Old Testament quotations—in 3:10-18. Now, having explained God's way of salvation by the gift of grace through faith in 3:21-31, he proves what he has been teaching by two Old Testament examples: Abraham, the father of the Jewish nation, and King David (4:125).

How significant this is! Robert Haldane writes:

Nothing could be so well calculated to convince both Jewish and Gentile believers, especially the former, how vain is the expectation of those who look for justification by their own works. Abraham was a patriarch, eminently holy, the head of the nation of Israel, the friend of God, the father of all who believe, in whose seed all the nations of the world were to be blessed. David was a man according to God's own heart, the progenitor of the Messiah, his great personal type, and a chosen and anointed king of Israel. If, then, Abraham had not been justified by his works, but by the righteousness of God imputed to him through faith, and David, speaking by the Spirit of God, had declared that the only way in which a man can receive justification is by his sin being covered by the imputation of that righteousness, who could suppose that it was to be attained by any other means? By these two references, the apostle likewise shows that the way of justification was the same from the beginning, both under the old and the new dispensations.

Two times before this, Paul has indicated that salvation through the gift of God's righteousness, apart from law, had been announced beforehand in the Old Testament (Rom. 1:2; 3:21). Now he shows that it is not only something that had been previously announced, but was also the only way anyone either in the Old Testament period or the dawning New Testament era has been saved.

Father Abraham

Paul begins with Abraham, and it is clear why he does so. Abraham was the acknowledged father of the Jewish people and, with the exception of Jesus himself, the most important person in the Bible. Abraham is a giant in Scripture.

Think of the other great Old Testament figures. Moses was a very great man. He was the one through whom God broke the power of tyrannous Egypt and led the people forth into a new land. He was the lawgiver, God appearing to him in a special and unique way on Mount Sinai. David was the greatest of Israel's kings. He brought the nation to the pinnacle of its power in the ancient Near East, while expressing its greatest religious feelings and devotion in his psalms. Elijah was great among the prophets. Isaiah was a powerful statesman and a voice of God to Israel in dark days. Daniel was an outstanding statesman as well. But great as these Old Testament figures were, if asked, each would have confessed in an instant that Abraham was his father in the faith.

Early in Genesis we read of God's promise to Abraham that he would become the father of many nations (Gen. 17:5). This promise was fulfilled both physically and spiritually. Physically, Abraham became the father of the Jewish and Arab peoples, through Isaac and Ishmael respectively. Spiritually, Abraham became the father of all true believers, both Jews and Gentiles. He is our father in faith if we have believed on Jesus.

In the New Testament the origins of salvation are always traced to Abraham. Paul does it characteristically, as here in Romans and in the letter to the Galatians (chs. 4, 5). But it is not just Paul who does this. The New Testament begins with such a reference, Matthew's words about "Jesus Christ the son of David, the son of Abraham" (Matt. 1:1). And Luke quotes Mary, Jesus' mother, as exulting: "[God] has helped his servant Israel, remembering to be merciful to Abraham and his descendants forever..." (Luke 1:54-55).

Abraham is referred to as God's "friend" three times in the Bible (2 Chron. 20:7; Isa. 41:8; James 2:23). Why is that? The answer, as Paul is about to show, is that Abraham "believed God" and so was credited with righteousness (Rom. 4:3). If Paul can show that Abraham, the father of all the faithful, came into a right relationship with God by faith and not by any amount of human good works, his case is proved. Then the gospel he is expounding is the true gospel; there can be no other. If he cannot prove this, the case is lost and so is Christianity.

No Good in Abraham

Where do we start in considering the case of Father Abraham? The place at which to begin—the same place we ourselves must begin, if we would be saved—is with the acknowledgment that there was nothing in Abraham that could ever have commended him to God.

This point is lost a bit in the New International Version because, for some inexplicable reason, the NIV has translated the Greek words kata sarka ("according to the flesh") in Romans 4:1 by the words "in this matter." That is not the idea at all. In the Bible "flesh" refers to human activity apart from God's influence. So the query of verse 1 means, "What did Abraham find to be the case so far as his own human ability was concerned? Did he find that he could be saved by it?" The answer, as Paul shows, is that Abraham was not saved by his own ability or good works but by a gift of God: "Abraham believed God, and it was credited to him as righteousness" (v. 3).

God did not look down from heaven to see whether he could find someone with a little bit of human goodness (even a little bit of human faith), on the basis of which it would be possible to save that person—and then find Abraham. It is not as if God said, "Oh, this is wonderful! In the midst of this corrupt and sinful race, a race which, I have observed, thinks and does 'only evil all the time' [Gen. 6:5], I have discovered at least one individual who wants to serve me. I see Abraham and his goodness. I think I can make something of him." It was not like that at all. How could it be? For, as Paul has just written in Romans 3:10-12 (quoting Ps. 14:1-3 and Ps. 53:1-3):

> "There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God.
> All have turned away, they have together become worthless;
> there is no one who does good, not even one."

If Abraham had no natural good in him, it is certain that he was not saved by human goodness. How then was he saved? The answer, as we have seen several times already, is by God's gift of righteousness to him, which he received by faith.

By Proof from the Scriptures

Paul does not merely mention Abraham's example in a general way, however. He refers to a specific Old Testament teaching concerning Abraham, and the text he refers to is Genesis 15:6. The context of the verse is the incident in which God took Abraham out under the night sky and promised him offspring as numerous as the stars of heaven, even though at this time Abraham was eighty-five years old and had no children, and Abraham believed God.

From the viewpoint of the doctrine of salvation this is the single most important verse in the entire Bible. This is because in Genesis 15:6 the doctrine of justification by faith is set forth for the first time. It is the first reference in the Bible to (1) faith, (2) righteousness, and (3) justification. Thus, although we know that individuals preceding Abraham were also saved— Adam and Eve, Abel, Enoch, Noah, and others—this is the first time that any specific individual is said to have been justified.

How was this accomplished? Here we have to be extremely careful.

First, we need to dismiss what are clearly two serious misunderstandings of the text. One is the liberal misunderstanding, though it is probably what the great majority of Jews would have thought in Paul's day. It supposes that when the text says "Abraham believed God, and it was credited to him as righteousness," it means that Abraham was just a good or pious man, and that he was justified on that basis. Obviously, if Abraham believed God when God promised him numerous children, Abraham was the kind of person who delighted in believing and obeying God, in doing what God told him to do. And, so this reasoning goes, it was because he was such a good man that God saved him. That is not justification by faith, of course. It is the opposite, justification by works. But it is what many people fervently believe and what liberal scholarship teaches.

D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones, who discusses this error, points out that it is nothing less than the religion of the Pharisee, who went up to the temple to pray, saying, "God, I thank you that I am not like other men—robbers, evildoers, adulterers—or even like this tax collector. I fast twice a week and give a tenth of all I get" (Luke 18:11-12). That is boasting. If that is what Genesis 15:6 means, it is the exact opposite of everything that Paul has been saying thus far in this epistle.

The second misunderstanding is not a liberal but an evangelical one. It goes like this: Since Abraham did not have any righteousness in himself by which he could be justified before God— but since God wanted to save him—God looked for something he could accept in place of righteousness. Since Abraham had faith, at least a little bit, God said, "Even though this little bit of faith is not righteousness, it is something I can work with. I'll treat it as righteousness and so save Abraham."

Even to put it like that shows the absurdity of this interpretation. For God is not a juggler of truth. God does not pretend a thing is something it is not. Consequently, if God counted
Abraham as being righteous, it must have been on the basis of a true righteousness—either his or someone else's—and not on the mere fiction of substituting apples for oranges or pretending that the sow's ear of human works is actually the silk purse of salvation.

There are several reasons why we should be warned against this second insidious but very common misunderstanding.

First, when the text says that "it was credited to him as righteousness," what does "it" refer to? What is the antecedent? The evangelical misunderstanding I have been referring to would have to maintain that the antecedent is the fact that Abraham believed God or the fact that he had faith. But this is hard to support grammatically. "It" demands a noun (or at least a verbal noun) as an antecedent, and the text supplies neither. This fact alone suggests that we should look further for what was actually reckoned to Abraham as righteousness.

Second, there is the way faith is referred to in the rest of the Bible, specifically in the writings of Paul. It is never said that people are saved because of their faith or even on the basis of their faith. They are saved by faith. The Greek preposition is dia with the genitive, not the dative, and it means "by faith as a channel."

The Greek preposition dia can mean either (1) "because of or (2) "through." If it means "because of in the phrase dia pisteos, faith would indeed be the ground of salvation and a substitute for righteousness. But it does not mean this, because whenever dia means "because of its object is in the accusative case, and this never happens when "faith" is the object. When the Greek word for "faith" occurs with dia, it is always in the genitive case, and this is the case the object should be in when dia means "by" or "through," indicating that faith is a channel but not the grounds of salvation.

In order to spend a twenty-dollar bill you have to have faith in its purchasing power. But it is not your faith that is the basis of the purchase. It is the value of the money. So also spiritually.

Third, faith cannot be a substitute for righteousness because the important word "credited" does not permit that interpretation. The words (hasah in Hebrew, logizomai in Greek) are bookkeeping terms. They refer to accounting, a field in which the accountant has to be one hundred percent right. Suppose I am walking around with a dollar in my pocket, and I am aware that this is not very much money. I would like to have more. So I get out my account book and "reckon" one hundred dollars, rather than one dollar, to my account. According to my book I now have one hundred dollars. But this means nothing at all. It is foolishness. If I want to reckon one hundred dollars to my account, I must have one hundred dollars. Reckoning, accounting, or crediting is an acknowledgment or marking down of what is actually the case.

It is the same in justification—which leads to the proper understanding (not a misunderstanding) of this verse. When God saved Abraham he did two things, one negative and one positive:

1. He did what Paul quotes David as saying in verses 7-8 (a quotation of Ps. 32:1-2), namely, God did not reckon his sin against him. How so? It is not merely that God simply struck Abraham's transgressions from the ledger book of his life and then forgot about them, as if they could simply be discounted. God does not play imaginary games. True, he did remove the list of Abraham's sins from his ledger, but that was only because he had first transferred it to the ledger book of Jesus Christ. Jesus took the liability of those transgressions on himself and paid their price by dying for them. Abraham's sin was not reckoned to Abraham because it was reckoned to Jesus Christ instead.
2. In a parallel action, God then also reckoned the righteousness of Christ to Abraham, which is what Genesis 15:6 teaches. God took Christ's righteousness and wrote it in Abraham's ledger.

That is the only way anybody has ever been saved, and it is precisely what has happened for anybody who has been saved. It is true that there have been different degrees of understanding of what happened. The Old Testament saints understood less (although, as I will show in the next study, Abraham himself probably understood a great deal). New Testament saints understand more. But regardless of the degrees of understanding, the only way we or anybody else is saved is by the imputation of the righteousness of Christ to our account.

Some Practical Points

At the beginning of this study I pointed out two difficulties some of today's readers may have with these teachings. I have tried to address them. But, in closing, I want to balance those with four practical and easy-to-understand applications.

1. The importance of Scripture. Paul has been taking three chapters of Romans to explain man's great need and God's perfect remedy for that need in Christ. But here, at the point of proving and clinching his argument, he is ready to base everything he has said on just one Old Testament verse. One verse, followed by just one additional verse to establish the testimony of King David! Then, having stated the biblical teaching, Paul moves on. There is no need to speculate or argue further. For us, in the same way, any clear statement of the Bible should settle any matter to which the Bible speaks—at once and forever.

2. The hopelessness of trying to be saved by good works. Abraham was a good man, even a great man. He is a model of Old Testament piety. Yet Abraham was not saved by his works, nor could he be saved by them. If this man could not be saved by good works, it is certain that you and I, who are far less pious and godly than he was, cannot be saved by them.

3. Confidence in the gospel. The Lord Jesus Christ testified to Abraham's being a saved man, even speaking on one occasion of "Abraham's bosom" as a synonym for paradise or heaven. Abraham was saved! But if he was saved, not by some ability, godliness, or good works unique to him, but by the same gospel that is being preached today, then we can have a complete and utter trust in that gospel. It saved him. It will save us. It can save anybody.

4. Finally, all this is proof of Christianity's timelessness and validity. If Christianity were merely something founded by Jesus Christ some two thousand years ago, it might be interesting but it would have no more ultimate claim upon us than the dogmas of any other human religion. But if—though it was accomplished by Jesus Christ in history some two thousand years ago—it is actually the way of salvation established by God the Father in conjunction with his eternal Son before the world began and through which anyone who has ever been saved was saved, then it is an entirely different matter.

This proves the finality of Christianity as the only true faith. Says Barnhouse, "All other religions are the gropings of man after God. The faith that is in Christ is God's revelation of truth from himself, in the terms and in the manner he wished us to have the truth."

Chapter 52.
Faith Credited as Righteousness

Romans 4:3

Anyone who has ever spent time teaching in a religious setting has been asked certain familiar questions often asked of Bible interpreters and thought by the questioners to be either clever or unanswerable, in spite of the fact that they have been answered very well by many people many times:

"Where did Cain get his wife?"

"If God is both good and all-powerful, how come there is evil in the world?"

"What about the innocent pagans who have never had a chance to hear the gospel?"

After hearing such timeworn questions repeatedly, it becomes difficult to take many of them seriously. However, among these questions there is one at least which, whether or not it is asked seriously, is nevertheless important and thoughtful. It is: "How were people saved before the death of Jesus Christ?" The reason it is important is that it assumes some very true things about the gospel. It presupposes (1) the necessity of the death of Christ; (2) the importance of making the good news about his sacrificial death known to lost people; and (3) the need to believe in Jesus. It understands that "without faith it is impossible to please God" (Heb. 11:6). Starting with these presuppositions, the questioner wonders how a person who lived before the time of Christ—and who therefore could not have had an opportunity to hear about or believe on Jesus— could be saved.

How were people saved before the birth, life, and death of Christ? The answer is that they were saved in precisely the same way as people who have lived after those events. That is, they were saved by believing on Jesus. The Old Testament saints looked forward to his coming. We look back to it.

What Did Abraham Believe?

This question emerges in our study of Romans 4, for in this chapter Paul is proving, from the Old Testament, the gospel of salvation by grace through the work of Christ. He knows that his Jewish readers would consider the Old Testament and its teaching both true and binding. Therefore, if he can show that Old Testament figures such as Abraham and David were saved by the gospel he has been teaching, he has established his teaching conclusively. If Abraham was saved by faith in Christ, it follows that Christianity is true and there is no other way of salvation.

But how is the apostle to establish this point? He does so by direct appeal to the Old Testament, quoting Genesis 15:6 in reference to Abraham and (as we shall see in the next study) Psalm 32:12 in reference to King David.

We have already seen several important things about Genesis 15:6, which is quoted in Romans 4:3 as "Abraham believed God, and it was credited to him as righteousness." We have seen that
"it" refers, not to Abraham's faith, but to the righteousness of Christ, which God credited to Abraham. We have seen this as a "bookkeeping" transaction. God took the sin of Abraham from the ledger book of Abraham's life and transferred it to the ledger book of Christ, who died for such sin. And he took the righteousness of Christ from Christ's book and transferred it to Abraham. We also saw that faith is the channel through which this happens.

It is like one's faith in money. You need faith in money's value in order to spend it, but your faith in its purchasing power contributes nothing to the money itself. The value of a twenty-dollar bill is in the bill (or the integrity of the government, which stands behind it), not in the faith of the one using the money. In the same way, the worth of salvation is in the work of Christ, though we must believe on him for that work to be personally effective.

But here comes the question. Genesis 15:6 says, "Abram [Abraham] believed the LORD, and he credited it to him as righteousness." Strictly speaking, the text does not tell us what Abraham believed. We are told of the ultimate object of his faith; that is, the Lord God. But we are left in the dark as to the specific content of God's revelation to Abraham. What did God tell him, and what did Abraham believe as the result of that disclosure?

When we look at the context we see a number of possibilities. Genesis 15:1 records that God told Abraham that he would be Abraham's "shield" and "very great reward." Was that what Abraham believed? God also told Abraham that he would have an "heir" that would come forth from his own body (v. 4). Was that the content of the revelation? Then God speaks of numerous offspring, like the stars of heaven (v. 5). Is that it? Or does the content of Abraham's belief go back even further to the point of God's original call to him to leave Ur of the Chaldeans and go to a new land that God would show him, coupled with a promise of blessing to him and others (Gen. 12:17)?

If we had nothing more than Genesis 12 and 15 and Romans 4 to go on, we would have to conclude that Abraham's faith involved all of these—and perhaps things that are not even recorded. That is, we would conclude that Abraham was "credited" with righteousness on the basis of a complete and utterly trusting attitude to God. This is what Martin Luther seems to say in one place, writing, "The expression 'Abraham believed God' is equivalent to saying that he considered God truthful."

We would not be wrong in thinking this; it is part of the story. But there is more to say.

The Problem in Galatia

The interesting thing about Genesis 15:6 is that it is quoted at three places in the New Testament—Romans 4:3 (our text), Galatians 3:6, and James 2:23—and one of these, Galatians 3:6, provides a well-developed answer to our question.

Some background is necessary. Paul had preached to the people of Galatia in southern Asia Minor, which we call Turkey, on his first missionary journey, described in Acts 13 and 14. He had taught them that salvation from sin does not come from keeping the law, or from any other form of good works or character, but from the work of Christ. He had explained that Christ died in our place, bearing the punishment for our sins, and that on the basis of his substitutionary sacrifice God now freely gives his own righteousness to believers. The Galatians understood this, believed it, were baptized, and began to live for Christ. God even worked miracles among them, according to Paul's explicit testimony (Gal. 3:5).

Sometime later—we do not know exactly when—certain Jews came to Galatia from Jerusalem and began to teach the Galatian Christians that it was not enough for them to have believed on Christ. They said it was necessary for them to believe in Moses as well. That is, they had to keep the law. Faith was all right, but they also had to be circumcised and begin to keep the ritualistic requirements of the old covenant if they were to be saved. They could be Christians, but they had to become Jews, too.

Paul was aghast when he heard of this, and the letter to the Galatians is his spirited response. It has three parts: a first part, in which he defends his apostleship, no doubt because it had been under attack by these harmful Jewish legalizers; a second part, in which he restates and argues for the gospel; and a third part, in which he shows the inevitable outworking of the gospel of grace in moral living. In the second and chief part he argues that no one, not even Abraham, has been saved in any way but through faith in Jesus.

The Faith of Father Abraham

This is where Paul quotes Genesis 15:6, saying, much as he does in Romans, "Consider Abraham: 'He believed God, and it was credited to him as righteousness'" (Gal. 3:6).

Paul then adds these important words: "The Scripture foresaw that God would justify the Gentiles by faith, and announced the gospel in advance to Abraham: 'All nations will be blessed through you.' So those who have faith are blessed along with Abraham, the man of faith.... Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law by becoming a curse for us, for it is written: 'Cursed is everyone who is hung on a tree.' He redeemed us in order that the blessing given to Abraham might come to the Gentiles through Christ Jesus, so that by faith we might receive the promise of the Spirit" (Gal. 3:8-9, 13-14).

Paul's opponents would have argued that Abraham was saved by keeping the law and by being circumcised, but we know from Paul's teaching, both in Galatians and Romans, that he would have answered by reciting the historical sequence of events. The verse that says that Abraham was justified by faith is in Genesis 15. But circumcision is not introduced until years later, as recorded in Genesis 17. And the law was not given until the time of Moses, four hundred years after that. Since Abraham was declared to be a justified man before either the law or circumcision, it is certain that he was not justified on the basis of his conformity to either. "But," Paul's opponents would have countered, "if that is true, then Abraham could not have been justified by faith in Jesus Christ either. For Jesus was not born until an even later date. Abraham did not know of Christ. So how could he have been saved by faith in someone of whom he did not know? Clearly, faith in Christ is not essential for salvation."

At this point we get the real answer to our question. For Paul replies that, on the contrary, Abraham did know of Christ and that he looked forward to his coming and trusted him as his Savior from sin. He makes three points that support this:

1. Abraham believed the gospel This means that Abraham believed God in regard to spiritual matters (Gal. 3:8). The content of the gospel, as Paul explains it in regard to Abraham, was that "'all nations will be blessed through you.'" This quotation is drawn from Genesis 12:3 (repeated in 18:18 and 22:18), from the very beginning of Abraham's pilgrimage. So Paul is saying that from the very beginning, Abraham's faith was not concerned with mere physical things like an earthly heritage or physical posterity, but with spiritual things, like the blessing of salvation to come upon himself, his descendants, and even other nations. It was faith in the gospel, the good news about salvation.

Understand, then, that Abraham's faith was a very high order. He heard the promise of the land and of an earthly seed. He believed those promises. But what really gripped his mind and heart was the spiritual promise of salvation for all nations. It was for the sake of this blessing, not merely a physical land or an earthly posterity (which he could have had in Ur as well as in Canaan), that Abraham left his father's land and people to go to the new land that God was to show him.

This is how the author of the letter to the Hebrews puts it: "He [Abraham] was looking forward to the city with foundations, whose architect and builder is God" (Heb. 11:10).

2. Abraham's faith concerned redemption. This is a surprising thing to read, but it is what Paul writes: "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law.... in order that the blessing given to Abraham might come to the Gentiles through Christ Jesus..." (Gal. 3:13-14).

"Redemption" is a rich word, as we know from our study of Romans 3:24. It is a commercial term, describing the way in which an object can be ransomed from the marketplace by payment of a price. We know the word chiefly as it is used in the pawn shop business. If you need money in a hurry, one way of getting it is to take an object of some value to a pawnshop and leave it there, in exchange for a fraction of its worth in cash. Later, when you are better off and want to retrieve the object, you can go back to the pawnbroker and repay the money you were given (plus interest), and you will get it back, assuming the object has not been sold in the meantime.

"Redemption" was also used like this in ancient times, but mostly it was used of the redemption of slaves. Slaves were bought and sold in every marketplace of the ancient world. But a slave could be redeemed from slavery if someone was willing to pay a redemption price for him or her.

This is what Jesus did for us. Jesus delivered us from the bondage of sin at the cost of his own life—because he loved us. And that is what Abraham believed! Did Abraham really foresee and believe that? No doubt Abraham did not know as much as those who have lived after the time of Jesus Christ. Those who live on this side of the incarnation know in detail of Jesus' birth, life, death, resurrection, and ascension. We have four gospels to draw this information from. But we must not be so ready to assume that Abraham knew little. Paul says that God "announced the gospel [to him] in advance" (Gal. 3:8), and Jesus said, "Abraham rejoiced at the thought of seeing my day; he saw it and was glad" (John 8:56). What is more natural than that Abraham looked forward to some work of God in delivering the fallen human race from sin's slavery?

3. Abraham believed in the coming of Jesus Christ specifically. This is the final point in Paul's description of Abraham's faith. For having argued that God had announced the gospel to Abraham in advance and that Abraham looked forward to the blessing of God as redemption, Paul says, "The promises were spoken to Abraham and to his seed. The Scripture does not say 'and to seeds,' meaning many people, but 'and to your seed,' meaning one person, who is Christ" (Gal. 3:16).

When we check this out we find that the promise of blessing through a singular descendant of Abraham was given on three occasions: Genesis 12:7; 13:15; and 24:7. Paul is saying that Abraham picked up on this, realizing that this amazing promise was not a promise of blessing through his descendants in some general way but rather a promise of blessing to be achieved by one specific descendant, who was Christ.

Abraham did not know his name, of course. But he was looking forward to the coming of this one individual, and it was through the channel of his faith in Jesus that God declared him to be a justified person.

Faith of the Faithful

We have been studying the faith of Abraham because he is the focus of Paul's attention in this section of Romans. But it is worth saying that the same point can be made about any of the other Old Testament believers. They would all have explained the hope of their salvation in the same terms.

Let's ask a number of them what they "discovered in this matter" (cf. Rom. 4:1).

Here is Adam. Let's start with him. "Adam, you were the first man, and we should assume from this that what you believed in regard to salvation is of value for us. What did you believe in this matter? Did you believe that you could be saved by your works? Or did you have an anticipation of the coming of Jesus Christ and ground your faith in him?"

Adam replies, "You know my sad story, how I sinned by eating of the forbidden fruit and how I carried the human race into sin and death as a result of my transgression. But if you know that, you also know how God appeared to me after my fall and announced the coming of a Savior who would crush the head of Satan, though he would himself be wounded in the process. I did not know who he was at that time, but I believed in him. And I expressed that faith by naming my wife 'Eve,' because she would be the one through whom the gift of spiritual life would come. 'Eve' means 'life giver.' We thought she would give birth to the Messiah. So we named her first son 'Cain,' meaning 'Here he is!' We were wrong in that; it was many thousands of years before our line actually produced Jesus Christ. But we had the right idea, and we were credited with righteousness because of faith in Jesus."

Let's ask Jacob what he "discovered in this matter"—"Jacob, were you saved by your good works or by faith in the deliverer to come?"

Jacob replies, "I wasn't saved by my works—or by my ancestry either, even though I was the grandson of Abraham. I didn't have as much understanding as my grandfather. He was the spiritual giant in our family. But you will recall that as I lay dying I looked forward to the coming of the Savior and said, 'The scepter will not depart from Judah, nor the ruler's staff from between his feet, until he comes to whom it belongs and the obedience of the nations is his' [Gen. 49:10]. I was saved because I believed what God said about that Savior."

Here is Moses. Let's ask him. "Moses, how were you saved?"

Moses replies that even he, the lawgiver, was saved by faith in Jesus Christ and not in any ability he might be supposed to have had to keep God's commandments. "The Lord told me, 'I will raise up for them a prophet like you from among their brothers; I will put my words in his mouth, and he will tell them everything I command him' [Deut. 18:18]. I was saved because I believed that promise."

Our next witness is King David. "Tell us, David, you were called a man after God's own heart, weren't you?" "Yes," replies David.

"That means you tried to think and act as God does. Does that mean that you were saved by your own good works or obedience?"

David explains that he was an adulterer and murderer. "If I had been trusting my works, I wouldn't have had a chance. No, I was saved because I looked forward in faith to that one who God promised would sit upon my throne forever. I knew that a person who would rule forever was no mere man. He must be the Savior-God. I believed that and was saved by him."

What about Isaiah? Isaiah looked forward to the "man of sorrows" who would take our transgressions on himself: "We all, like sheep, have gone astray, each of us has turned to his own way; and the LORD has laid on him the iniquity of us all" (Isa. 53:6).

Daniel prophesied the coming of "the Anointed One" (Dan. 9:25).

Micah revealed that he would be born in Bethlehem (Mic. 5:2).

At the time of Christ, John the Baptist pointed from himself to Jesus as "the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world!" (John 1:29).

God Wants to Be Believed

Now I ask the same question of you. On what basis do you expect to obtain salvation? What do you believe concerning Jesus Christ?

Some years ago Donald Grey Barnhouse, a former pastor of the church I now serve, was talking to a man about the gospel. The conversation had gone on for some time, and the man seemed to be in total darkness. Finally he said, almost in a tone of desperation, "But what does God want?

Tell me, what does God want?"

Barnhouse replied in what he believed was the given insight of the moment: "God wants to be believed. More than anything else God wants to be believed."

There was a moment of dawning wonder in the man's face, and then he said, "I think I see. After all, the honor of God is involved." He believed in Jesus Christ at that moment.

Do you believe in Jesus Christ as your Savior? That is what God declares him to be. Abraham believed what God had revealed to him concerning Jesus Christ, and the righteousness of Christ was credited to Abraham as if it were his own. Adam, Jacob, Moses, David, John the Baptist— all believed the same thing. No one has ever been saved in any other way. So I say, if you have not believed in Jesus Christ as your Savior, believe now. Today is always the day of salvation.

Chapter 53.
David's Testimony

Romans 4:6-8

It is a principle of Old Testament law, stated clearly in Deuteronomy 19:15, that a legal matter must be established by more than one witness. That verse says, "One witness is not enough to convict a man accused of any crime or offense he may have committed. A matter must be established by the testimony of two or three witnesses."

As a former Pharisee and student of the law, the apostle Paul was undoubtedly well acquainted with that principle. In fact, he seems to be employing it in Romans 4:6-8, where he adds the testimony of King David to that of the patriarch Abraham to support his defense of the gospel of justification by the grace of God. Paul has already cited the experience of Abraham, and he will return to him again, for Abraham is referred to repeatedly throughout the remainder of the chapter. But now he brings in the witness of David, citing two verses from the magnificent thirty-second Psalm (vv. 1-2):

> "Blessed are they whose transgressions are forgiven, whose sins are covered.
> Blessed is the man whose sin the Lord will never count against him."

This is a very great testimony.

Greatest of the Kings

When we began our study of Romans 4, taking up the case of Abraham, I pointed out that, with the exception of Jesus Christ, Abraham is the single most important person in the Bible—and that all the other biblical figures, particularly those of the Old Testament, would unquestioningly have looked to Abraham as their father in the faith. Abraham is a giant.

But this does not mean that David, to whose testimony Paul appeals now, was insignificant. David was the greatest of Israel's kings as well as the one who best embodied the nation's devotional spirit and longings, and those to whom Paul was writing would have had the highest possible regard for David also. James Hastings wrote in The Greater Men and Women of the Bible.

The David of Israel is not simply the greatest of her kings; he is the man great in everything. He monopolizes all her institutions. He is her shepherd boy—the representative of her toiling classes. He is her musician—the successor of Jubal and Miriam and Deborah. He is her soldier— the conqueror of the Goliaths that would steal her peace. He is her king—numbering her armies and regulating her polity. He is her priest—substituting a broken and a contrite spirit for the blood of bulls and rams. He is her prophet—presaging with his last breath the everlastingness of his kingdom. He is her poet—most of her psalms are called by his name.

It is hard for us to appreciate the Jews' special regard for King David unless we think of a person in whom the best qualities and achievements of George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, and Abraham Lincoln are combined. And perhaps even that would not quite reach this man's stature.

Importance of the Negative

David is important in the development of Paul's argument in another way also, however, and it is this that makes his testimony particularly telling with us. The words Paul quotes are cast in a negative form, as contrasted with the words about Abraham, which are positive. Abraham was "credited" with righteousness—a positive wording of the justification principle. David speaks of the same principle negatively, even using the same terminology ("credited" means "counted"), saying, "Blessed is the man whose sin the Lord will never count against him."

This negative wording is important for presenting the gospel in our day, as I have indicated, because it speaks to where most people actually are in terms of their spiritual sensitivities.

Let me show what I mean by starting with the positive wording. The positive statement of the justification principle tells us how we can get right with God, which we obviously need to do. But the difficulty is that most people today do not actually feel a need in this area. Martin Luther did; it is what haunted him. He knew he was not right with God, and he anticipated a confrontation with an angry God at the final judgment. God showed him that he could experience a right relationship with God through the work of Jesus Christ. But who feels the intensity of Luther's anguish today? A few people perhaps, but not many. Most people do not think of themselves as being in a wrong relationship to God. On the contrary, they assume that all is well between themselves and God—or at least it ought to be. So they do not feel a need for justification.

This is illustrated by what theologian R. C. Sproul speaks of as "justification by death." Several years ago Sproul tried out the initial question of the Evangelism Explosion program on his son, asking him, "If you should die tomorrow and appear before God at the gates of heaven, and God should ask, 'What right do you have to enter my heaven?' what would you say?"

His son replied, "I'd say, 'Well, I'm dead, aren't I?'"

The point seemed to be that all he needed to do to gain entrance to God's heaven is to die. The righteousness of Christ received by faith did not seem to enter into his son's thinking in the slightest.

Because so many people think or respond this way today, it is necessary to teach the doctrines of justification at length, as I have been trying to do in this exposition of Romans. Yet, when we come to the testimony of King David, just because it is cast in negative form, we come to something that does speak to our contemporaries. It speaks of transgressions. It pictures these as a burden and contrasts them with the blessedness of the person who is freed through God's forgiveness.

This speaks powerfully to our contemporaries, because, as I know from my counseling, nearly everyone carries about the burdens of past sinful actions. Somewhere in the writings of Donald Grey Barnhouse there is a story from early in his ministry—he was about twenty years old at the time—in which a woman came to him for counseling about a terrible crime that had been hanging over her for decades. She was about sixty years old when she came to Barnhouse, and she had killed a man forty years before. He was a boarder in her parents' home, and one day he had abused her sexually. She was so outraged by this that she crept back into his room the next night and turned on the gas jet. The next day, when the police came to investigate the boarder's death, they ruled it an accident, judging that the wind had blown the flame out. Nobody knew what the woman had done, and she had carried the burden of this sin around with her for forty years.

I have never had anyone tell me about a murder he or she has committed, but I have been told enough terrible stories to know that nearly everyone carries around some guilt for past actions.

People have told me of some theft they have committed. Some have harmed other people, lying about them out of jealousy and ruining their chances for promotion, sometimes for marriage.

Others have contributed to the death of another person, not in a direct way (at least so far as what has been told to me), but by their neglect to do what might have saved the person's life or through carelessness—as in a traffic accident, for example. Men are haunted by dishonesty, even criminal acts, in business.

Women are haunted by the memory of an abortion, sometimes multiple abortions. They have been told that there is nothing to feel guilty about, that all they did was submit to "a surgical procedure." But in their hearts they know they killed their child. I have had women ask, "How can I be forgiven for what I did?"

How would you answer such a question?

Sometimes counselors try to reassure a person by suggesting that the action was all right or at least no more evil than what many other people have done. It is a way of "forgiving" the person, the counselor becoming a priest for the occasion. But many who have gone this route know that human forgiveness, while comforting and nice, is not enough. No mere human being can forgive another's sin, particularly if it is against a third party. The only forgiveness of any true value is God's forgiveness—what David is talking about when he writes, "Blessed are they whose transgressions are forgiven, whose sins are covered. Blessed is the man whose sin the Lord will never count against him."

This is what needs to be said to anyone who is conscious of the guilt of past sins. This is the only thing that works. It is the only thing that matters.

David knew the terrible burden of sin as a result of his transgressions. He had committed adultery with Bathsheba, another man's wife, and then he had arranged for her husband Uriah to be killed in order to cover up his sin. He "covered" it over, true. But the guilt of the act was still there. Why? Because David's cover-up was only a form of self-justification, and no one is able properly to justify himself. It was only when David knew his sin to be "covered" by the blood of Christ (v. 7) that he was freed from guilt and could rightly count himself blessed.

The Bliss of This Thought

Are you suffering from guilt for some past action? Does your mind return again and again to the wrong you have done? Is guilt an ever-present companion? If so, you need to experience what David knew as a result of God's grace in reference to his sin. He says three things about it:

1. His sin was forgiven. In the Bible there are a number of Greek words that are translated by our word "forgive" or "forgiveness," all with special meanings. But the word that occurs here is aphethēsan (from the irregular verb aphiēmi), which means "to send off or "to send away." It is the word used in Matthew 13:36, where—in the King James Version—Jesus is said to have "sent the multitude away" so he could explain the parables of that chapter privately to his disciples. The idea is that of separation, and the bearing of the word upon the sin question is that it teaches that God is willing to separate the sinner's transgression and guilt from the sinner. We are not able to do that ourselves. When we humans punish a crime it is always by punishing the offender, simply because there is no other way of doing it. But God, for whom all things are possible, does separate the sin from the sinner, placing the sin upon Jesus Christ, where it is punished.

This is what the author of Hebrews was talking about when he said, "Christ was sacrificed once to take away the sins of many people" (Heb. 9:28a).

It is what Peter intended when he wrote, "He himself bore our sins in his own body on the tree, so that we might die to sins and live for righteousness..." (1 Peter 2:24).

One of the ways the ancients sometimes punished the crime of murder was to bind the victim's corpse to the murderer so he was forced to carry about the decaying body of his victim until he himself was destroyed. It is a horrible picture, but a true portrait of what it means to bear the burden of one's sin and guilt. It was what Paul was perhaps thinking of when he cried out, later on in Romans, "Who will rescue me from this body of death?" (Rom. 7:24b). Who? Paul gave the answer in the very next verse: God alone through the atonement of Jesus Christ. And what bliss to be delivered! If you can keep the image of the decaying corpse in mind, you may begin to appreciate what it means to be separated from the corrupting influence of the sin you have committed and know the joy of forgiveness.

Horatio G. Spafford knew that joy and wrote movingly:

> My sin—O the bliss of this glorious thought!— My sin, not in part, but the whole, Is nailed to the cross and I bear it no more; Praise the Lord, praise the Lord, O my soul!

2. His sin was covered. This is a different idea from the thought of David's sin being forgiven, or "sent away," but it is not easy at first glance to determine what the term is getting at. The reason is simple. "Covered" (epekalyphthēsan) is one of that special class of words used only once in the New Testament. Obviously, then, the word was not common, and it would probably not even have been used by Paul here except for the fact that it was in the Septuagint version of the Old Testament text he is quoting.

However, the fact that the idea is drawn from the Old Testament gives us an important clue for interpreting it. For as soon as we ask, "Where in the Old Testament do we find the idea of the covering over of sin?" we immediately think of the work the high priest performed on the Day of Atonement. On that day the priest took the blood of a sacrifice, made moments before in the courtyard of the temple, and sprinkled it on the Mercy Seat, the covering of the Ark of the Covenant. The Ark contained the law of Moses, which everyone had broken. Without the sacrifice it is a picture of judgment. But when the broken law was covered by the blood of the sacrifice in this ceremony, God saw that an innocent victim had died in place of those who were guilty, his judgment was turned aside, and his love was released to save sinners.

I think this is what is involved here, and it is why I contrasted David's covering over of his sin with the entirely different "covering" provided by God. David's covering was merely a hiding or denying of his sin. God's covering was a true punishing of sin. It is because sin has actually and truly been punished in Christ that you and I, if we come to Christ, can find release from sin's burden.

If this is what David was thinking of, I find support for this interpretation of "covered" in the thought that the two ideas of sin being "taken away" and "covered" are illustrated by the two parallel acts of the priests of Israel on the Day of Atonement. "Covered" would refer to the covering over of sin by blood sprinkled on the Mercy Seat. "Taken away" would refer to the ceremony performed earlier in the day, in which the sins of the people were confessed over the head of a goat (called the "scapegoat"), which was then driven away into the wilderness. This later rite pictured the removal of the people's sins from them.

3. His sin was not counted against him. The final word David uses of God's handling of his sin is the one we have chiefly been studying here: "counted," "credited," or "reckoned." This is a bookkeeping term, as we have noted, the point being that God would not list the sins of those he was saving in their own ledgers. How would we express this thought? We would probably say, "Happy is the person to whom God has given a clean slate." Or, "How wonderful to be able to start again with no black marks against you."

Perhaps that is too wonderful to be true! Is it? We think so if we think in human terms. But it is not "too wonderful" if we think as God thinks or trust what he says about the striking away of our transgressions.

God says, "I will forgive their wickedness and will remember their sins no more" (Jer. 31:34b). The psalmist declares, "As far as the east is from the west, so far has he removed our transgressions from us" (Ps. 103:12).

Those are great statements, but they are supported by the even greater truth that God has dealt with our sins at the cross of Christ. They have been punished there, and that is why they are removed from us as far as the east is from the west, and why they are remembered by God no more.

Never, Never

There is one more word in Paul's citation of David's testimony that deserves special consideration, because it contrasts so keenly with things human. It is the word never, which occurs in the sentence, "Blessed is the man whose sin the Lord will never count against him."

Never means never, and it must be taken at full value here, even though the opposite is almost always the case in human relationships. We all know the kind of forgiveness in which a person reluctantly accepts our apology and says that he will forgive us. But we know as he says this that he is not forgetting what happened, that our offense will linger in his mind and will probably be brought out against us in the future. Parents have a way of doing this with their children, never forgetting some foolish action they did years ago and periodically reminding them of it. We adults do it with one another, and it is harmful.

This text tells us that God is not like that. It tells us that once he has forgiven us for our sin through the work of Christ, he will never, never bring it up to us again. He will not bring it up in this life, never remind us of something in the past. He will always begin with us precisely where we are in the present. And he will never bring it up at the day of judgment. Why? Because it is truly forgiven. It will never be remembered anymore.

That is real "blessedness," which is the terminology David uses. And my concluding question is this: Why trade away that blessedness for the false blessings offered by this world?

The world does offer its blessings, of course. It is how it holds its victims. It offers material things chiefly, but it also offers intangibles such as a good reputation, success, happiness, and such items. Let me remind you that you can have all these things and more and still be miserable—if the burden of your sin is not lifted. David is an example. He was the king of a most favored nation. He had wealth and reputation. But the very psalm from which the verses we have been studying are taken describes what he was like before his sin was forgiven. He wrote that when he kept silent about his sin, trying to hush it up, "my bones wasted away through my groaning all day long. For day and night your hand was heavy upon me; my strength was sapped as in the heat of summer" (Ps. 32:3-4). But because David found forgiveness with God, the burden of his sin rolled away, his strength was restored, and he could write: "Blessed is the man whose sin the Lord will never count against him." I commend that very great blessing to you.

Chapter 54.
Salvation Without Ceremony

Romans 4:9-12

The human mind is a very subtle thing, and at no point is it more subtle than in trying to make excuses for its conduct. Richard Harris Barham (1788-1845) was an English clergyman who frequently missed morning chapel during his student years at Oxford. Chapel was at 7:00 A.M., but Barham was almost always up too late the night before. When he was reproached for his failure by his tutor, he excused himself by saying, "The fact is, sir, chapel is too late for me. I am a man of regular habits, and I can't sit up until seven in the morning. Unless I get to bed by four or five o'clock at the latest, I'm good for nothing the next day."

My favorite improvised excuse was made by Chico Marx of the famous Marx Brothers. When his wife caught him kissing a chorus girl, Chico explained, "I wasn't kissing her; I was whispering in her mouth."

The Example of Abraham

We remember from our study of the first verses of Romans 4 that in this chapter Paul is attempting to prove the gospel from the Old Testament. His chief example and the basis of the proof is Abraham, patriarch of the Jewish people and the one to whom they looked as their spiritual model. If Paul can show that Father Abraham was saved by the grace of God in Christ, received by the channel of human faith, he has made his point and established the doctrine. Paul shows that Abraham was saved through faith and not by works by quoting Genesis 15:6. That important text says, "Abraham believed God, and it was credited to him as righteousness" (v. 3).

Having proved his point concerning Abraham, Paul then adds a second witness. This witness is David, and the words Paul cites in Romans 4:7-8 are a statement drawn from the thirty-second Psalm: "'Blessed are they whose transgressions are forgiven, whose sins are covered. Blessed is the man whose sin the Lord will never count against him'" (cf. Ps. 32:1-2).

The case should be clear-cut: Abraham was saved by faith apart from human works; we must be saved by faith, too. But here is where the excuse-making subtlety of the unbelieving mind enters in.

"But surely there must be more to it than that," objects the skeptic. "What about circumcision? I know you said earlier that circumcision is an external thing and that God looks not on externals, but on the heart. But, after all, Abraham was circumcised, wasn't he? And circumcision was given to Abraham by God. It has been practiced by Jews down through the many centuries since Abraham's time. That has to mean something. If it does, then it is not right to say that Abraham was saved by faith alone. He was at least saved by circumcision, too, or perhaps by it rather than by faith. If God gave circumcision, circumcision must be meritorious."

Today, in the same way, people would argue for the redeeming value of baptism or even the Lord's Supper. Jesus Christ gave both to us. Since he did, isn't it right to say that we are saved, at least in part, by the sacraments?

It should not require a degree in logic to see the error of these arguments. They state that if ceremonies are given by God, they must count for something, and if they do, they must be valuable for attaining salvation. But that does not follow. Just because "A" is valuable for "B" does not mean that it is necessarily valuable for "C," unless it can be shown that "B" and "C" are the same thing. If "A" equals "B," and "B" equals "C," then "A" also equals "C." But this is not true if "B" and "C" are different. That is the case here. Circumcision (or any other sacrament) does have value. Paul is going to explain circumcision's value as being a "sign" and a "seal" of the righteousness that is received by faith. But this is not the same thing as saying that it is the ground on which a person receives that righteousness in the first place.

Paul's argument is even stronger than this, however. In these verses Paul asks when it was that Abraham was declared to be righteous by God. That is, when was he saved? Was it after he was circumcised, or before? If it was after, circumcision might be supposed to have entered into his justification in some way. It may have contributed to it. But if it was before, then—whatever circumcision signifies—it obviously does not enter into salvation and is not the basis on which Abraham or anyone else has been justified.

When was it? The answer is clear. As we have already seen in a previous study, Abraham was declared to be justified in Genesis 15:6, but we are not told he was given the sacrament of circumcision until Genesis 17, which describes a period of his life fourteen years later.

Therefore, since Abraham was not saved by circumcision, he can be cited as the father not only of Jews, who are circumcised, but of everyone, even those who are not. He is the father of the justified. Because he was circumcised, he is the spiritual father of those Jewish people who not only are circumcised but who have also believed on Jesus Christ. And because he was declared to be justified before he was circumcised, he is also the spiritual father of those who have not been circumcised but who, like believing Jews, have also believed in Jesus.

F. Godet says rightly of this teaching, "The apostle has succeeded in discovering the basis of Christian universalism in the very life of him in whose person theocratic particularism was founded." That is, the Jews had been basing their hopes of being saved as Jews on Abraham. But the example of Abraham actually proves that God saves people through Christ regardless of their origins.

Another writer says, "Paul has turned the Jew's boast upside down. It is not the Gentile that must come to the Jew's circumcision for salvation; it is the Jew who must come to a Gentile faith, such faith as Abraham had long before he was circumcised." Do you realize the importance of that?

If you are a Jew and are saved, it is not because you are a Jew. It is because of the work of Jesus Christ. If you are a Gentile and are saved, it is not because of anything you are or have done as a Gentile. It is because of the work of Jesus Christ. No one is saved because he or she has been baptized or confirmed or gone to Mass or shared in the communion service. A person is saved through faith in the perfect and completed work of Christ. Either you have been saved by him, or you have not been saved at all. It is by faith and not by works that one is justified.

A God-Given Sign

There is a valid question still to be asked at this point, of course, and it is this: If Abraham was saved by faith apart from circumcision, which he must have been if he was declared to be justified fourteen years before circumcision was given to him, why was this rite given? If Abraham was not saved by circumcision, didn't the giving of circumcision just muddy the waters? Or, to put the question in other terms, what is the purpose of the sacraments anyway?

This is a good Bible passage from which to ask these questions, because it contains in one place (in fact, in one verse) the two most important words in the Bible for understanding what the sacraments are about. The words are: (1) "sign" and (2) "seal."

Let's take the word sign first. Paul writes that Abraham "received the sign of circumcision" (v. 11). What does that mean? Well, in simple language a sign is a visible object that points to something different from and greater than itself. To review what I noted in a previous study, here are some examples. If you are driving along the New Jersey Turnpike going north and see a sign that says, "New York 125 Miles," you understand that New York City is 125 miles ahead of you. The sign is not New York, but it points to New York. Though it is less than the city—much less—it is not without value.

Here is the other example: You are driving down a certain road and you see a sign over a diner that says, "Joe's Place." This sign does what the sign in my first example does; it points to the diner as "Joe's Place." But in this case, the sign does something more as well. It indicates ownership; it shows that this particular diner is Joe's.

I use that example in addition to the first one because it introduces a second important element into this discussion. On the first level, the sacrament, being a sign, points to something different from and greater than itself. In the case of circumcision, it is a case of pointing to the covenant God established with Abraham based on the work of Christ. In the case of the New Testament sacraments, baptism and the Lord's Supper, it is the same. The Lord's Supper in particular points back to Christ's death: "This is my body given for you..." and "This cup is the new covenant in my blood, which is poured out for you" (Luke 22:19-20). But on the second level, these sacraments also indicate ownership. They show that we belong to Christ and that we no longer belong to ourselves.

Baptism especially does this, being an initiatory sacrament. Its whole meaning concerns ownership by or identification with Jesus. This is one reason why, under normal circumstances, baptism is to be a public rather than a private act. It is one important way by which believers are to testify before the world that they are Christ's. On the other hand, baptism is also a testimony to the believers themselves. For if times come into a believer's life, as they seem always to do, when the person begins to doubt whether he or she is actually saved or has been claimed by Christ, the memory of baptism can be an important means of the person's being reassured and strengthened in faith.

This was the case with Martin Luther. It has been reported of Luther that there were times late in his life when he was discouraged and seemed to be confused about everything, no doubt because of the strain and mental fatigue of being in the forefront of the Protestant Reformation in Germany for so many years. Luther questioned the value of the Reformation. He questioned his faith. He even questioned the work of Jesus Christ. But when those times came, we are told, Luther would write in chalk on the table two Latin words: Baptizatus sum! ("I have been baptized!"). That reality would strengthen him, and he would remember that he really was Christ's and had been identified with him in his death and resurrection.

A Seal of Christ's Righteousness

The second word Paul uses to discuss the nature of the sacraments, whether circumcision, baptism, or the Lord's Supper, is "seal." He writes that Abraham's circumcision was "a seal of the righteousness that he had by faith while he was still uncircumcised" (v. 11).

What is a seal? We do not use seals very often today, but we have enough examples to illustrate their meaning and importance. Suppose you want to go abroad. You have to secure a passport issued by the government of the United States. You apply for it, submitting two recent pictures of yourself. When it comes you find that one of the photos has been affixed to the passport with a seal: the great seal of the United States. It is stamped into the passport in such a way that it is impossible to remove or alter the photo without damaging and thus invalidating the document. This seal indicates that the authority of the United States government stands behind the passport in affirming that the person whose picture appears there is a true citizen of the United States.

The other use of seals with which we are familiar is the affixing of these to a legal document by a Notary Public. The notary asks us to swear that the representations in the document are true and then affixes his or her seal to validate the transaction.

Sacraments operate in this way. In the case of Abraham, Paul says that circumcision was "a seal of the righteousness that he had by faith while he was still uncircumcised." That is, after Abraham had believed God and God had imparted righteousness to him, God gave the seal of circumcision to validate what had happened. In the same way, baptism is a seal that the person being baptized has been identified with Jesus Christ as his disciple, and the elements of the Lord's Supper, when received, indicate that the person has taken Jesus to himself as intimately and as inseparably as eating bread and drinking wine.

Important?

Yes, the sacraments are important as signs and seals of what has happened spiritually and invisibly, but not as a means of salvation.

The Father of All

The last portion of our text teaches that because Abraham was saved by faith before he was circumcised, he has become the father of all who are truly saved, both Jew and Gentile. This does not mean that no one had been justified before Abraham. Adam, Abel, Enoch, Noah, and other early believers were also justified by faith. But it does mean that in Abraham's case the way of salvation was made explicit in Scripture for the first time; therefore, all who have been saved trace their spiritual ancestry to him.

What a host of spiritual descendants this man had!

There are Jewish descendants, first of all. Abraham was followed in the faith by Isaac and then by Jacob. They were not the giants Abraham was. But each looked forward to the Messiah who would come, and God referred to himself by using their names, declaring himself many times to be "the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob."

David is in that ancestry, as we have already seen. So were all the believing kings. The prophets were in this ancestry, too. Isaiah followed in the steps of Abraham when he trusted, not in his own good works or in his obedience to the sacraments, but in the One who was yet to come. So also did Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and all the minor prophets.

At the time of Jesus there were many who took their places in this line of Abraham's descendants, people like Mary and Joseph, Anna, Simeon, and others. And then there at last was John the Baptist, who pointed to Jesus as "the Lamb of God, who takes away the sins of the world!" (John 1:29).

The eleven disciples were among this group of believers: Simon Peter, James, John, Nathanael, Andrew, Philip, Matthew, and the rest. Later, Paul joined their ranks, and Barnabas, and the early deacons of the church. So did John Mark, who wrote the second Gospel.

These were all Jews and were therefore in the great company of those "who not only are circumcised but who also walk in the footsteps of the faith that our father Abraham had before he was circumcised" (v. 12).

What of those other spiritual descendants of Abraham, the Gentiles? At first this was only a trickle, like Israel itself once was. This stream grew slowly, but it contained people like Caleb, who became a member of the tribe of Judah but was originally a Kenizzite or foreigner. There was Rahab of Jericho and Ruth of Moab and Naaman, the Syrian general.

What about the Magi, who are introduced to us at the birth of Jesus? Are we to think that God brought them all the way to Jerusalem from their distant eastern homeland and then allowed them to return unconverted? They were Gentiles and uncircumcised, but they were brought to faith in the Jews' Messiah. These Gentiles saw the Lord Jesus Christ as a child and worshiped him.

During Christ's lifetime we are introduced to such believing Gentiles as the Syro-Phoenician woman and the centurion who approached Jesus on behalf of his paralyzed and suffering servant. Each of these was praised for his or her great faith. There is also, of course, the woman of Samaria.

Later, after the resurrection, Philip preached the gospel to a devout Ethiopian, and the Ethiopian believed. Then Philip went up the coast of Palestine, preaching in Gentile cities where, we may suppose, many more Gentiles believed. Peter took the gospel to the Roman soldier Cornelius, and was used to open the door of the gospel to the Gentiles in an official way.

At Antioch the church grew among Gentiles particularly. Many of its teachers were Gentiles: Simeon called Niger (probably a black man), Lucius of Cyrene, Manaen (who had been brought up with Herod the Tetrarch). When the missionary journeys began, Paul picked up such uncircumcised believers as Luke, who was from Macedonia and who later wrote the third Gospel and Acts, and Titus, who was not circumcised, although pressures were apparently exerted to have him be (cf. Gal. 2:3), and these men worked with him.

In the greetings appended to Paul's letters we discover the names of Gentiles who were added to the church, many through Paul's ministry—people like Apollos, Stephanus, Fortunatus, Philemon, Gaius, and Erastus, and the believing slaves Tertius, Quartus, and Onesimus.

These people were all uncircumcised, but Abraham became their father, too, since "he is the father of all who believe but who have not been circumcised, in order that righteousness might be credited to them" (v. 11).

A Spiritual Ancestor

The great British statesman William Gladstone (1809-1898) once visited an antique shop and was struck by a seventeenth-century oil painting he found there. It portrayed an aristocrat dressed in an old Spanish costume with a ruff, plumed hat, and lace cuffs. Gladstone wanted to buy it, but it was too expensive. Sometime later he visited the home of a rich London merchant and saw the portrait hanging on his wall. His host noticed him looking at the picture and said, "Do you like it? It is a portrait of one of my ancestors, a minister at the court of Queen Elizabeth."

Gladstone, who knew this was untrue, replied, "For three pounds less he would have been my ancestor."

I do not know who your ancestors have been, whether they have been worthy or quite undistinguished, or even whether you know who they are. But I do know this: You can step into the long ranks of the greatest honor roll of ancestors any human being could ever have and it will not cost you even a single cent—though it will cost you your pretensions. It is the ancestral line of Abraham. You need only believe on the Lord Jesus Christ as your Savior, and this great company of the faithful will become your family tree.

Chapter 55.
The Steps of Faith

Romans 4:12

In Paul's proof of the gospel from the life of Abraham there is a phrase that is worth returning to, even though I have passed by it in the preceding discussion. That phrase is "footsteps of the faith." To walk in another's footsteps means walking in single file so that the ground covered by the leader is covered in turn by each follower. This suggests a journey, and it is for this that I return here to the footsteps idea. Sometimes we think of the Christian life only in terms of fixed, past decisions like being "born again" or "deciding for Jesus." There are times when decisions must be made, of course, and being born again does indeed happen only once in our lives. But we can go overboard with such an approach, thinking that, if these decisions have been made or these experiences have happened to us once, there is very little to be expected from then on. Actually, those events are only a beginning of the Christian life, and true Christianity is more like a pilgrimage in which every step is to be taken by faith and in the same direction, the direction marked out for us by Abraham.

Abraham was a pilgrim throughout his entire life, and we are to be also. Like him, we are to live "looking forward to the city with foundations, whose builder and maker is God" (Heb. 11:10).

The Obedience of Faith

Abraham's faith is measured by several clearly defined steps, and it is useful to look at each in turn. The first was his calling by God and his response to that call while he was in Ur of the Chaldeans. This is recounted in Genesis 12:1-9 and is referred to in Hebrews 11: "By faith Abraham, when called to go to a place he would later receive as his inheritance, obeyed and went, even though he did not know where he was going" (v. 8).

There are two important things about this initial step in Abraham's faith-pilgrimage. First, it was initiated entirely by God. Abraham did not seek God of himself any more than we do. In fact, Abraham was a worshiper of false gods and at the start had no appreciation of the true God at all (cf. Josh. 24:2). He was in the category of those who have repressed the truth lest the knowledge of the true God spring up to force a change of allegiance in their lives and a reordering of their lifestyles. The fact that Abraham did follow after the true God was due solely to God's initiative.

Nothing could be clearer than this from the verses in Genesis 12 that describe God's call (vv. 1-3, 7). They contain seven great "I will"s.

1. "I will show you [a land]."
2. "I will make you into a great nation."
3. "I will bless you."
4. "I will make your name great."
5. "I will bless those who bless you."
6. "I will curse [those who curse you]" and later, after Abraham had reached Canaan,
7. "I will give [you] this land."

In no case does Abraham do anything to merit the appearance of God to him. Nor does he contribute anything to the promises God utters. It is a matter of election, pure and simple, as in our own salvation.

"But surely Abraham did something?" someone queries. That is true, of course, and it is the second important thing about Abraham's initial step of faith: Abraham obeyed God (Heb. 11:8). But notice, this came after God's commands and was provoked by it. God told Abraham, "Leave your country, your people and your father's household and go to the land I will show you" (v. 1), and Abraham did. The text says, "So Abram [Abraham] left, as the LORD had told him..." (v. 4). This is why Hebrews refers to this step as obedience.

We would think about the Christian life more accurately than we do if we would learn to think of our own responses to God in this way. And our presentation of the gospel would be more accurate, too. The way we usually present the gospel suggests that we think of becoming a Christian as a work of ours—"deciding for Jesus" or "letting Jesus into our hearts." But that makes it all man-centered. It would be better if we thought of faith simply as obedience to what God tells us to do.

To Be a Pilgrim

The second stage of Abraham's walk of faith concerns his early years in the Promised Land. In one sense, Abraham had arrived. He was now where God had sent him. But, at the same time, Abraham knew that he was only a pilgrim in this earthly land, since his true goal and inheritance from God was in heaven. The author of Hebrews makes this plain by saying, "By faith he made his home in the promised land like a stranger in a foreign country; he lived in tents, as did Isaac and Jacob, who were heirs with him of the same promise. For he was looking forward to the city with foundations, whose architect and maker is God" (Heb. 11:9-10).

We have a hymn in English that uses the pilgrim image, but in a way that suggests a wrong idea.
It states:

> A pilgrim was I, and a wand'ring,
> In the cold night of sin I did roam,
> When Jesus the kind shepherd found me, And now I am on my way home.
>
> John W. Peterson, 1958

That is a pretty rhyme, of course, and it is true for the most part. But its use of the word pilgrim suggests that this is what we were before Jesus found us and that now we are no longer pilgrims. Actually a pilgrim is what we have become.

To be a pilgrim, two things must have happened to us. First, we must have left home. Abraham did that. God told him to leave his country, his people, and his father's household. Similarly, we are called to leave our past to follow Jesus. This is why Jesus told us to deny ourselves and take up our cross daily and follow him (cf. Luke 9:23). It is why he said, "If anyone comes to me and does not hate his father and mother, his wife and children, his brothers and sisters—yes, even his own life—he cannot be my disciple" (Luke 14:26). Of course, the One who taught us to love one another was not teaching us literally to hate members of our family. Rather, he was teaching that all lesser loyalties must be subordinated to our loyalty to him. We must turn our backs on anything that would keep us from one-hundred-percent discipleship.

And that is the second characteristic of a pilgrim: discipleship, or following after Jesus. A person who has merely left home is not a pilgrim. He is a vagrant, a drifter. To be a pilgrim, a man must have his eyes on the goal to which he is moving.

This does not mean that a Christian cannot have warm human friendships. In fact, Christian friendships will be greater and deeper than those of non-Christians, if only because people will have become more valuable than things to a Christian. And speaking of "things," living the pilgrim life does not mean that Christians cannot also have a reasonable share of earthly riches.

Abraham, though a pilgrim, became a rich man. He had flocks and herds and servants. Yet he was a pilgrim still. Why? Donald Grey Barnhouse answers:

[Because he left] his native land and [began] to walk with God, everything he owned was now held in the reality of its true and eternal value. Nothing was held for any intrinsic worth. Henceforth all that was touched or possessed was looked upon as a gift from God—of value if it enhanced the glory of God and brought the Lord nearer to the heart, and of no value at all if it caused the light of God to grow dim and the memory of the glory to fade.

I am sure that God wants some who are following this study to be more truly pilgrims for God than they have ever been. You may complain that you have too many worldly matters to worry about—a job, a home, a mortgage, and such—and that you are too old to take a rigorous following of Jesus Christ seriously. If that is what you are thinking, consider Abraham. He had many possessions even when he started out from Haran (Gen. 12:5), but they did not stop his pilgrimage. Moreover, Abraham was already seventy-five years old (v. 4). He lived to be one hundred and seventy-five. Even by the life-expectancy standards of his day, he was already what we would call middle-aged when God called him.

How about you? If you are following in the footsteps of Abraham, doesn't God want you to be a true pilgrim?

God of the Impossible

The next stage of Abraham's faith-journey is a great one, but I will not take much time to discuss it now, since it is brought into the story just a few verses further on in Romans (4:18-22). We will consider it in full when we get to that passage, for it is a most important part of the picture.

God had promised Abraham that he would have numerous descendants, as numerous as the stars in heaven (Gen. 15:5). Yet, although Abraham was seventy-five years old when he started out for Canaan, eleven more years passed and he and his wife, Sarah, remained childless. It became a great problem for them—an embarrassment, of course. But more than that, it was a spiritual problem, since God's promise of a deliverer from sin was wrapped up in his promise of a son from Abraham's "own body" (v. 4). Abraham and Sarah's hope was set on this promise, as it should have been. Yet for all those long years no son was born to them.

We know the story. The matter became so unsettling to Sarah that she gave her servant girl, Hagar, to Abraham to see if he could raise up an heir through her. Hagar did conceive. The child was Ishmael. But this was not God's doing, and God later appeared to tell Abraham that he had not forgotten his promise and that the son long anticipated would be born within the year.

At this point Abraham was ninety-nine years old and Sarah was eighty-nine. Earlier, when Ishmael had been conceived, the act of intercourse was by Abraham's own physical strength. Now he was past the age of engendering a child, and Sarah was past the age of childbearing. If there was to be a child at this stage, a miracle was required. But this is precisely what Abraham was enabled to trust God for. That is why the author of Hebrews writes, "By faith Abraham, even though he was past age—and Sarah herself was barren—was enabled to become a father because he considered him faithful who had made the promise. And so from this one man, and he as good as dead, came descendants as numerous as the stars in the sky and as countless as the sand on the seashore" (Heb. 11:11-12).

It is why Paul says in Romans, "Against all hope, Abraham in hope believed and so became the father of many nations, just as it had been said to him, 'So shall your offspring be.' Without weakening in his faith, he faced the fact that his body was as good as dead—since he was about a hundred years old—and that Sarah's womb was also dead. Yet he did not waver through unbelief regarding the promise of God, but was strengthened in his faith and gave glory to God, being fully persuaded that God had power to do what he had promised" (Rom. 4:18-21).

Do you have a faith like that? Faith in the "God of the impossible"?

I admit that this is a very high example of faith, which is why it is so often referred to favorably in the New Testament. But I maintain that in essence this is the same faith we should have—if we are true Christians. The God we worship is the God of Abraham, after all, and God is in the business of bringing forth faith like this in all those who know him. God brings life out of death. Your own conversion is an example! He brings love out of hate, peace out of turmoil, joy out of misery, praise out of cursing, and miracles to those who trust him. Many can testify to these wonders personally if they have been following in the footsteps of Abraham.

In Search of Understanding

The author of Hebrews ends his overview of Abraham's walk of faith with a fourth incident, and, taking my clue from him, I end with this account, too. It concerns Abraham's willingness to sacrifice his son on Mount Moriah. The text says, "By faith Abraham, when God tested him, offered Isaac as a sacrifice. He who had received the promises was about to sacrifice his one and only son, even though God had said to him, 'It is through Isaac that your offspring will be reckoned.' Abraham reasoned that God could raise the dead, and figuratively speaking, he did receive Isaac back from death" (Heb. 11:17-19).

To appreciate this story we must review the previous one, remembering that Isaac had been born to Abraham in his old age and that he had been identified specifically as the son of God's promise. That is, he was the one through whom the Messiah was to come.

Because Isaac had been born so late in Abraham's life, and Abraham had come to love him greatly, the call to sacrifice him was at the very least a test of Abraham's devotion to God. Had Isaac grown too dear to Abraham? Had he begun to take the place of God in the aged patriarch's affections? The Chinese evangelist Watchman Nee thought so and wrote that "Isaac represents many gifts of God's grace. Before God gives them our hands are empty. Afterwards they are full." As a result, when God reaches out his hand to take ours in fellowship, we have no hand to give him and the things that have filled our hands must go. "Isaac can be done without," Nee wrote, "but God is eternal."

Isaac may have begun to take the place of God in Abraham's thinking, though we cannot be sure of that. The Bible does not teach it. But one thing the Bible does teach is that the testing of Abraham was spiritual and that it involved Abraham's perception of who God is and whether or not the aged patriarch would continue to trust him as the only truthful God.

In my more extensive study of this incident in Genesis: An Expositional Commentary, I have written:

The problem was not merely that Abraham loved Isaac. That was true enough. What was even more important was that God had promised that all future blessings, including the blessing of salvation, were to come through Isaac. God had told Abraham that Isaac was to live, marry, and have a family, and that from that family there would come one who would be the deliverer. Now God says that Isaac is to be sacrificed, and for the first time in all Abraham's experience with God he is confronted by a conflict between God's command and God's promise. Earlier, Abraham had been tested as to whether he would believe that God could do the seemingly impossible task of giving Abraham and Sarah a son. That was a test, but it was not as hard as this one. This test involved a conflict apparently within the words of God himself. God had promised posterity through Isaac. But God had now also commanded Abraham to kill him.

How could this problem be resolved? There were only two ways. Abraham could have concluded that God was erratic, wavering from one plan to another because he did not know his own mind. This had not been Abraham's experience of God. The long wait for the son had taught him better than that. Or Abraham could have concluded that, although he—being finite and sinful—was unable to see the resolution of the difficulty, God could nevertheless be trusted to have a resolution, which he would certainly disclose in due time. This was the harder of the two solutions to accept, but Abraham's experience of God led in this direction.

Abraham acted in a manner consistent with his knowledge of God. That is, he trusted him, concluding that whatever God's purposes may or may not have been in this situation, God had at least shown that he could not be his enemy. God was his friend.... So Abraham believed God and acted, even though he could not understand the solution to the difficulty.

Did I say "could not understand the solution to the difficulty"? Perhaps in the fullest sense. But the power of the story comes from the fact that Abraham did come to understand it somewhat. In other words, it was a case of what Anselm of Canterbury described centuries later by the words

"faith in search of understanding."

It must have gone something like this: Abraham must have reasoned, "God is no liar. He told me beyond any question that I would have a son, and I have had one, though in my old age. Isaac stands beside me now. He is a proof of God's faithfulness. But God has also said that Isaac will have children through whom the Messiah will come. Isaac is not married. He has no children. If I put him to death, the promises of God cannot be fulfilled. Here is a contradiction. But there are no contradictions in God. This is a foundational truth. What must I conclude then? Since I am commanded to sacrifice Isaac and since, at the same time, God cannot be unfaithful to himself, the only solution I can imagine is that God is going to do a miracle and bring Isaac back from the dead. There will have to be a resurrection."

But, Abraham, there has never been a resurrection in the whole history of the world!

"That does not matter," Abraham replies. "A resurrection is compatible with the nature of God. Since God is the author of life, it would be a small matter for him to bring life back into a dead body. But the one thing God cannot do is lie. God must tell the truth. He must keep his promises. Therefore, I expect a resurrection."

Apparently, Abraham really did expect a resurrection, for when he got to the base of the mountain he told his servants, "Stay here with the donkey while I and the boy go over there. We will worship and then we [plural!] will come back to you" (Gen. 22:5). In other words, Abraham fully intended to sacrifice his son in obedience to God. But he expected that God would then raise Isaac from the dead so that he and the boy could return home together.

This is true faith. It is faith in search of understanding.

Obedience from First to Last

There is one more thing. At the very end of the account, after Abraham has proceeded to the point of binding Isaac and raising his knife and God has intervened to stay his hand and provide a ram as a substitute, the angel of the Lord speaks to praise Abraham. But what Abraham is praised for—notice this, it is of great importance—is not his perception in figuring out God's plan or even the magnitude of what we might call his "blind faith," but his obedience. It is how the story ends. The angel speaks for God again, saying, "Your descendants will take possession of the cities of their enemies, and through your offspring all nations on earth will be blessed, because you have obeyed me" (Gen. 22:18b).

That is where the story began, too—with Abraham's obedience in leaving his own land and setting out for Canaan. Faith begins with obedience. Faith ends with obedience. It is a matter of obedience from the very first to the very last, until we appear before God and see him face to face.

If you are in Abraham's line, if you walk in his footsteps, you must obey God in all things. It is through obedience that faith grows.

Chapter 56.
Salvation Apart from Law

Romans 4:13-17

During my years of formal education, when I had scores of books to read for classes, I developed a way of looking at the assigned texts that helped me get through them. I regarded the fifteen or twenty books for one course and the dozen or so books for another course as enemy soldiers that had to be shot down before I could win the war. Each time I finished a book I would say, "There's another dead soldier."

I mention this now because there is a sense in which the apostle Paul, too, has been shooting down enemy soldiers. In Romans 4 his war is for the gospel, of course, and the champions that have been sent to do battle against him have been formidable. Thus far there have been two of them. The first was "Works." This is the soldier almost everyone believes in, the people's favorite. But Paul shot him down with an arrow from Genesis 15:6, which proved that Abraham was justified by faith in God's promise, rather than by works. Since Abraham is the Old Testament pattern of a justified and godly man, his experience sets the pattern for those who follow him.

The second soldier was "Circumcision." This champion was peculiar to the Jews and seemed to have the blessing of God behind him, since, after all, God had himself established circumcision. Paul defeats this mighty foe by showing that Abraham was declared to be justified by God years before circumcision was imposed on him and his descendants.

The last of the enemy's heroes is "Law." Paul will shoot this soldier down in the next two paragraphs of his letter (vv. 13-17).

An Additional Argument

It is important to notice his change in strategy, however. When Paul was arguing against circumcision as a way of salvation, he used a temporal or historical argument, as we have seen. He showed that Abraham is said to have been justified when he was about eighty-five years old (cf. Gen. 15:6), but that he was not given the rite of circumcision until he was ninety-nine, about fourteen years later (cf. Gen. 17). Since Abraham was declared to have been justified before he was circumcised, the rite of circumcision could not have been the basis of his justification.

That type of argument could also have been used at this later point in the text, in reference to the giving of the law of God to Israel. In fact, in a similar discussion in his letter to the Galatians, this is precisely what Paul does. He says, "The law, introduced 430 years later, does not set aside the covenant previously established by God and thus do away with the promise. For if the inheritance depends on the law, then it no longer depends on a promise; but God in his grace gave it to Abraham through a promise" (Gal. 3:17-18). As an argument from history, the denial of the law's role in salvation is even stronger than the denial of circumcision's role, for the law was given through Moses more than four centuries after Abraham's day, while circumcision was given only fourteen years after the patriarch was said to have been justified.

But Paul does not use this argument in Romans 4. Instead he speaks of the results of trying to live by law, showing that by nature law is contrary to both faith and promise and that the inevitable result for those who choose this bad option is God's wrath.

Why does Paul take this approach? Why does he not argue from a time sequence, as he does in Galatians? It may not be possible to assign a sure reason for this, but we have a clue in the fact that Paul does not use the direct article ("the") before the occurrences of the word law in verses 13-15, whereas, by contrast, the article does occur with "law" in Galatians. We remember that the situation in Galatia was one in which Jewish believers were trying to force the Old Testament law on Gentiles, requiring them to be circumcised and take on other specifically Jewish obligations. In that context it was right for Paul to speak of "the law," meaning the law of Moses. In Romans it is different. Here Paul is not thinking so much of the specific Jewish law, though nothing he says excludes it, but of law in general. It is the law principle, rather than a specific set of laws, that he is thinking about. It is what we commonly call morality.

Is that distinction important? Well, it is for Gentiles, which includes most of us, as well as the bulk of those to whom Paul was specifically writing. The Gentiles of Paul's day generally did not have the advantage of the Old Testament law for moral guidance. But they did have some standards of behavior, just as we do today. And, like us, they wanted to trust in their personal ability to keep that "law," to measure up to those standards, as a way of salvation.

We see that all around us, don't we? And in ourselves, too. People will say that God ought to save them because they have done the best they can, "best" in that statement being defined by their partial attainment of whatever standard they perceive to be a just one. Or because they are good people, "good" being merely the sense that they have done better at living up to some moral code than others.

You will recall from our study of Romans 2:12-15 how C. S. Lewis pointed out that in most arguments we all naturally appeal to some standard, maintaining that the other person has failed to live up to that standard and implying that we have. Lewis calls this the Law of Nature, and his point is that there must be a God behind it from whom all such standards of right come. However, this tendency is also evidence of the way we naturally think about salvation. Because we think we have measured up to some moral standard, we believe that God owes us something.

In my opinion, it is because of this universal human error that Paul approaches the third "soldier"—not as if the warrior was clothed in the armor of the law of Moses, but as if he was posing as the moral champion of all mankind.

Because Ideas Have Consequences

Each month I get a newsletter from a think tank in Washington, D.C., which has as its slogan:
"Because Ideas Have Consequences." That is true, of course. So, taking my clue from that paper, I ask, as Paul obviously did in writing these verses: What are the consequences if a person tries to achieve a saved status with God not by faith but by morality or, as Paul says, by the law principle?

Paul says there are three consequences:

1. Faith has no value (v. 14). The reason faith has no value if one is living by the law principle is that faith and law are opposites, and if a person is choosing one, he or she is inevitably rejecting the other. It is as impossible to be saved by both faith and works as it is to be setting out from Kansas in the direction of California and New York simultaneously.

Here is an example. Quite a few years ago Donald Grey Barnhouse, a former pastor of the church I now serve, produced a gospel film entitled "The Geography of Salvation." It was based on the fact that in the continental United States both the highest point (Mount Whitney) and the lowest point (Death Valley) are in California. Barnhouse compared the state of California to our lost state as sinners and showed that it is impossible to get out of California by going up. A person who starts in Death Valley and travels up to sea level and then on into the mountains may feel that he has made noticeable progress, and he has in terms of elevation. But he is still in California. Similarly, in regard to salvation, what we need is not a higher moral elevation but a change of state. We need to be moved out of our lost state, in which we are under the wrath of God, into a saved state. That is different from going up and by a different means entirely.

To put it another way: Law is man-directed (it points to human abilities), while faith is Goddirected (it points to God's accomplishments). So, if you are approaching salvation by trusting man, you cannot be trusting God—and vice versa.

2. The promise is worthless (v. 14). The second consequence of living by the law principle is the nullification of God's promise. Why is this so? Well, if the promise of salvation is linked to the law principle, this can only mean that it is necessary for a person to keep the law in order to receive the promise. Of course, God could have made this his plan, but it would have meant that the promise was conditional. It would have been as if God had said, "I promise to save you if you will do so and so." But if that were the case, the promise would never have been fulfilled because, as Paul has already proved in the earlier chapters of Romans, there is nobody who has ever done what God's law requires. Not only that, there is nobody who has ever done what any law requires. For whenever a person says, "This is my standard," no sooner has he erected that standard than he breaks it. This would exclude him from salvation, if salvation were based on that fulfillment. The promise could exist, but it would be worthless in terms of saving anybody.

D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones puts it like this: "Law means failure. Therefore, if the promise had been made through the medium of the Law, what God was giving, as it were, with his right hand, he would have been taking back with his left hand. There would have been no promise at all; it would have had no value whatsoever."

3. Law brings wrath (v. 15). The third consequence of trying to achieve a saved status by the law principle is that, instead of achieving salvation, all one actually achieves is wrath. This is an important point, for it goes beyond what has already been established as the first and second consequences. Those consequences tell what a person trying to saved by law fails to achieve: he fails to achieve the promise. This point tells us what he actually does achieve: it is wrath.

This is because the law can do nothing but condemn. That is its very essence. The law says, "Do this, and if you do not do it, the punishment is as follows." The law possesses nothing that can enable a person to meet its just demands. Does that mean that the law is evil? Paul asks that question later on in his letter (in Romans 7), answering, "Certainly not!... the law is holy, and the commandment is holy, righteous and good" (Rom. 7:7, 12). A mirror is not a defective mirror because it cannot clean your face. That is just not its job. The function of a mirror is to show you that your face is dirty so that, when you know it is dirty, you will get some soap and water and wash it. In the same way, the law is not bad (defective) because it cannot save you. That is not its function. The law was given to show you that you cannot get to heaven by keeping it, so that— having learned that you cannot keep the law and will be condemned if you try—you will turn to Jesus Christ and be saved by him.

If you do not turn from law as a way of salvation and trust the work of God in Jesus Christ, the very standard that you trust condemns you—because you have not kept it and never will.

What does Paul mean when he adds, "Where there is no law there is no transgression" (v. 15)? This could mean the obvious: If there is no law, there can be no transgression of that law. But in the context it probably means: Without the law we do not know we are transgressors. As he says later, "... I would not have known what sin was except through the law..." (Rom. 7:7).

So, then, there is nothing wrong with law. The problem is in us, and it is the law's sole function to bring that truth to our attention.

A Better Set of Consequences

If you look closely at the New International Version, you will notice that the verses we are studying divide into two paragraphs. This is a proper division. The first paragraph, the one we have been looking at so far, is negative. It deals with the bad consequences of trying to be saved by the law principle: devaluation of faith, nullification of the promise, and wrath. The second paragraph, the one we turn to now, is positive. It shows the fortunate consequences of seeking to be justified by God, not on the basis of morality or by the law principle, but by faith—which was the path pursued by Abraham.

Again, as in the case of law (but on the other side of the ledger), there are three consequences.

1. Faith establishes grace (v. 16). Why is this so? It is because faith and grace belong together by their very natures, just as works and law belong together. This is very evident in the latter case. Law tells us what we are to do. It points to deeds, action, conduct, and behavior. You cannot think of law without thinking of requirements. In the same way, though by contrast, as soon as you think of faith you inevitably think of grace (if you understand it), and as soon as you think of grace you think of faith. Grace is the unmerited favor of God apart from human works, and it comes to us by simple acceptance, which is faith.

Suppose I agree to work for you for a day for forty dollars. At the end of the day's work I come to collect my wages. Would you claim that you are being gracious in paying me? Not at all. Your payment would not be a matter of grace but of obligation. If I have done the work, you owe me my wages. If, on the other hand, I am sick and out of a job and having financial troubles and you come and offer me forty dollars, that is grace. It has nothing to do with anything I have done or will do. I have only to receive your gift and thank you for it.

Faith establishes grace. Therefore, we must have faith, since it is grace we need.

2. Faith makes salvation certain (v. 16). Again, we can see the truth of this by contrast. Suppose salvation were based on our ability to keep some law or live up to some standard of morality. I read in Robert Bellah's study of American mores, Habits of the Heart, of a man whose basic moral standard was honesty. Let's take that as a test case. If salvation depends upon our being honest, how honest do we have to be? Here is a very honest man. Let's let him into heaven. Now, here is another man. He is almost as honest as the first, but he has told one more lie than the man we admitted. Should we let him in? If so, how about a man who has told one more lie than that or ten more lies than that? How about a man who is only moderately truthful? Or a man who is quite dishonest? Where do you draw the line? Obviously, in an imperfect and intricately variable world, it is impossible to draw such a line. So anyone who wants to be saved by works can never be certain that he or she has performed well enough—assuming (wrongly) for a moment, that the standard can be less than utter perfection.

And it is the same for any other moral trait: purity, contentment, charity, or whatever. How pure? How content? How generous do you have to be?

If, by contrast, salvation is not by morality but by the grace of God received through faith, then salvation is certain—because God is faithful and does not waver in his promises. He has done what is necessary through the death of Christ. That work is a perfect and all-sufficient work. Nothing can be added to it. Consequently, the person who rests on that work can be quietly content and confident.

Here is a particularly good way of putting it from the pen of Donald Grey Barnhouse:

The law is the womb of doubt, and anyone who is attached to the law or its works is going to be besieged by all of the doubts which are born from the law. Any individual who has his eyes upon himself will be miserable. The man who walks by the law walks in the night, and his footsteps echo against the wall of the darkness that goes with the law. These echoes rise to his ears, and each sound from all the troop of doubts gives him fear upon fear. If he pauses, he is in the silence of dread fears, and as he runs from them his footsteps echo all the faster with the increasing tempo of his hysteria of doubt....

But the man who walks by the promise of grace walks in the broad day. His footsteps echo against the light of the promises of God, and he feels himself to be surrounded by the angels of blessing. His eager steps press forward to claim the blessings, and the increasing tempo of his footsteps sets up the echoes of further blessings. If he stops, he finds himself in green pastures and beside still waters. When he walks again he is in the paths of righteousness. He hastens on to the golden city, and the brightness of its prospect takes away any sense of fatigue that might naturally rise from the length of the road. And when the road ends, he finds that he has been supplied with grace at every step and brought on to the triumph of life eternal.

3. Faith opens the door of salvation to all (vv. 16-17). The final benefit of faith as the way of salvation is that it opens the door of salvation to everybody, not just to the Jew, who possessed the Old Testament law, or to the few favored Gentiles who had been taught a particularly high standard of morality. It is open to anyone. All may enter. Whoever will may come. This is the point Paul particularly emphasizes in Romans 4, not only in these verses but from verse 9 virtually to the end of the chapter.

I do not know of any human benefit or award or promise of which that can be said, because all human offers have conditions and thereby always exclude some people. There are certain benefits of being an American citizen (or a citizen of some other country), benefits provided by the government. But they are not for those who are not citizens. There are promises that companies make to their employees, but they apply only to those who work for those companies.
Labor unions provide securities for their members, but not for other workers or for management. Any human association has built-in limitations.

But this is not true of the way of salvation offered by God through the work of Christ. Because of this, I can say the door is open for you, regardless of who you are or whatever you may have done or not done. If you are a Jew, the gospel is for you. If you are a Gentile, it is for you. It is for those who are good and those who are bad. It is for scholars as well as for the uneducated. It is for religious people and for those who have no religious background whatsoever. None of these things enter into the picture, because we are all reduced to the same level. Salvation is by the grace of God through faith.

If you are excluded, it is only because you have refused to walk through that open door. It is because you prefer your own sullied morality to God's grace.

Do not let that be true of you. Instead of refusing grace, accept it and enter into the full joy of God's salvation. That salvation is for you, whoever you may be—if you will have it.

Chapter 57.
The Nature of Abraham's Faith

Romans 4:18-22

Any journey, whether it is geographical or metaphorical, has milestones at which the traveler stops, looks back over the ground already covered, and takes satisfaction in his or her progress before moving on.

We have come to such a milestone in our study. For four chapters the apostle Paul has been laboring up the first great peak of the Himalayan range that is his letter to the Romans. He has analyzed the desperate state of the human race in its rebellion against God and has unveiled the answer to its lost condition in the gospel of Jesus Christ. He has explained the nature of that gospel and has patiently answered all the objections that could possibly be brought against it. He has demonstrated that the gospel of a righteousness from God received by faith is taught in the Old Testament, proving it from the cases of Abraham and David. He has concluded that "the promise [of salvation] comes by faith, so that it may be by grace and may be guaranteed to all Abraham's offspring..." (v. 16). The first four chapters of Romans have been an invigorating climb, and the peak Paul has scaled is a mighty one.

The apostle is now going to discuss the immediate benefits of this God-given salvation and the nature of the resulting Christian life. But, before he moves on to this next great pinnacle, he takes a look back over the ground he has covered and reviews his accomplishment.

He does this in three parts. First, having proved that Abraham was saved by faith (and therefore all other saved people must be), Paul reviews the nature of that faith, using Abraham as an example. (This is the part we will be looking at in the present study.) Second, since the essence of true biblical faith is that it is grounded in God, Paul reviews the character of God, showing that only the true God is an adequate basis for faith. (We will be dealing with that in the next study.) Finally, having explored these matters in regard to Abraham, who has been his chief example of the way of salvation, Paul breaks away from Abraham and speaks about the Christian faith directly, focusing on the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. (Our study of that faith will conclude the first volume of my commentary on Romans.)

In reviewing the nature of Abraham's faith, Paul highlights five of its most striking characteristics.

Faith in God's Promise

The first important thing about Abraham's faith is that it was faith in God's promise. That is clear in verse 18, where one expression of the promise from Genesis 15 is quoted. But it is also a dominant theme throughout the latter half of Romans 4, in which the noun promise appears four times (in vv. 13, 14, 16, 20) and the verb promised once (in v. 21). God made a multifaceted promise to Abraham, involving personal blessing, a land to be given to him and his posterity, blessing on his descendants, and a Redeemer to come. Therefore, the first and most important characteristic of Abraham's faith is that it was faith in this promise.

When we first look at this, the fact that Abraham "believed" God may seem obvious and therefore unimportant. But it is neither obvious nor unimportant.

It is not "obvious," because most of our natural thinking about faith moves in different categories entirely. What do we chiefly think of when we think about faith? We think in subjective terms, don't we? We think of our feelings about something, which really means that we are mancentered in this area rather than God-centered.

Occasionally, when I want to see what others have said about a certain subject, I look in various books of quotations in my library. When I did that in reference to "faith," I found that the quotations made this point dramatically. Here are some that appear in Roget's International Thesaurus. The Roman poet Ovid (43 b.c.-a.d. 18) said, "We are slow to believe what hurts when believed." The epic poet Virgil (70-19 B.C.) wrote, "They can because they think they can." The Roman playwright Terence (185-159 B.C.) said, "As many opinions as men." The French writer Montaigne (1533-1592) declared, "Nothing is so firmly believed as that we least know." George Santayana (1863-1952), the Spanish-born American philosopher, spoke of "the brute necessity of believing something so long as life lasts." And then there were popular sayings like: "Believe that you have it, and you have it" and "I believe because it is impossible."

These sayings all have at their root the sense that faith is essentially grounded in man and is a subjective quality. But in the Bible faith is grounded in God and is something that springs from his encounter with the individual.

Again, the fact that biblical faith is faith in God's promise is not "unimportant," because it is along these identical lines that we must believe God today if we, like Abraham, are to be saved. We are not saved because we have a strong subjective faith (that would focus the matter on us), but because we believe the promises of God regarding salvation, promises made known to us in the pages of the Bible. In other words, Christian faith is a Bible faith. Or, to put it in still other words, we are saved not because of our faith but because of God's promises. True faith is receiving these promises and believing them on the basis of God's character.

The Word of God Only

The second characteristic of Abraham's faith is that it was based on what D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones has called "the bare Word of God and on nothing else whatsoever." We go back to Genesis 15 and find that God promised Abraham many offspring (as numerous as the stars in the heavens) at a time when he had no children at all. To be sure, the situation seemed not quite as hopeless as it was later to become. Abraham was then about eighty-five years old, but he was still able to engender a child, as he proved by fathering a child by Sarah's handmaid Hagar. Fourteen years later, at the time of the conception of Isaac, Abraham was not even physically able to father a child. Still, by the time of his life described in Genesis 15, Abraham had lived most of a century without having any children. It seemed that he and Sarah would die childless. Yet here was God promising not only that they would have an heir but that they would eventually have descendants beyond any human possibility of counting.

Where could Abraham find external support to assist him in believing this "wild" promise? There was no such support! From the point of view of human experience, the situation was not promising. He had no prior examples of fecundity in old age that he could rest his belief on. So, if Abraham believed God, as he did, it was only because it was God who had made the promise.

It is the same when we trust God in the matter of salvation today. God says that he has given his Son in death for us so that "whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life" (John 3:16). What else in life can sustain you in believing such a promise except the bare words of God in the Bible. Apart from God's Word, we do not even know anything about eternal life, let alone how to obtain it. The invisible world is hidden from us. No human being can tell us anything. So, if we find salvation, it is by believing God's Word, pure and simple.

Is that too hard to do? In some ways, it is. But why should we not believe God? Human beings can deceive us and often do. But God's word is his bond, and he never changes his mind.
Therefore, although we do not have external support for believing him, we do not need it. In fact, it would be an insult to the character of God to maintain that we believe God only because of the word or experience of some human being. How can anything human ever support the Eternal? It is rather the other way around.

D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones writes, "There is always this naked element in faith. It does not ask for proofs, it does not seek them; in a sense it does not need them. Faith is content with the bare Word of God, because he is God."

Despite All Contrary Appearances

The vitality of Abraham's faith (and therefore of all true faith) was greater even than this. For, as Paul points out in the closing verses of Romans 4, it was not a case of Abraham's merely believing God in the absence of all external supports; he believed God when the external evidences were actually and sharply to the contrary.

This is the meaning of the sentence "against all hope, Abraham in hope believed" (v. 18). It means that from a human perspective the situation was hopeless. But since God had spoken, Abraham was willing to believe God despite the adverse physical evidence. At this point it is clear that Paul's thought is moving beyond the situation described in Genesis 15 to the utterly "impossible" conditions of Genesis 17. As we have seen, by this time Abraham was ninety-nine years old and there was no longer any hope that the aged couple could have their own child. When they were a bit younger, perhaps. But not at this point, not now. That is why the text says, "Without weakening in his faith, he [Abraham] faced the fact that his body was as good as dead—since he was about a hundred years old—and that Sarah's womb was also dead" (v. 19).

There is an interesting textual variation in this verse which is worth mentioning briefly. In many of the ancient manuscripts there is a negative in the early part of this sentence that would call for the translation "he did not consider." If this reading is followed, the sense would be: "Abraham was so strong in faith that he did not consider that his body was as good as dead." Usually, a negative would give an entirely contrary meaning. But in this case, strangely, either of the readings make sense and mean about the same thing. If the negative is omitted, as the New International Version seems to consider correct, the sentence means: "Abraham faced the fact that his body was as good as dead and believed God anyway." If the negative is retained, the course followed by the King James Version, the sentence would be what I suggested earlier. In either case, it means that Abraham was aware of the utter hopelessness of the situation. Yet he believed God in spite of all circumstances.

Moreover, this is what Genesis itself indicates. Although it is not thrown up to Abraham later in the Bible—God seems always to remember the victories and not the failures of his children— Genesis 17:17 tells us that, when the original promise was repeated to Abraham when he was even older, initially he laughed since he knew how preposterous this was: "Abraham fell facedown; he laughed and said to himself, 'Will a son be born to a man a hundred years old? Will Sarah bear a child at the age of ninety?'"

Yet, when the chips were down, Abraham believed God rather than the limitations of his own physical capabilities. And in the following year the promised child was born to Abraham and Sarah.

I do not often cite the testimony of the Swiss theologian Karl Barth in my studies. But Barth had an enviable sense of the greatness of God and, by contrast, the utter weakness and hopelessness of all things human. At this point in his highly esteemed Romans commentary, he quotes with evident approval some strong words about faith by Martin Luther:

"What could be more irrational and laughable, ridiculous and impossible, than God's words to Abraham?... Moreover, all the articles of our Christian belief are, when considered rationally, just as impossible and mendacious and preposterous. Faith, however, is completely abreast of the situation. It grips reason by the throat and strangles the beast. It effects what the whole world and all that is in it is impotent to do. But how can faith do this? By holding on to God's word and by accounting it right and true, however stupid and impossible it may appear. By this means did Abraham imprison his reason.... And in the same fashion do all other believers who have entered the dark recesses of faith throttle reason, saying: Listen, Reason, thou blind and stupid fool that understandest not of the things of God. Cease thy tricks and chattering; hold thy tongue and be still! Venture no more to criticize the Word of God. Sit thee down; listen to his words; and believe in him. So do the faithful... achieve what the whole world is incompetent to achieve. And thereby they do our Lord God supreme and notable service."

No one should understand this as meaning that faith is "irrational," since nothing is more rational than to believe God even in the face of evidence to the contrary. But it does mean that faith stands always with God and his Word, even when doing so appears foolish from a human perspective.

Full Assurance of Faith

The fourth characteristic of Abraham's faith is assurance. Paul says this in a number of ways: (1) "without weakening in his faith" (v. 19); (2) "he did not waver through unbelief (v. 20); and (3) he "was strengthened in his faith" (v. 20). But the chief statement is in verse 21: "being fully persuaded that God had power to do what he had promised." Some of the other versions of this verse are worth noting. The Revised Standard Version says that Abraham was "fully convinced."
The New English Bible speaks of a "firm conviction." Phillips says that Abraham was "absolutely convinced." The New American Standard Bible speaks of him as "being fully assured."

This is an important point. True faith should always have this assurance.

But how does faith achieve this in a world where flesh is weak and circumstances are usually more powerful than we are? There is only one answer: True faith has assurance because it is directed neither to ourselves nor to circumstances but to God. We are weak, so faith grounded in ourselves is always weak and will weaken further, waver, and slip away, just as Peter's faith wavered when he looked away from Jesus and instead glanced at the churning waves of Galilee over which he was attempting to walk from the disciples' small boat to the Master (Matt. 14:2831). Faith that is grounded in the being and character of God will go from strength to more strength, since God is faithful.

Faith That Acts

There is one more characteristic of Abraham's faith that we dare not omit and need to remind ourselves of before going on. It is that faith acts. Faith believes God, but it also acts decisively. In fact, I define true biblical faith as "believing God and acting upon it."

Did Abraham believe God? Of course he did. He believed God enough to engender the child of the promise when he was ninety-nine years old. But I have often thought that even greater than that would have been his act of announcing his change of name to those who lived with him—even before Isaac's conception. You know, I am sure, that in its original form Abraham's name was Abram and that Abram meant "father of many" (literally, "father of a people"). That was appropriate in view of God's promise that he and Sarah (originally Sarai) would have many children. But they had had no children for many decades, and the name became an increasing embarrassment for him as the years slipped by.

It must have been a matter of embarrassment for Sarai/Sarah, too. For she was a proud woman and wanted to settle once and for all whether the problem lay in her inability to bear children or in her husband's infertility. What else would cause a woman to send her husband into another woman's arms? But she gave her handmaid Hagar to Abram to see if he could father a child by her, and although Abram should have refused, trusting God to provide the promised heir in his own time, he listened to his wife and so had Ishmael by Hagar. How proud the patriarch was of Ishmael, fathered after years of infertility. Later, when God came to renew the promise of the heir again, Abraham pleaded with God to accept Ishmael (then thirteen years old) instead, saying, "If only Ishmael might live under your blessing!" (Gen. 17:18).

Still there was only one child for a man whose name meant "father of many." The jokes at the patriarch's expense must have been very painful to him.

But when God appeared to Abraham before his hundredth birthday to say that the promise had not been forgotten and that the couple would have a child by the same time next year, God also announced the change in Abram's name. He, in turn, would have announced this to the hundreds of people who were part of his entourage.

What interest there would have been when Abram indicated that he was going to change his name!

"He is going to change his name?"

"I wonder what to."

"He has been Abram, father of many, for so many years. That must have been a difficult thing to live with. Perhaps he is going to change it to Abechad, 'father of one,' since that is all he is, after all."

Then Abraham made his announcement: "God appeared to me last night and told me that I am to change my name from Abram, 'father of many,' to Abraham (which, translated colloquially, means), 'father of a vast, vast multitude' (literally, "father of a nation")."

I suppose the laughter broke out behind the scenes at that point and was only barely suppressed by those who were closest to Abraham. For what could be more ridiculous than such a change of name? Preposterous! Foolish! But it was not foolish, particularly not to Abraham, since he was looking at things from the perspective of God's promise and was willing to act publicly on his convictions regarding God's power, truth, and faithfulness. The next year the son of the promise was born to him.

How about you? Will you act on your faith as Abraham acted? Will you step out in faith, believing the promise of God concerning the gift of salvation through Jesus Christ? You will get little support from the world to help you make such a commitment. On the contrary, the world will hinder you as much as it possibly can and think you are irrational, even foolish. But where is the foolishness found? Is it on the side of those who trust God? Or is it on the side of unbelievers, who trust only themselves and the world, both of which are passing away? I urge you to trust God and act on it.

Chapter 58.
The Ground of Abraham's Faith

Romans 4:18-22

There are times in Bible study when it is necessary to examine every word of a text thoroughly. This is not only a good method; it is also almost always a good place to start. But there are other times when it is helpful to step back from intricate digging and look for the flow of words in a passage and the place of that passage in the chapter or even in the entire book. I want to take the latter approach now in our second and final study of Romans 4:18-22.

What is the flow of these verses?

There is an obvious flow from the thought of Abraham not "weakening in his faith" (v. 19) to being "strengthened in his faith" (v. 20). When we step back from the actual words, that is the first larger picture we see. We can step back even further, and then we see a flow from the idea of hopelessness, with which the section begins ("against all hope," v. 18), to Abraham's being "fully persuaded" of God's promise (v. 21). Nor is this all. If we step back the fullest distance, the embracing flow is from Abraham himself, whose body was "as good as dead" (v. 19) to God, who has "power to do what he had promised" (v. 21). That is another way of expressing what we saw in the preceding study, namely, that Abraham's faith was strong because it was focused on God only.

Read those verses again, this time placing an emphasis on that last idea: "Against all hope, Abraham in hope believed and so became the father of many nations, just as it had been said to him, 'So shall your offspring be.' Without weakening in his faith, he faced the fact that his body was as good as dead—since he was about a hundred years old—and that Sarah's womb was also dead. Yet he did not waver through unbelief regarding the promise of God, but was strengthened in his faith and gave glory to God, being fully persuaded that God had power to do what he had promised."

Putting this passage in the context of the opening chapters of Romans, we find an interesting contrast. We discover from Romans 1 that the human race rejected God and would not give glory to God (v. 21). But in Romans 4 we find Abraham believing God and making it his utmost concern to glorify him (v. 20).

To God Be the Glory

The overall importance of these points is that they reveal the secret of Abraham's great faith, as we saw in the preceding study. There we looked at the nature of Abraham's faith and saw that it was:

1. Faith in God's promise,
2. Faith based upon the bare words of God and on nothing else whatsoever,
3. Faith despite many strong circumstances to the contrary, 4. Faith that was fully assured, or confident, and
5. Faith that acted in response to God's word.

But as soon as we ask, "How could Abraham's faith achieve such strength and such characteristics when it had no external support and the world was against it?" we see that it was because Abraham's faith was directed to God, who alone is the source of all true strength and confidence.

If Abraham's faith had been grounded in himself (or other human beings) or had depended for its nurture upon his own firmness of will or depth of feelings, his faith would have weakened, wavered, and then died. Instead, his faith was strengthened—because it was in Almighty God alone.

This is what the Bible teaches our faith is also to be grounded in. I think of Hebrews 12:1-2, for example. These verses, which come immediately after the chapter that lists the great heroes of faith from the Old Testament, teach that we are to look to God in faith, as they did. "Therefore, since we are surrounded by such a great cloud of witnesses, let us throw off everything that hinders and the sin that so easily entangles, and let us run with perseverance the race marked out for us. Let us fix our eyes on Jesus, the author and perfecter of our faith..." (italics mine).

In the preceding chapter of Hebrews we are told that Abraham "was looking forward to the city with foundations" (Heb. 11:10a). But it is even more important to see that Abraham looked to the God who planned and built that city. Abraham looked forward to the city, much as we anticipate rewards for faithful service. But, most of all, Abraham looked to God and glorified him.

To say that Abraham grounded his faith in God is to say that he fixed his mind on God. This means that he disciplined himself to think about who God is and what he is like. In other words, he contemplated God's attributes. And what is that but giving glory to God? To glorify God is to rehearse his attributes mentally and to praise him for them. What attributes of God did Abraham fill his mind with? The answer, no doubt, is all of them—or at least all the attributes of God he was aware of.

In this study, I want to focus on the attributes of God suggested in our passage.

The God Who Cannot Lie

The first attribute of God that Abraham fixed his mind on was God's truthfulness, the fact that God does not lie. Later, Paul will write this to his friend and co-worker Titus, saying explicitly that our faith is in "God, who does not lie" (Titus 1:2). The truthfulness of God is an underlying assumption in these verses from Romans, and certainly in the life of Abraham as a whole. The truthfulness of God was basic to Abraham's faith in God's promise. If God were not truthful, the promise would have meant nothing to Abraham and would mean nothing to anyone else. It would be only empty words. But because God is truthful, the promise is true and can be trusted implicitly.

Abraham was willing to act on his conviction that God is always truthful. When God told Abraham (Abram) to leave his own land and go to a land that he would show him, Abraham believed God and "set out from Haran" (Gen. 12:4).

When God promised him that he would have descendants as numerous as the stars of heaven, saying "so shall your offspring be," Abraham "believed God and it was credited to him as righteousness" (Gen. 15:5-6; cf. Rom. 4:3).

When God renewed the promise of a son in Abraham's old age, Abraham believed God again and accepted his name change, as well as the rite of circumcision, to show that he believed him (Gen. 17).

Confidence in the truthfulness of God contributed to Abraham's victory in the greatest test of his life: the demand by God that he sacrifice his son on Mount Moriah. Abraham reasoned that since God had promised a numerous posterity through Isaac and since Isaac had not yet married or had children, to keep his word God would have to raise Isaac from the dead (Gen. 22:1-18, esp. v. 5; cf. Heb. 11:17-19). Abraham proceeded on the basis of this faith and was about to perform the sacrifice when God stopped him.

Such complete confidence is vital to any individual's proper relationship to God, since we cannot know, come to, or please God unless we have faith in or believe him (cf. Heb. 11:6).

This is why the Bible, in which God makes his promises to us, has been under such severe attacks by unbelievers in our time. I have participated in many church conferences or consultations in which an ordained minister will say something like this: "I know that the Bible says that, but those words are the product of the limited and erring outlooks of people who lived in that time. We don't have to be bound by them today."

Sometimes they have been more specific: "Paul was wrong when he said that."

Others even say, "Jesus was mistaken," as was implied in a particularly devastating statement made by Dr. Robert G. Bratcher, a translator of the Good News for Modern Man Bible. At a three-day national seminar of the Southern Baptist Christian Life Commission, he said: "Quoting what the Bible says in the context of history and culture is not necessarily relevant and helpful— and may be a hindrance in trying to meet and solve the problems we face.... Even words spoken by Jesus in Aramaic in the thirties of the first century and preserved in writing in Greek thirtyfive to fifty years later do not necessarily wield compelling or authentic authority over us today." That is a powerful expression of unbelief! For Bratcher is not merely saying that the words attributed to Jesus are wrong, being incorrectly reported, but that the very words of Jesus [in Aramaic] may be wrong. And that means that Jesus either was mistaken or lied.

Would Abraham have spoken those words? He would never have done so. He was as far from saying that as the faith of angels is from dogged unbelief.

We are sometimes told that we can believe God without believing the Bible. But it does not require a course in logic to see the absurdity of that statement. If the Bible is not God's Word, to be fully believed because it is God's Word, then where does God tell us anything? Where does God ever show us what needs to be believed? And if there is nowhere that God does speak, to say that we can believe him is ridiculous. If God has not spoken to us truthfully in the Bible, then we cannot exercise belief in him—even if we want to.

Look at the possibilities:

1. Either God has spoken to us in the Bible, which is truthful because God is truthful and which we therefore need to believe implicitly, or
2. God has not spoken clearly anywhere, and therefore to say that he is truthful and that we believe him is meaningless.

The only possible way to avoid this—a way unfortunately taken by some so-called evangelical scholars of our day—is that God has spoken in the Bible but that the divine and therefore true parts of the Bible are mixed with human error. If that is the case, who is to winnow the divine wheat from the human chaff? The only possible answers are either (1) the individual himself by some subjective process, or (2) the scholar.

But in either case, "faith" is not directed to God but to human beings, either ourselves or the scholars, who decide what God has said and what can be trusted. This is not believing God. It is believing in ourselves.

Those who affirm the truthfulness of God always affirm the truthfulness of the biblical revelation.

Great Is Thy Faithfulness

The second attribute of God by which Abraham steadied his faith was God's faithfulness.
Nothing in our text says this explicitly, but it is implied by Abraham's steadfast adherence to God's promise. Abraham staked his life on God's promise, and this was based on his conviction not only that God does not lie but also that he does not change his mind.

We know very little of true faithfulness on the part of human beings. In fact, it is far more common to hear of *un*faithfulness today than of faithfulness. People try to wriggle out of contracts. Spouses abandon one another. Individuals promise to do something but then "forget" to do it. God is not like this. Moses said to the Israelites, "God... is the faithful God, keeping his covenant of love to a thousand generations of those who love him and keep his commandments" (Deut. 7:9). Paul wrote to Timothy: "If we are faithless, he will remain faithful, for he cannot disown himself (2 Tim. 2:13). Arthur W. Pink has written: "Everything about God is great, vast, incomparable. He never forgets, never fails, never falters, never forfeits his word. To every declaration of promise or prophecy the Lord has exactly adhered, every engagement or covenant or threatening he will make good, for 'God is not a man, that he should lie; neither the son of man, that he should repent: hath he said, and shall he not do it? or hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good?' (Num. 23:19)."

Abraham grounded his faith in God's faithfulness. And so should we, above all whenever we find ourselves to be weak, fearful, or anxious. A. W. Tozer wrote wisely, "The tempted, the anxious, the fearful, the discouraged may all find new hope and good cheer in the knowledge that our Heavenly Father is faithful.... The hard-pressed sons of the covenant may be sure that he will never remove his loving-kindness from them nor suffer his faithfulness to fail."

The God Who Is Able

I have been saying that some of the attributes of God to which Abraham directed his mind are not explicit but rather are implied in our passage. But that is not the case with the attribute to which we now come. This attribute is power: "all power," or omnipotence, as we should say. It is stated in several places. In Romans 4:18-22 it occurs in verse 21, which says that Abraham "was fully persuaded that God had power to do what he had promised." In the paragraph before this it is expressed as faith in God "who gives life to the dead and calls things that are not as though they were" (v. 17).

That last phrase—"calls things that are not as though they were"—is particularly interesting because it indicates the frame of thought in which Abraham was moving. What is it speaking of? It is hard to miss that it is a reference to God's power in creation, for it was there above all that God called into being things that were not.

In my studies of creation I have pointed out that there are only four possible explanations of the origin of the universe: (1) that the universe had no origin but rather is eternal; (2) that everything came from a personal something that is good; (3) that everything came from a personal something that is bad; and (4) that there has always been a dualism. These possibilities can be narrowed down to numbers 1 and 2, however, since numbers 3 and 4 do not stand up to careful analysis. This means that the real choice is between an eternity of matter and the Christian view of creation. But the interesting thing is that today non-Christians tend toward another utterly irrational view: that somehow the universe evolved (or brought itself) into being.

It is easy to see how this idea has come about. There has been a rejection of the Christian view of origins on moral grounds, though they are called "scientific." We do not like God, so we dismiss him out of hand. But the idea of an eternity of matter has been destroyed by science itself through what has been called the Big Bang theory.

The evidence points to an origin to the universe. But what exactly was that origin? How did the universe come about? If it was not created by God, the only seeming possibility left is that it created itself, which is what unbelievers are coming increasingly to hold. But that is irrational, as I said. For something to create itself, what would be necessary? Obviously, it would have to exist to do the creating, which means that it would have to exist and yet not exist at the same time. Nothing is more manifestly absurd. But that is the way the understanding of our culture has been heading.

Fortunately, Abraham knew better than this and was aware, as believers today are also aware, that God brought all things into being out of nothing—and that because he was able to do that, he was able to keep his promises to Abraham.

"But, Abraham, for God to give you a child in your old age will require a miracle," says a skeptic in the patriarch's time.

"True," Abraham replies, "but not a greater miracle than God's bringing everything in this cosmos into being out of nothing, simply by his own power and the words of his mouth." Abraham reckoned that what God promised he was able also to perform.

All Christians know this. And that is why believers have been able to believe God in spite of adverse circumstances. Noah believed that God would destroy the earth by a flood. He built the equivalent of an 18,000-ton ship to prepare for it. Gideon believed that God would drive out Israel's enemies, even though he was greatly outnumbered. Obeying God, he routed them with just three hundred soldiers. And what about the Virgin Mary? She believed God's promise that she would give birth to the Messiah, the Savior of the world, even though she had never known a man. Miraculous? Yes. Impossible? Not for the God who has already created all things out of nothing.

Why should it be so impossible for you to trust God? It is highly unlikely that your circumstances even require a miracle. All you need to do is believe God and act upon that faith.

How to Grow Your Faith

A number of years ago the Philadelphia Conference on Reformed Theology held a spring conference on the theme: "How To Grow Your Faith." It was on what theologians call "the means of grace," and it dealt with such subjects as prayer, worship, Bible study, fellowship, and the sacraments. In the course of the weekend it became increasingly evident that the most important, indeed, the foundational means of growing faith is Bible study.

Why is that? Because of the very matter we are studying. True biblical faith is not something you and I are capable of working up ourselves, as if we could merely decide to be men and women of faith in the same way we might decide to take up aerobics or pursue degrees in higher education. Faith is only as strong as its object, and it is therefore created in us by God and built up by God through our coming to know him. But how do we do that? The only way we can come to know God is by coming to know his self-revelation in Scripture—and then applying what we learn to our own circumstances.

Here is the way D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones puts it toward the end of his commentary on Romans 3 and 4:

If you are anxious to know how to have a strong faith, here is the method. It means thorough and deep knowledge of the Bible and of God through it; not suddenly taking up an idea and deciding to "go in" for faith. If you want to have strong faith, read your Bible; go through it from beginning to end. Concentrate on the revelation that God has given of himself and of his character. Keep your eye especially also on prophecy, and then watch his promises being fulfilled. That is the way to develop strong faith—be grounded in all this. Then read the historical portions of the Bible, and the stories of the great heroes. That is why the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews gives that gallery of portraits of these great saints in the eleventh chapter. He says, Look at these men, who were men like yourselves. What was their secret? It was that they knew God, they gave glory to God and relied utterly upon him and his word. Turn that over in your mind, keep on speaking to yourself about it; meditate upon it.... Then, finally, you apply all that in practice to particular cases as they arise in your own life and experience. "He staggered not, but gave glory to God." That is the secret of faith. It is our ignorance of God that constitutes our main trouble.

Ours is not an age of great faith—even in evangelical churches. We are weak in faith, and the reason we are weak in faith is that we do not know the Bible's God. Or if we do, we do not put what we do know into practice.

Chapter 59.
The Christian Faith

Romans 4:23-25

In several preceding studies we have been working through the apostle Paul's proof from the Old Testament of the doctrine of justification by grace through faith. Paul has given two Old Testament examples, Abraham and King David, but his chief example has been Abraham. Indeed, the fourth chapter of Romans has been almost entirely about him.

But Paul was no mere antiquarian, one who was in love with the past for its own sake. Paul was writing for the present. So, as he comes to the end not only of Romans 4 but of the first major section of the letter, he returns to his first theme, reminding his readers that the things that were written in the Old Testament were written for us and that proof of the doctrine of justification by faith from the case of Abraham is for our present benefit. He concludes, "The words 'it was credited to him' were written not for him alone, but also for us, to whom God will credit righteousness—for us who believe in him who raised Jesus our Lord from the dead. He was delivered over to death for our sins and was raised to life for our justification" (vv. 23-25, italics mine).

This passage is a summation of the Christian gospel, and a study of it is an appropriate way to end this first expository volume on the Book of Romans.

The Apostolic Gospel

A number of years ago, a professor from Cambridge University in England named C. H. Dodd wrote a book called The Apostolic Preaching and Its Developments. It was a little book—56 pages in all—but it was influential in the field of biblical studies, since it showed in a convincing way that the apostolic preachers all followed a broadly accepted outline of key facts concerning the life and ministry of Jesus Christ when they presented the gospel to unbelievers. Dodd called this list of key facts the kerygma, a Greek word that means "proclamation," in order to distinguish it from the ethical and other teachings of Jesus, which were not part of the message proclaimed to unbelievers but which were reserved for the further instruction of converts. Dodd called this additional body of material the didachē or "teachings."

One classical statement of the kerygma occurs in 1 Corinthians 15:1-7, where it is introduced as something Paul had received from those who were in the faith before him. In that passage it seems to have three parts:

1. "that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures" (v. 3),
2. "that he was buried" (v. 4), and
3. "that he was raised on the third day according to the Scriptures" (v. 4).

That brief rehearsal is then followed by a list of those who were witnesses to the resurrection (vv. 57).

In the sermons recorded in Acts we see this same pattern, but the list is elaborated to include such items as: the preparatory ministry of John the Baptist, Old Testament prophecies of Christ's coming, evidence of Jesus' divine power by his miraculous works, Jesus' ascension into heaven, and the future role of Jesus in the final judgment. Sometimes the kerygma is complete. Sometimes it is abbreviated. In each instance what lies at its heart is a proclamation of the crucifixion and resurrection of the Lord.

These items are important here, because in Romans 4:23-25 we have the basic gospel in its most compact form. Martin Luther wrote, "In these verses the whole of Christianity is comprehended."

Faith in God

The first point in Paul's summary of the gospel in Romans 4 is not strictly part of the kerygma, as Dodd defines it. But it is presupposed by the kerygma and is what links the content of this explicitly Christian statement of faith to the case of Abraham. It is belief in God. Paul expresses this by saying, "The words 'it was credited to him' were written not for him alone, but also for us who believe in him who raised Jesus our Lord from the dead."

This sentence involves both continuity with and development beyond Abraham's example. The continuity is important, since the God whom Christians believe in is the same as the God Abraham believed in, and the nature of the faith involved in trusting that God is therefore also the same. This is why we have been able to make practical applications from Abraham's life to our own lives. In discussing Abraham's faith, I pointed out that it was:

1. Faith in God's promise,
2. Faith based on the bare words of God and on nothing else whatever,
3. Faith despite many strong circumstances to the contrary,
4. Faith that was fully assured, and
5. Faith that acts.

That is exactly what our faith is to be and do, and the reason is that it is faith in the God in whom Abraham believed. Moreover, such faith is to grow increasingly strong, because it is grounded not upon itself but upon God. In these ways, Abraham's faith is the same as our own.

But our faith also involves development beyond Abraham's faith, because, as Paul writes, it is faith "in him who raised Jesus our Lord from the dead." True, there are items of continuity even here. Abraham's faith in the promise was an anticipatory faith in Jesus since the promise ultimately was fulfilled in him. Again, the fact that Abraham believed in "God who gives life to the dead" finds a parallel in our belief in Jesus' resurrection. Still, there are also differences due to progressive revelation. Because we live on this side of the incarnation and atonement, we understand that the God in whom we believe is identical with Jesus. He said, "Anyone who has seen me has seen the Father" (John 14:9). Moreover, we recognize that the chief revelation of God is at the cross and in the resurrection.

In other words, Abraham had a promise, but we have a gospel, the Good News. Abraham looked forward to what God had said he would do. We look back to what God has already accomplished.

Delivered to Death for Our Sins

What has God accomplished? This brings us back to the kerygma and to the first of its great declarations in our text, namely, that Jesus "was delivered over to death for our sins." According to the Book of Acts, Peter made the identical declaration at Pentecost in these words: "This man was handed over to you by God's set purpose and foreknowledge; and you, with the help of wicked men, put him to death by nailing him to the cross" (Acts 2:23). Later in the same book, when Paul is at Pisidian Antioch, he declares: "The people of Jerusalem and their rulers did not recognize Jesus, yet in condemning him they fulfilled the words of the prophets that are read every Sabbath. Though they found no proper ground for a death sentence, they asked Pilate to have him executed" (Acts 13:27-28).

There are two important points to these classic proclamations of Christ's death.

1. It was planned by God. The Revised Standard Version renders part of Romans 4:25 as "Jesus... was put to death," but this translation greatly weakens what the apostle is saying. It is not just that Jesus was put to death, that is, "executed," true as that is. It is that Jesus was delivered over to death by God. Sometimes people get into debates over who was responsible for Jesus' crucifixion. Was it the Jews, who hated him and asked Pilate to have him killed? Or was it the Romans, who actually carried out the execution? The passages I have quoted recognize the guilt of both parties, plus that of the masses of Jerusalem. But that is not what they are chiefly concerned about. Their emphasis is upon this being the work of God, who by it was accomplishing salvation for all who would believe on Christ. This is why, in another place, Jesus is referred to as "the Lamb that was slain from the creation of the world" (Rev. 13:8).

It was God the Father who sent the Lord Jesus Christ to the cross. This tells us that the death of Jesus was no accident, but rather the accomplishment of God's plan of redemption, devised even before the universe was created. It is why Jesus came.

2. It was for others. The death of Jesus, thus planned by God, was for others, which means that it was substitutionary or vicarious. Paul says that it was "for our sins." Death is God's punishment for sin, its consequence. But Jesus had not sinned and therefore did not deserve death. That he did die was because he was dying in our place as our sin-bearer.

In his great commentary on Bible doctrine, which uses Romans as a "point of departure," Donald Grey Barnhouse illustrates the substitutionary nature of Christ's death by the story of Barabbas. We know that Barabbas was a robber and murderer who had been arrested by the Romans and was in prison awaiting execution at the time of the trial of Jesus Christ. Pilate had no concern for Barabbas—the world would be better off without him—but he wanted to save Jesus and so hit on the idea of offering the people a choice between the two. It was customary to free a prisoner at the time of the Feast of Passover.

"Which of the two do you want me to release to you?" Pilate asked the crowd (Matt. 27:21).

He was astonished when the people replied, "Barabbas!"

Barnhouse pictures Barabbas sitting in the prison, staring at his hands, which were soon to be pierced by nails, and shuddering at any sound of hammering that might remind him with horror of his own impending crucifixion. Suddenly he hears a crowd roaring outside the prison. There are angry voices. "Crucify him! Crucify him!" He thinks he hears his own name. Then a jailer comes to unlock the door of his cell. Barabbas thinks that the time for his execution has come, but instead the jailer tells him that he is being set free. The crowd has called for his release. Jesus of Nazareth is to die instead.

Stunned, Barabbas joins the processional that is making its way to Calvary and watches as Jesus is crucified. He hears the sound of the hammer and knows that the blows that are fastening Jesus to the rough wooden cross were meant for him. He sees the cross lifted high into place and knows that he is the one who should be dying on it.

Jesus cries, "Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing" (Luke 23:34).

The centurion who has commanded the execution party exclaims, "Surely this man was the Son of God!" (Mark 15:39).

Barabbas must have been saying, "That man took my place. I am the one who should have died. I am the condemned murderer. That man did nothing wrong. He is dying for me."

Barnhouse concludes, "Barabbas was the only man in the world who could say that Jesus Christ took his physical place. But [all who are Christians] can say that Jesus Christ took [their] spiritual place." The fact that we are sinners means that we deserve to die. We deserve the eternal punishment of the lake of fire. But Jesus was delivered up for our offenses. He was crucified for our sins. That is why we speak of substitutionary atonement and vicarious suffering, and it is why Jesus' death is so central to the gospel. Nothing that overlooks the death of Christ is the gospel. As Barnhouse says, "Christianity can be expressed in three phrases: I deserved Hell; Jesus took my Hell; there is nothing left for me but his heaven."

Raised for Our Justification

The final part of the gospel in our passage is the resurrection. Paul speaks of it twice: (1) [It was written] "for us who believe in him who raised Jesus our Lord from the dead" (v. 24), and (2) "He... was raised to life for our justification" (v. 25).

Why does he say that Jesus was raised "for our justification"? At first glance this seems to be a problem because, according to Paul's own teaching elsewhere, it is the death of Christ (not the resurrection) that is the basis for God's justification of sinners (Rom. 5:9). Even Romans 3 has said it: "justified freely by his grace through the redemption that came by Christ Jesus" (v. 24). Redemption has to do with Jesus' death. There is no mention of the resurrection at all in that passage.

There are a number of explanations of the meaning of the phrase "raised to life for our justification," but the one that has commended itself to most expositors is that the resurrection is God's proof, provided for our benefit, that a full payment for sins has been made.

The resurrection proves a great many things. It proves that:

1. There is a God and that the God of the Bible is the true God,
2. Jesus was a teacher sent from God; he was inerrant in his teaching and spoke the very words of God,
3. Jesus is the Son of God,
4. There is a day of judgment coming,
5. Every believer in Christ is justified from all sin,

6. All who are united to Christ by a living faith will live again, and
7. Christians can have victory over sin.

But chiefly the resurrection proves that every believer in Christ is justified from all sin, as Romans 4:25 declares. In other words, it is God's evidence to us that the penalty for our transgressions has been fully paid by Jesus.

When Jesus was on earth, he said that he would die for the sins of others. The time for the crucifixion came, and he did die. But the question remained: Was his death fully acceptable to God for others' sins? Did God accept his atonement? We know that if Jesus had sinned, however slightly, his death could not atone even for his own sin let alone the sin of others. For three days the question remained unanswered. The body of Jesus lay in the cold Judean tomb. But then the hour came. The breath of God swept through the sepulcher, and Jesus rose to appear to his followers and later to ascend to the right hand of the Father. By this means God declared to the entire universe, "I have accepted the atonement Jesus made."

Reuben A. Torrey writes, "When Jesus died, he died as my representative, and I died in him; when he arose, he rose as my representative, and I arose in him.... I look at the cross of Christ, and I know that atonement has been made for my sins; I look at the open sepulcher and the risen and ascended Lord, and I know that the atonement has been accepted. There no longer remains a single sin on me, no matter how many or how great my sins may have been. My sins may have been as high as the mountains, but in the light of the resurrection the atonement that covers them is as high as heaven. My sins may have been as deep as the ocean, but in the light of the resurrection the atonement that swallows them up is as deep as eternity." D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones says, "The resurrection is the proclamation of the fact that God is fully and completely satisfied with the work that his Son did upon the Cross."

Point of Decision

We have come to the end of the fourth chapter of Romans and therefore to the end of the first major section of Paul's letter. It has been a long journey.

Paul begins with an analysis of man's lost condition. Far from everything being well with the human race, as the optimists of his day and ours wrongly suppose, the race is actually under the wrath of God for its failure to receive the revelation of himself that God has made in nature, and its refusal to thank God for creation and to seek him out more fully in order to worship him. Instead of following the truth, people have suppressed the truth, and in its place they have created imaginary gods like themselves and even like animals. Having turned from God, who is the source of all good, they have entered on a downhill path marked by sexual and other perversions until they come at last to the point where they are willing to call good evil, and evil good.

No one naturally agrees to this assessment, of course. It is part of what rejecting truth is all about. So Paul next spends time dealing with the arguments of those who would exempt themselves from those conclusions.

One objector is the ethically moral man, who considers Paul's judgments true of others but not of himself. Paul tells him that he stands condemned before God, not only because he has broken God's perfect standard of righteousness, but also because he has not even lived up to his own personal standard, however high or low it may be.

Another objector is the religious person, who thinks that he is exempted because of his religious observances. Paul does not discount the value of religious actions, but he denies that they can change the heart, which is the thing that matters. The end of his argument is that all stand condemned before God: "'There is no one righteous, not even one.... no one who understands, no one who seeks God'" (Rom. 3:10-11).

Finally, Paul unfolds the gospel, showing that God has acted to save sinners through the Lord Jesus Christ. We cannot save ourselves. We do not deserve saving. But God is gracious, and because he is, he sent the Lord Jesus Christ to die in our place. By his death, Jesus turned the wrath of God aside and became the grounds upon which God has been able to justify the ungodly. At the end of Romans 4, Paul has returned to this theme after having shown that this is the same method by which the Old Testament saints, such as Abraham and David, were justified.

But what was written in the Old Testament was not written for these believers alone, Paul says. It was written "also for us," that is, for people living today, so that we might be saved as Abraham was.

Abraham was saved by faith. So the question is: Do you believe in God and trust his promises, as the patriarch did? Although he knew less about the person and work of Jesus than you do, his faith was not different in kind from yours, and for that very reason he remains your example. Remember what we said about his faith? Abraham (1) believed God's promise; (2) believed on the basis of the Word of God only; (3) believed in spite of adverse circumstances; (4) was fully assured that God would do whatever he had promised; and (5) acted on that confidence.

That is what you must do, too. God has promised salvation through the work of Jesus Christ. You must trust his word in this, even though the circumstances of life may seem to rule against it. Abraham looked at himself and considered his body as good as dead. You also are dead to spiritual things. But you must believe what God says, commit yourself to Christ, as he tells you to do, and find that the power of God that was active in quickening Abraham's old body will quicken you.

Abraham "did not waver through unbelief regarding the promise of God, but was strengthened in his faith and gave glory to God" (Rom. 4:20). Neither should your faith falter. Receive the promise, and believe in the God who raised Jesus our Lord from the dead.

Romans, Volume 2

The Reign of Grace (Romans 5-8)

To HIM who caused grace to reign through righteousness to bring us eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord

Preface

More than a year and a half has gone by since I wrote the preface to volume one of these expository studies of Paul's great letter to the Romans. Yet I did not expect to be writing the preface to volume two so soon. The reason for my change of plans is the very welcome decision by Baker Book House to publish simultaneously the first two volumes of what I project to be a four-volume set on the Book of Romans. By this means those who are interested in my attempts to sound the depths of Paul's teaching will be able to use both volumes to work through at least the first important half of Romans without undue delay.

The remaining two volumes, on chapters 9 through 11 and chapters 12 through 16, will follow as quickly as I am able to preach through them in the course of my regular ministry at Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, which I have served now for nearly a quarter of a century.

In my introduction to volume one I mention how little I feel American evangelicals understand this great letter, the greatest of all biblical books, in the opinion of many. I say that very few understand chapters 1 through 4 deeply, though many suppose they do. But if that is the case with those earlier, easier, and fairly familiar chapters, how much more must it be true of chapters 5 through 8! Let me tell you what I think many evangelicals do. I think they read Romans 5:1-11, which they construe as listing only the fruit or benefits of the believer's justification through Jesus Christ, and then skip on to chapter 8 to assure themselves and others that, having been justified by God, they are now eternally secure in Christ and that nothing will ever separate them from the love of God in him.

That is correct, of course—if one is truly justified or genuinely born again. But the conviction that a person is secure in Christ—"once saved, always saved"—is mere presumption if there is not an inevitable, corresponding, and necessary growth in righteousness and victory over sin following conversion.

That is what these chapters show so convincingly. Their theme is the reign of grace, understood not (as some understand it) as God's being gracious to us regardless of what we may do, even if we continue in a very disobedient and dishonorable walk, but understood rather as grace triumphing in those who are Christ's in order to create a genuinely godly walk and righteousness. Even Romans 8 says this, for it states early on that God "condemned sin in sinful man, in order that the righteous requirements of the law might be fully met in us, who do not live according to the sinful nature but according to the Spirit" (vv. 3-4, emphasis added). Those who live according to the sinful nature are not Christians, Paul says in verses 5-8. Rather, Christians are those who are "controlled" by the Spirit (v. 9). Therefore, Christians are those who are having the righteous requirements of the law fulfilled in them.

I believe this is a message that American evangelicals desperately need to hear. For too long we have been subjected to a feeble proclamation of the gospel, which amounts in the end to a denial of it, since it says that it is possible to be regenerate without being sanctified, to be eternally secure in Christ and yet not show any evidence of having the life of Christ within.

No wonder so many so-called evangelicals are indistinguishable from the ungodly, unregenerate people surrounding them, and why the self-proclaimed evangelical churches have been failing to make any appreciable impact on the surrounding culture. We are ineffective because many who consider themselves to be Christians are not saved.

I invite you to walk through these great chapters with me, as my own congregation did from July 1988 through July 1990. (The same studies were also aired over the internationally heard "Bible Study Hour" broadcast after about a six-month delay.)

In these studies of Romans, I have been strengthened in my own awareness of the sovereignty, grace, and holiness of God and of the need for holiness in his people, that is, for holiness in those who profess to be Christians. We are not a holy people, not very. But we can become increasingly holy as we draw near to God and live in the mental universe of these great Bible teachings. Indeed, we must!

As usual, I want to thank the congregation of Tenth Presbyterian Church for allowing me to spend so much time in serious Bible study and in the preparation of these sermons, in particular. I trust the congregation has benefited from them.

May God bless us in these sad days of declining evangelicalism, and may we have a recovery of the whole counsel of God. I know no better way to move in that direction than by studying, meditating on, and once again preaching from the Book of Romans.

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

Part Six. Security in Christ

Chapter 60.
Peace with God

Romans 5:1

A number of years ago, Look magazine ran a personality feature entitled "Peace of Mind." Sixteen prominent Americans had been asked how they were able to find peace in our stressful world, and the article consisted of their answers.

James Michener, the author of many best-selling books, said that he finds peace by taking his two dogs for a walk "along old streams and into fields that have not been plowed for half a century." Barry Goldwater, the former Senator from Arizona and Republican presidential candidate, said that he finds peace in his hobbies—photography, boating, flying, and camping— but above all by "walking in the Grand Canyon." (It was obvious that Goldwater had been elected to the Senate from "the Grand Canyon state.") Former CBS news anchorman Walter Cronkite finds peace in solitude, usually by "going to the sea by small boat." Margaret Mead, the well-known anthropologist and author of Coming of Age in Samoa, sought "a change of pace and scene." Sammy Davis, Jr., said he found peace by looking for "good in people." Bill Moyers, television personality and former press secretary to Lyndon Johnson, tried to find peace in a family "reunion, usually in some remote and quiet retreat."

As I read these answers I was impressed with how subjective and dependent upon favorable circumstances most of the approaches were. But I noted something else, too. Although each of these prominent Americans differed in his or her methods, all were nevertheless seeking peace of mind and recognized that pursuing it was important. No one considered a search for peace to be irrelevant.

What is it that people are most seeking in life, once their basic physical needs are satisfied? Some say they are seeking "freedom." Movements for national liberation are usually based on this intense human desire. But Americans are free. We have been free of foreign domination for over two hundred years, and our constitution and legal system affirm our individual liberties. Yet most of us are as restless and discontented (perhaps even more so) as those living under strongly oppressive regimes. Is it wealth we are seeking? One of the richest men in the world once said, "I thought money could buy happiness. I have been miserably disillusioned." Others seek fulfillment through education, fame, sex, or power, but most are discontented even when they attain such goals. What is the reason? The explanation is that what people are really seeking is peace, and the ultimate and only genuine peace is found in a right relationship with God.

The great North African Christian, Saint Augustine, expressed it best more than a millennium and a half ago, when he wrote in his Confessions, "You made us for yourself, and our hearts find no peace until they rest in you."

Peace Through Jesus Christ

If you are restless and seeking peace, the verse that begins the fifth chapter of Paul's magnificent letter to the Romans is addressed to you. For here Paul speaks of peace and tells how it may be found: "Therefore, since we have been justified through faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ."

I want to put this verse in its context, however. And to do that I need to have you think ahead to what we are going to find in this next major section of Paul's letter (chs. 5-8).

It is traditional among commentators to suggest that at this point in his letter, having explained the doctrine of justification by grace through faith, Paul lists what most writers call "the fruits of justification" and then moves on to discuss sanctification. Peace is one such "fruit," but there are others: access to God through prayer, hope, joy, perseverance, and a sense of being loved by God. According to this view, Paul interrupts his listing of these fruits of justification at verse 11 to deal with the parallel between Adam and Christ (Rom. 5:12-21) and sanctification (Rom. 6:18:17), before returning to the assurance that nothing can separate the believer from God's love, which is another fruit of justification (Rom. 8:18-39). Commentators taking this approach conclude that the chief concern of the apostle in this section of Romans is sanctification.

If the traditional approach is correct, Romans falls into four major sections: (1) a portion dealing with justification (chs. 1-4); (2) a discussion of sanctification (chs. 5-8); (3) the problem of God's dealing with the Jews (chs. 9-11); and (4) practical matters (chs. 12-16).

However, at this point I think that F. Godet and D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones (who follows him) are right when they suggest that what Paul is actually presenting in Romans 5:1-11 is not "the fruits of justification," though he mentions some of them, but the beginning of a well-developed statement of the security in Christ that comes to a believer as a result of his or her justification.

There are a number of reasons for this interpretation, and there are reasons why it is important, which I will explain later.

I suggested one reason for approaching verses 1-11 in this way when I said that according to the traditional view, Paul interrupts his treatment of the "fruits" of justification to deal with the parallel between Adam and Christ and sanctification. Yet interruptions are not what we have been led to expect in this letter. One German commentator sees this to be a real problem, and he does not hesitate to say that at this point "the systematic order of our epistle leaves something to be desired." But is that really so? Any suggestion that Paul is not being systematic should make us pause in our interpretation of his teaching, at least in this letter, which up to now has been a model of consistent and systematic argumentation.

The best arguments against the traditional view are from verses 1-11 themselves. Look at the first sentence. In the New International Version there is a period in the middle of verse 2, separating the sentence "And we rejoice in the hope of the glory of God" from the previous one. But in the Greek text this is actually a continuation and climax. In Greek the passage says what the King James Version allows it to say, namely: "Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ: By whom also we have access by faith into this grace in which we stand, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God." Since "hope of the glory of God" refers to what theologians call glorification, the opening sentence of Romans 5 actually directs our minds to the final glorified state of those who have been justified. And that is exactly where we come out at the end of Romans 8, where Paul argues that nothing is "able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (v. 39). This suggests that Paul has chapter 8 in mind as he begins chapter 5 and that he moves consistendy toward his conclusion in the intervening material.

There is another argument as well. In Romans 5:1-2, Paul moves from justification to glorification without mentioning sanctification, the matter that traditionalists suppose to be his main concern. In Romans 8:30, he does the same thing, writing: "And those he predestined, he also called; those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified." Justification, then glorification! In both of these texts, one at the beginning of Romans 5-8 and one at the end, the one idea (justification) leads directly to the other (glorification).

It is true that a great deal of sanctification takes place between justification and glorification and that much of what is found in Romans 5-8 bears upon it. But we could well ask why Paul does not mention sanctification either at the start of this section (Rom. 5:1-11) or at the end of it (Rom. 8:18-39), if this is the primary subject he is writing about. Is it not the case that the reason he does not mention sanctification is that he is not chiefly concerned about it and that these chapters are actually focused on another matter entirely?

What is that matter? It is the believer's security in Christ or, as we also often say, the "assurance of salvation."

D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones, who sees Romans 5-8 in this light, says that "the apostle is concerned primarily, from this point onwards, to show us the absolute character, the fullness and the finality of the salvation which comes to us in the way he has already described, namely, as the result of justification by faith."

In my opinion, this is the proper and most profitable approach to Romans 5-8.

"Peace with God" and "Peace of God"

When I began my analysis of Romans 5-8, I said that it was important to have this approach to these chapters and that I would come back to its importance later. I want to do that now. But to do so I want to make another distinction. It is the distinction between having "peace with God," which is what this section treats, and having the "peace of God," which is another matter.

Most Christians are acquainted with Philippians 4:6-7, which tells us about the peace of God: "Do not be anxious about anything, but in everything, by prayer and petition, with thanksgiving, present your requests to God. And the peace of God, which transcends all understanding, will guard your hearts and your minds in Christ Jesus." Those two verses envision upsetting situations that come into our lives. Perhaps we have lost a job and are worried about earning enough money to provide for our families. Perhaps we are sick, or a friend is sick. Perhaps a person who has been very close to us has died, and suddenly everything seems in turmoil. One writer argues that the death of a close family member or friend is like having an eggbeater thrust into the mixing bowl of our emotional lives. Elisabeth Elliot, who had one husband murdered by Auca Indians in Ecuador and another slowly consumed by cancer, said that this is a time when the earth seems to be giving way, the waters are roaring, and the mountains are being cast into the sea (cf. Ps. 46:2-3). In such times of stress we need personal peace in our lives, and it is this about which Philippians 4:6-7 is speaking: We can have personal peace by asking God for it.

And it works! I regularly cite these verses when I am writing to people who have lost a close family member, encouraging them to believe that God, who loves them and cares for them, will give them a peace that "transcends all human understanding." Many tell me that this is exactly what God has done for them. He has given them peace in the midst of their emotional turmoil.

But this is not the peace that Romans 5:1 is talking about. Romans 5 is not referring to the "peace of God," but to "peace with God." The idea here is not that we are upset and therefore need to become trusting and more tranquil, but rather that we have been at war with God and he with us, because of our sin, and that peace has nevertheless been provided for us by God—if we have been justified through faith in Jesus Christ.

When we see this, we realize that nothing is more appropriate and logical at this point in Romans than such a reference. For what Paul has been saying in the previous section is that God is not at peace with us but is at war with us because of our ungodly and wicked behavior. The word he has been using is "wrath." "The wrath of God is being revealed from heaven against all the godlessness and wickedness of men who suppress the truth by their wickedness" (Rom. 1:18). Having shown what this means and having answered the objections of those who feel that it is an appropriate description of the condition of other people, but not of themselves, Paul then reveals what God has done to satisfy his wrath against men in Jesus Christ. The Son bore the Father's wrath in our place. He died for us, and we receive the benefits of his atonement by believing on him and in what he has done. This is the point at which the fourth chapter of Romans ended.

But where does this lead? Obviously to peace with God! Since we have been justified by faith, the cause of the warfare between ourselves and God has been removed, and peace is the result. We therefore have peace with God through the Lord Jesus Christ.

Peace has been provided from God's side, for he has removed the cause of the enmity through Jesus' death.

Peace has been received on our side, for we have "believed God" and have found the righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ to be credited to us by God as our righteousness.

One commentator summarizes the point of Romans 5:1 by saying: "Every soul has been at war with God, and therefore every soul must have peace with God through cessation of the hostilities which exist between the individual and the Creator. How is the warfare to be brought to an end?... God has made peace, and no other peace can be made except that which he has already made.... If you come in unconditional surrender, you will find him all peace toward you."

First Peace, Then Blessing

There are some practical applications that we need to make at this point, and they are important enough to be remembered as we make our way through these chapters.

1. The starting point for all spiritual blessings, in this life and in the life to come, is the peace that God has made with us through the death of Jesus Christ.

It is no accident that Paul begins Romans 5 with this theme. Many people would like the peace of God (or some other kind of peace) in difficult circumstances. They would like to be calm under fire, self-assured in highly pressured situations—to be always under control. Many more would like other blessings. But if God is the ultimate source of all good things, as he clearly is, we can only have them when we have first entered into a right and proper relationship with him. How is that done? The only way is by faith in Christ, as Paul has been arguing. But suppose you will not come that way. In that case, what can you possibly expect but a continuation of the wrath of God—a wrath greatly intensified, in your case, by your rejection of Jesus?

2. Having been justified by God through faith in Jesus Christ, believers can know that their salvation is secured forever and that now nothing can separate them from God's love.

This is the point I have been making in this study, and the reason is that it is the chief point of the passage. We have already seen how the first two verses of Romans 5 pass directly from justification to glorification, just as Romans 8:30 also does. These chapters also move inexorably to the great conclusion: "For I am convinced that neither death nor life, neither angels nor demons, neither the present nor the future, nor any powers, neither height nor depth, nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. 8:38-39).

If this were not enough, we should be led to the same conclusion by the fact that the text itself speaks, not of seeking peace with God, but of having peace. "Having been justified, we have peace with God" is what it says.

It is hard to emphasize this too much, since all Christians need to be sure of their salvation. True, there is a false security about which we need to be warned. Mere intellectual assent to doctrine is not saving faith, and boasting of one's security while continuing to sin is presumption. But such qualifications aside, it is important to know that we have been saved by God, that peace has been made between God and ourselves, and that the peace made by God will last forever. Only those who are sure of this salvation can be a help to others.

3. It is possible to be at peace with God and know that we are at peace with God while, at the same time, fail to experience peace in a given situation.

It is important to point this out because, if we do not know this in advance and cling to it, we can be thrown into paralyzing doubt whenever tragic circumstances or upsetting situations arise. Death will come into our experience, and we will be agitated. "Bad breaks" will come, and we will be confused by them. Disappointments will shake us.

In such situations we will need to come to God for the help we desperately need. That is why Paul tells the Philippians not to be anxious, "but in everything, by prayer and petition, with thanksgiving, present your requests to God" and, as a result, "the peace of God, which transcends all understanding, will guard your hearts and your minds in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4:6-7). One great secret of the Christian life is to bring all troubling matters to God in prayer so as to find peace even in the midst of them. But the fact that these situations sometimes cause us to lose our sense of the peace of God does not mean that peace with God has been destroyed. In fact, knowing that God has made peace with us and that nothing will destroy the peace he has made will enable us to come to him quickly and boldly when we need help.

It will be an evidence of the fact that we have peace with God that we do so. D. Martyn LloydJones says that faith in this matter is like the needle of a compass that always points to the magnetic north. It is possible to deflect it—by a hard blow, for example, or by bringing another magnet close alongside. But these deflections are temporary, and the needle will always return to the proper position. That is what faith is like. It can be jarred or deflected, but it will always return to God—because God has made peace with us. Faith knows this, and God is faith's true home.

4. These blessings are nevertheless only through the Lord Jesus Christ, as Paul says.

Paul has been writing about Jesus at the end of Romans 4; he has spoken of his death and resurrection. In this chapter we might have expected him merely to assume the earlier references as a given and say simply, "Therefore, since we have been justified through faith, we have peace with God," stopping there. But Paul does not do that. Although he has already mentioned Jesus Christ, he now mentions him again, because he does not want us to imagine that we can get anywhere without him. He understands that any feeling of acceptance by God that is not based upon the work of Jesus Christ is an illusion!

At the start of this study I mentioned the feature in Look magazine in which sixteen prominent Americans told of the techniques they had developed for finding "peace of mind." There was one person I omitted, and that was Norman Vincent Peale. I did not mention him then because I was holding his reply until now. Peale is known for his philosophy of "positive thinking," which, in the judgment of many people, is not strongly Christian. But Peale nevertheless is a Christian, and in this feature he responded in a truly Christian way. Peale said, "I find peace of mind through a committed relationship with Jesus Christ and through faith in God.... Jesus alone can give you peace. That I've found to be a fact."

So have countless others, and the reason is clear. Jesus gives us peace of mind because he has first made peace between our rebellious souls and God. I commend that peace to you and urge you to put your faith in him.

Chapter 61.
Standing in Grace

Romans 5:1-2

One of the most important principles of sound Bible interpretation is that not everything written in the Bible is for everybody. This seems strange and wrong to some people. But it should not be, because we acknowledge this principle widely in everyday life.

What would you think of a postman who mixed up the addresses on the mail he was entrusted with delivering? Suppose he gave a letter containing a birth announcement to a person who didn't even know the child's parents. Or a bank statement showing an overdrawn account to someone who actually had a large balance. What about death notices? Or invitations to a party? Or bills? It is obvious that unless a letter is delivered to the right person, the postman is not doing his duty. A preacher is something like a postal worker. The Bible is his bag of messages, and his duty is to see that the right message gets to the right individual.

I emphasize this because we have passed from a section of Romans in which Paul has been explaining the gospel for the benefit of those who have not yet believed it and moved to a section of Romans in which he presents the benefits that belong to those who have believed. This means that while the first four chapters have, in a sense, been for everybody—an offer of salvation for the lost and an explanation of the nature of salvation for those who have received it—this present section (chs. 5-8) is only for those who have believed in Jesus Christ.

This is clear from the opening words of Romans 5: "Therefore, since we have been justified through faith...." If you have been justified through faith in Jesus Christ, the benefits now to be listed are for you, says Paul. If you have not been justified, they are not for you. You must begin by believing in Jesus.

Peace: The Foundation

We have already seen one of these benefits in our study of the very first verse. It is "peace with God." This is a military metaphor, of course, and we have seen that it points to the fact that before our justification by God on the basis of Christ's work, we were not at peace with God. We might be inclined to say, as Henry David Thoreau is quoted as having said, "I am not at war with God." But we are lying if we say that. The Lord Jesus Christ said that man's chief responsibility is to "love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your mind," and that the second is to "love your neighbor as yourself (Matt. 22:37, 39; cf. Deut. 6:5; Lev. 19:18). But we do not do that. We actually hate God, hate others, and hate ourselves. We would do away with God if we could. We murder others when we can. And we commit spiritual suicide every day of our lives.

But, having been justified by grace through faith in Jesus Christ, this state of spiritual warfare has been changed to one of peace. We have peace with God, make peace with others, and experience a new measure of personal peace ourselves. This is the first great benefit of our justification.

A Few Important Definitions

In Romans 5:2, we come to a second benefit. But unlike verse 1, which speaks clearly of having peace with God, this verse is a bit hard to understand. There is a textual variation, for one thing, though it is not of great importance. Some Bible versions—the New International Version is among them—have the words "by faith" in verse 2, so the text reads: "we have gained access by faith into this grace in which we now stand" (emphasis added). Other versions—the Revised Standard Version is an example—omit "by faith." This is not an example of any supposed tendency of the RSV editors to eliminate faith from the Bible, but only a reflection of the fact that the words tē pistei are omitted in some of the earliest Greek texts.

The words should probably be retained, as the New International Version does. But this does not really matter. Since "access" is a benefit of justification and since justification has already been explained as coming to us through faith, faith is implied here, even if it is not stated. Or, to look at it in another way, the sentence begins "through whom"—that is, "through Christ." But we have Christ only through faith, and therefore faith is demanded by this expression also.

No, the really difficult thing is not the textual variation, though it has given us different translations of the verse, but the meaning of the words themselves. There are a number of very important words in this verse: access, faith, grace, and stand. But these can be used in different ways, and it is not easy to see how they all go together in this sentence.

Let me make an attempt to define each one, taking them in the order I think will get us to the meaning of this verse most quickly.

1. Grace. Grace is usually defined as "God's unmerited favor," and that is sometimes rightly strengthened to read "God's favor to those who actually deserve the opposite." In this sense, grace is what lies behind God's entire plan of redemption. That is why

> Paul can use it in writing to the Ephesians, saying, "For it is by grace you have been saved, through faith—and this not from yourselves, it is the gift of God—not by works, so that no one can boast" (Eph. 2:8-9).

But this is not the meaning of the word here. One clue to the fact that Paul is giving "grace" another meaning in Romans 5:2 is that he prefaces it with "this." "This grace!" "This" indicates that he has a specific grace in mind. Another clue is that Paul speaks of it as a grace "in which we now stand." What grace is that? In the context of Romans 5, it is clear that the grace in which we now stand is our state of justification. It still means grace. But it specifically means that, while we were previously "under law and wrath," we are now "under grace" because we stand before God as justified men and women—if we have been justified through faith in Jesus Christ.

2. Faith. Faith also has a variety of meanings. It always means "believing God and acting upon that belief." But the emphasis can be either upon the acting (being faithful) or upon the believing (taking God at his word), or it can relate to a variety of things we are called upon to believe. Since the word is linked to "grace" in this sentence and since this grace is the grace of justification, the faith referred to here is the faith in Jesus Christ by which we are justified.

In other words, "faith" in this verse has the same meaning as "faith" in verse 1, which is why I said earlier that it does not matter much whether the words "by faith" are omitted in line with the textual variants. The faith by which we are justified is implied throughout.

3. Access. The Greek term lying behind this word is prosagōgē, which can mean "access" or "right to enter" or "freedom to enter" or even "introduction." Since it is used of the work of the Holy Spirit in prayer in Ephesians 2:18, it has sometimes been said that the Holy Spirit "introduces" us to God.

What does the word mean here? The important thing to see about its use in Romans 5:2 is that it is preceded by the verb "have gained" and that this verb is in the past perfect tense. The New International Version says "have gained" in order to make the point I am making. But the word is actually "have," and in the past perfect tense the proper translation is "have had." What Paul is therefore saying is that we "have had our access into the grace of justification." Paul uses this special past tense to show that the justification in which we stand is something that has been accomplished for us and into which we have already entered. It has a present significance, too, of course. But the reason it has a present significance is that it is something that has already happened to us. We have been justified; therefore we remain justified. We have had our access, and it is because of this that we still have it.

4. Stand. The final key word in Romans 5:2 is the verb "stand." By now we can see how it should be taken. By the mercy of God we have been brought into the grace of justification, and that is the grace in which we now have the privilege to stand. Before, we were standing without, as children of wrath. Now we are standing within, not as enemies or even as pardoned criminals, but as sons and daughters of Almighty God.

Can I sum this up? You will remember that in the last study, when we were attempting to get a handle on the central purpose of Paul in Romans 5-8, I pointed out that the overriding theme of these chapters is assurance. So, although there is a progression in these first benefits of being justified—from having peace with God, to access, to rejoicing in hope of the coming glory—all nevertheless are also evidence that we have been made secure in Christ, and that forever. As Martyn Lloyd-Jones has written, "We have entered... into a position of grace, we have had our introduction to God and we [now] stand before him in an entirely new manner."

Access to the King

In his short but valuable commentary on Romans, Ray C. Stedman illustrates the nature of our standing in grace by the Old Testament story of Queen Esther.

Esther was a young Jewish woman living in the days following the fall of Jerusalem, as a result of which the majority of the Jewish people had been carried off to Babylon. At the time of her story, the king was Xerxes and he was ruling at Susa. Xerxes sought a bride to replace the deposed Queen Vashti and found one in Esther. She became his queen after being taken from the home of her cousin and guardian, Mordecai, to live in Xerxes' palace. A great enemy of the Jews named Haman was also living in the palace. Haman hatched a plot against the Jews in which Xerxes unwittingly signed a decree that would result in death for all the Jews in Persia. Mordecai got a message to Esther, telling her about the plot and saying that she must go to the king and tell him what was about to happen and prevent it.

Alas, explained Esther, there was a problem. It was a law of the Persians that no one could approach the king unbidden. If a person approached the king in the inner court without being summoned, there was only one result: death—unless the king held out his golden scepter to that person and thus spared his or her life. Although Queen Esther had not been summoned to the king for thirty days, even she could not approach him without danger of being put to death.

Mordecai explained to Esther that she had undoubtedly been brought to her royal position "for such a time as this" and that there was no one else who could intervene to save her people.

Esther agreed to go to the king. She spent three days in prayer and fasting, asking the Jews through Mordecai also to fast and pray with her. Then, at the end of her period of preparation, she put on her most royal robes and stepped into the king's inner hall. The king was sitting on his throne, facing the entrance. When he saw Esther he was so pleased with her beauty that he stretched out the scepter that was in his hand and thus accepted her. So Esther had access to the king, and through her the Jews were eventually spared.

This is what Paul says has happened to us through the work of Jesus Christ and the application of that work to us in our justification.

But the parallel is not exact, and for us the result is even more wonderful. Esther was beautiful, and the king was pleased with her. But, in our case, sin has made us highly offensive to God and we have not even tried to approach him. Still God has loved us. He sought us when we were far from him. He sent his Son to die for us, taking the punishment of our sin upon himself. Now, because of Christ's work, we have been brought into the palace where we enjoy God's favor and have continuing access to him.

The author of Hebrews puts it this way: "Therefore, brothers, since we have confidence to enter the Most Holy Place by the blood of Jesus... let us draw near to God with a sincere heart in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled to cleanse us from a guilty conscience..." (Heb. 10:19, 22).

Freedom and Confidence

That aforementioned verse from Hebrews obviously deals with prayer. This suggests that, although Romans 5:2 is not speaking explicitly about prayer (its concern is chiefly with assurance), all this obviously has bearing on our right to approach God in prayer and receive things from him.

Besides, we are encouraged in this thinking by the fact that one of the key words of Romans 5:2,
"access" (prosagōgē), occurs in two other passages in the New Testament and that each of these has to do with prayer. Both are in Ephesians. The first is Ephesians 2:18—"For through him we both have access to the Father by one Spirit." The second is Ephesians 3:12—"In him and through faith in him we may approach God with freedom and confidence." These passages teach two things about prayer, which are based on the fact that we have been given access to God through his work of justification.

1. Our access to God is direct. I mean by this that we do not have to use mediators to get us to God, since the one true Mediator, the Lord Jesus Christ, has opened the door to heaven and given us access to the Father once and forever.

This truth is taught in the first of the two passages from Ephesians, for it comes at the end of a paragraph in which Paul has been referring to the barriers that once divided men and women from God and from each other. In the Jewish temple, to which he refers, there were walls designed to protect the approach to God. If you were to have approached the Temple Mount in Jerusalem at the time of Jesus Christ, you would have been confronted with a wall that divided the Courtyard of the Gentiles from what lay beyond. That wall meant what it said. No Gentile could go beyond it, and the penalty for thus violating the sanctity of the inner courtyard was death. Even the Romans upheld this penalty, and there were signs placed in warning, two of which have since been discovered and are in museums.

Jews could go forward, of course. But even Jewish worshipers would soon come to a second wall. This wall divided the Courtyard of the Women from the Courtyard of the Men. Here all Jewish women had to stop.

Beyond that was still another wall, and past it only Jewish priests could go. They could perform the sacrifices and enter the Holy Place of the temple. But here there was a final barrier, the great curtain that separated the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place. Beyond that barrier only one person could ever go, and that was the High Priest, who could enter only on the Day of Atonement to present the blood of the sacrifice that had been offered for the sins of the people moments before in the outer courtyard.

That elaborate system taught that the way to God was barred even for the elect people of Israel. God could be approached, but only through the mediation of the priests. Gentiles were without access at all, unless they first became Jews and approached by the Jewish route of priestly mediation.

But now, says Paul, those dividing walls of partition have been broken down, and the reason is that when Jesus died, God removed the ultimate barrier, the curtain that divided the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place. Do you remember how the great curtain was torn in two from top to bottom when Jesus died on the cross (Matt. 27:51)? This signified that atonement for sin had been made and accepted. The barriers of sin were now gone for all who would approach God on the basis of the death of Christ. For these—everyone who has been justified by the grace of God in Chrise—evcess to God is now direct. There are no mediators needed, none save Jesus! Hence, we can come to God directly at any time of day or in any place and know that he hears us and will answer our prayers.

2. Our access to God is effective. This truth is taught by the second of the texts from Ephesians, for it emphasizes that through faith in Christ "we may approach God with freedom and confidence." Confidence in what? Obviously that he will hear us and answer our prayers according to his wise and perfect will.

We can pray wrongly, of course, and we often do. But when we pray according to the wise will of God, we can be confident that he will both hear us and answer our prayers.

My favorite story in this respect is about Martin Luther and his good friend and assistant Frederick Myconius. One day Myconius became sick and was expected to die within a short time. On his bed he wrote a loving farewell note to Luther, but when Luther received it he sat down instantly and wrote this reply: "I command thee in the name of God to live, because I still have need of thee in the work of reforming the church.... The Lord will never let me hear that thou art dead, but will permit thee to survive me. For this I am praying. This is my will, and may my will be done, because I seek only to glorify the name of God."

The words seem shocking to us, because we live in less fervent times. But Luther's prayer was clearly of God and therefore effective. For, although Myconius had already lost the ability to speak when Luther's letter came, in a short time he revived, and he lived six more years, surviving Luther by two months.

Can we be bold in prayer, as Luther was? There is a hymn by John Newton, the former slavetrader and preacher, that puts it quite well:

> Come, my soul, thy suit prepare: Jesus loves to answer prayer.
> He himself has bid thee pray, Therefore will not say thee nay.
>
> Thou art coming to a King,
> Large petitions with thee bring. For his grace and power are such, None can ever ask too much.

Abba, Father

My final point does not come specifically from either Romans 5:2 or the texts in Ephesians, though it occurs later in Romans (8:15) and in Galatians 4:6. But it is important to remember it whenever we speak about praying. It is that our approach to God may be intimate. We know this because Jesus taught us to use the intimate term abba, meaning "daddy," when we pray. It is the term Jesus used when praying, and it is the term he passed on to us: "Our Abba, who art in heaven."

God may be our King—the greatest king of all—which is why we can be bold in bringing large requests to him. But he is also our dear heavenly Father, and the access that we have as a result of our justification through the work of Christ has brought us into his home as beloved sons and daughters.

Chapter 62.
Hope of Glory

Romans 5:1-2

Paul wrote the fifth chapter of Romans to teach those who have been justified by God through faith in Jesus Christ that they are secure in their salvation. We have already seen two initial ways he has done this.

He has spoken of the "peace" that has been made between God and ourselves by the work of Christ, and he has spoken of the "access" to God that we have been given as a result of that peace. In the final sentence of verse 2 we come to a third evidence of our security, namely that "we rejoice in the hope of the glory of God." What does that mean?

In an earlier study I pointed out that "hope of the glory of God" concerns our final destiny as believers, in a manner parallel to the great statement in Romans 8:30: "And those he predestined, he also called; those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified." I pointed out that justification inevitably leads to glorification; that is, since God has justified us, he will also glorify us. Therefore, not only our present status, including both peace and access, but our final end, the hope of the glory of God, assure us that God's purposes for us will never be frustrated.

But this third benefit of justification is richer than anything I have expressed thus far, and for that reason, I want to take time to look at it carefully.

The Glory of Jesus Christ

I begin with the high priestly prayer of Jesus uttered just before his crucifixion:

Father, the time has come. Glorify your Son, that your Son may glorify you.... I have brought you glory on earth by completing the work you gave me to do. And now, Father, glorify me in your presence with the glory I had with you before the world began.... Father, I want those you have given me to be with me where I am, and to see my glory, the glory you have given me because you loved me before the creation of the world.

John 17:1, 4-5, 24

These verses teach that Jesus possessed a certain glory before his incarnation and laid this glory aside when he became man, but that now, having finished the earthly work God had given him to do, he was to take up that glory again. What was that glory? We have a few good intimations of it in Scripture, and there are a number of references to it beyond that.

First, when Peter, James, and John were with Jesus on the Mount of Transfiguration, we read that Jesus "was transfigured before them. His face shone like the sun, and his clothes became as white as the light" (Matt. 17:2). This was not a full manifestation of his heavenly glory, but it was enough to dazzle and even frighten the disciples. Peter, especially, was amazed at what he saw. At the time he had only a foolish suggestion: "Lord, it is good for us to be here. If you wish, I will put up three shelters—one for you, one for Moses and one for Elijah" (v. 4). But Peter always remembered this experience and later wrote, "We did not follow cleverly invented stories when we told you about the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but we were eyewitnesses of his majesty. For he received honor and glory from God the Father when the voice came to him from the Majestic Glory, saying, 'This is my Son, whom I love; with him I am well pleased.' We ourselves heard this voice that came from heaven when we were with him on the sacred mountain" (2 Peter 1:16-18).

The second intimation of Jesus' heavenly glory was Paul's vision of Jesus on the road to Damascus. That vision blinded Paul, and he was without sight for three days until God sent Ananias to heal him.

The glory of Jesus is a wonderful thing. So it is significant that in the Lord's great priestly prayer he asks not only that it might be restored to him following his crucifixion, resurrection, and ascension into heaven, which it clearly was, but also that those who belong to him might have the privilege of beholding him thus glorified. In light of this, when Paul speaks of "the hope of the glory of God" in Romans, at the very least he is looking forward to the time when we will see Jesus in the full manifestation of his glory. He had seen this glory on the way to Damascus and perhaps on one other occasion (2 Cor. 12:1-6), and he longed to see it again.

"Changed from Glory into Glory"

But we have to go further in understanding this idea, for it also has to do with the fact that we shall be glorified, as I suggested at the beginning. This is necessary, of course, because without our own glorification we would never be able to see the glory of the Lord (Heb. 12:14).

The best New Testament expression of this theme is 2 Corinthians 3:12-18, but to understand it we need to remember something that happened to Moses as a result of his having spent time with God on Mount Sinai (Exod. 34:29-35). When Moses came down from the mountain his face glowed with a transferred brilliance, and this was so bright that the people were unable to look directly at him. To converse with them Moses had to cover his face with a veil until the heavenly glory faded.

In 2 Corinthians 3, Paul picks up on this story, suggesting that today the veil is actually over the hearts of unbelievers and that believers, by contrast, are themselves unveiled and are becoming increasingly glorious, rather than having the glory fade from them, which is what happened to Moses. He says, "And we, who with unveiled faces all reflect the Lord's glory, are being transformed into his likeness with ever-increasing glory, which comes from the Lord, who is the Spirit" (v. 18). This means that the experience of Christians is to become increasingly glorified even now. We are to become like the Lord Jesus Christ in his perfections.

D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones has an excellent discussion of this progressive transformation, and one of its valuable features is his citing of hymns that use the idea of glory to express being transformed into Christ's likeness.

One of the best known of Charles Wesley's hymns is "Love Divine, All Loves Excelling." The theme of this hymn is sanctification, and in it the sanctifying roles of the Son, Holy Spirit, and Father are reviewed successively while the corresponding progress of the believer is unfolded. The last verse says:

Finish, then, thy new creation; Pure and spotless let us be: Let us see thy great salvation Perfectly restored in thee!
Changed from glory into glory,
Till in heaven we take our place,
Till we cast our crowns before thee, Lost in wonder, love, and praise.

The central line, "changed from glory into glory," refers to the growth in holiness that is being achieved in believers now.

Here is another hymn, one by Isaac Watts: "Come, We That Love the Lord." One verse especially captures our idea, saying:

The men of grace have found Glory begun below;
Celestial fruits on earthly ground From faith and hope may grow.

The fact that we are going to be like Jesus one day is a marvelous expectation. But it is encouraging to know that this transformation has already begun for those who have been justified. In fact, sanctification proves to us that we are on the path to that glory.

The Glory of God

Yet I have still not reached the greatest part of the Christian's blessed hope, which I am expounding in this study.

Going back to Romans 5:2, we notice that, although Romans 5:2 is parallel to Romans 8:30 (as I have already indicated several times), the words Paul uses are not "glorification" or even "the glory of Jesus Christ," but "the glory of God." What is this "glory"? We have already touched on aspects of this word in treating the glory of Jesus. But glory is one of the richest concepts in the Bible, and for that reason it is worth backing up just a bit to define it more fully.

1. The meaning of "glory" in Greek. In the early days of the Greek language, when many Greek words were still developing freely, there was a verb (dokeō) that meant "to believe," "to think," or (in an intransitive form) "to seem," "to appear," or "to have the appearance of." Thus, the sentence dokei moi means "it seems good to me." From this verb came the noun (doxa), which is the word we translate as "glory" but which in those early stages naturally referred to how a thing seems or appears to someone. In other words, it meant "an opinion." This early meaning of doxa has been preserved in such theological terms as orthodox, paradox, and heterodox. An orthodox statement is one in which a person holds a "right" opinion. A paradox is a "contrary" or inherently "contradictory" opinion. A heterodox opinion is one "other than" the right one.

In those early days the opinion one held could be either a good opinion or a bad one. But, as time went on, the word came to be used almost exclusively of a good opinion—it meant "renown," "reputation," or "honor"—and finally meant only the very best opinion of only the very best individuals. This is why the ancients came in time to speak of the "glory" of kings and eventually of God as "the King of glory" (Ps. 24:7-10). God is the King of glory because he is the most glorious of all beings. He is the one of whom only the highest opinions should be held.

When we express these high opinions of God what do we do? We "glorify" him, don't we? So, in this sense, to "glorify" God, "worship" God, and "praise" God are the same thing. To worship God means to assign him his true worth.

2. The meaning of "glory" in Hebrew. In the Hebrew language the words translated "glory" are a bit different, and to complicate matters a bit more, there are also two very distinct ideas. Nevertheless, it is important to have this background as well.

The common Hebrew word for "glory" is kabod. It is closest to the Greek word and is therefore (in the Septuagint) usually so translated. Kabod can mean "reputation" or "renown." But the root meaning actually refers to something that is "weighty" as opposed to something that is "weightless." We can define the glory of God in one sense by saying that God alone has real gravity or that he is the only really weighty being in the universe. To expand the idea a bit further, we can say that when the created order moves closer to God it takes on weight —like matter rushing toward a black hole—and that when created things move away from him they become lighter. Thus, the idols are accounted as being mere "nothings" (they have no weight), and God's judgment upon godless rulers is expressed by God's saying, as in the case of King Belshazzar, "Mene, mene, tekel, parsin" (Dan. 5:25). Tekel meant "You have been weighed on the scales and found wanting" (v. 27).

The other distinctly Hebrew idea is the shekinah. This was a visible manifestation of God's glory, generally understood as light so brilliant as to be unapproachable. This was the glory transferred to the face of Moses as a result of his having spent time with God on Mount Sinai (Exod. 34:2935; cf. 2 Cor. 3:12-18), which I have previously noted. It was also the glory, veiled in a cloud, that descended to fill the Most Holy Place of the Israelites' wilderness tabernacle and later of the temple in Jerusalem (Exod. 40:34-38; 1 Kings 8:10-11).

With this important background in place, let me refer now to one of the most interesting stories in the Old Testament. Moses had led the people of Israel to Mount Sinai and there had received the law of God. But the time to move on was coming, and Moses was not at all sure of his ability to lead the people forward. He shared his anxiety with God, and God replied, "My Presence will go with you, and I will give you rest" (Exod. 33:14).

Moses was still not satisfied. "If your Presence does not go with us, do not send us up from here. How will anyone know that you are pleased with me and with your people unless you go with us? What else will distinguish me and your people from all the other people on the face of the earth?" (vv. 15-16).

God said he would do what Moses asked. He would go with them.

Then Moses asked the most daring thing of all. "Show me your glory," he said.

To this God replied, "I will cause all my goodness to pass in front of you, and I will proclaim my name, the LORD, in your presence. I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion. But... you cannot see my face, for no one may see me and live.... There is a place near me where you may stand on a rock. When my glory passes by, I will put you in a cleft in the rock and cover you with my hand until I have passed by. Then I will remove my hand and you will see my back; but my face must not be seen" (vv. 1923).

In these verses, seeing the glory of God and seeing the face of God are treated as identical. This means, in the final analysis, that "hope of the glory of God," the phrase Paul uses in Romans 5:2, is nothing less than what theologians have called the Beatific Vision. It is the vision of God —the goal of our faith, the climax.

So what Paul is telling us is that the boon for which Moses prayed, and for which the saints of the ages have longed for fervently, is to be ours, and it is to be ours because of our gracious justification by the Father. Those who have been justified will see God. Therefore, as Paul wrote elsewhere, "Now we see but a poor reflection as in a mirror; then we shall see face to face. Now I know in part; then I shall know fully, even as I am fully known" (1 Cor. 13:12).

A Sure and Certain Hope

I need to make two more points to unfold fully what Paul is getting at in this section of Romans. The first is that this glorious culmination of our salvation by God is certain.

I have been saying this in different ways ever since we began these studies of Romans 5, but it is especially necessary to emphasize this now because of Paul's use of the noun hope in our text: "hope of the glory of God." In our day "hope" is a rather weak word. One dictionary defines it pretty well when it says: "desire with expectation of obtaining what is desired," listing "trust" and "reliance" as synonyms. But in common speech we usually mean much less than this. We speak of "hoping against hope" or "hoping for the best," which implies that we are not very hopeful. Or we even say, like John Milton, "Our final hope is flat despair" (Paradise Lost, book 2, line 139).

But this is not what hope means in the Bible, and even the dictionary definition (which I said was not bad) falls short of it. In the Bible, "hope" means certainty, and the only reason it is called hope rather than certainty is that we do not possess what is hoped for yet, although we will. Here are some examples of how "hope" is used in the New Testament:

- Acts 2:26-27—" '... my body also will live in hope, because you will not abandon me to the grave...'" (cf. Ps. 16:8-11).
- 1 Corinthians 13:13a—"And now these three remain: faith, hope and love."
- 2 Corinthians 1:a—"And our hope for you is firm...."
- Colossians 1:5—"The faith and love that spring from the hope that is stored up for you in heaven...."
- Colossians 1:27—"... Christ in you, the hope of glory."
- Titus 1:2—"... hope of eternal life, which God, who does not lie, promised before the beginning of time."
- Titus 2:13—"While we wait for the blessed hope—the glorious appearing of our great God and Savior, Jesus Christ."
- Hebrews 6:19-20—"We have this hope as an anchor for the soul, firm and secure. It enters the inner sanctuary behind the curtain, where Jesus, who went before us, has entered on our behalf...."
- 1 Peter 1:3—"... [God] has given us new birth into a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead."

In each of those passages, hope refers to certainty. For even though we are not yet in full possession of what is hoped for, we are nevertheless certain of it, since it has been won for us by Christ and has been promised to us by God "who does not lie." This is how Paul is speaking in

Romans 5:2 when he says, "And we rejoice in the hope of the glory of God."

And there is something else. The Greek word for "rejoice" is a common one in the New Testament, being used seventy-two times in Paul's writings alone. But this is not the word used here, though it is not incorrectly translated "rejoice." The word Paul used is kauchōmetha, which actually means "boast" or "glory in." So the meaning is even stronger than rejoicing. How could it be possible to boast, glory, or exult in our "hope of glory" if that end result were not absolutely certain?

Clearly, those who have been justified are to look forward to their final and full glorification with great confidence.

Purified by This Hope

There is one last point. In 1 John 3:1-3, the apostle is speaking of the return of Jesus Christ and of the fact that when he appears we shall be like him. He calls this our "hope," which is an appropriate use of the word, as we have already seen. But this is not only something having to do with the future, says John. Hope has a present significance, too. Here is how he puts it: "Dear friends, now we are children of God, and what we will be has not yet been made known. But we know that when he appears, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is. Everyone who has this hope in him purifies himself, just as he is pure" (vv. 2-3, emphasis added). It is our hope, or confidence, that we will be like Jesus one day that motivates us to be like him now. It leads us to live as morally pure a life as possible.

I have already said that Romans 5-8 is not chiefly about sanctification. But it does not exclude it, and in fact the opposite is the case. These chapters are about assurance, about our certain hope. But for that very reason they also embrace our growth in holiness. It is because we know that we will be like the Lord one day that we must purify ourselves and strive to live for him now.

Chapter 63.
God's Purpose in Human Suffering

Romans 5:3-5

The fifth chapter of Romans lists the grounds on which a person who has been justified by God through faith in Jesus Christ can know that he is saved from sin and can be steadfast in that knowledge. Verses 1 and 2 have listed several ways a Christian can be sure of this. Verses 3-5 give one more reason. It is the way believers in Christ respond to the troubles, trials, and tribulations of this life.

Christians do have tribulations, just like anybody else.

How should they respond to these trials?

How does their response strengthen their confidence that they are truly converted persons?

Paul says that Christians respond to their trials by rejoicing in them, however strange, abnormal, or even irrational this may seem to unbelievers, and that this is itself another evidence of their salvation. His exact words are: "Not only so, but we also rejoice in our sufferings, because we know that suffering produces perseverance; perseverance, character; and character, hope. And hope does not disappoint us, because God has poured out his love into our hearts by the Holy Spirit, whom he has given us."

A Matter of Knowledge

Each of the words in these verses is of great importance, and we are going to look at some of them in detail. But if someone should ask me, "What is the most important word?" I would say that it is the word know in verse 3. The phrase reads, "because we know...." "Know" is important because knowledge is the secret to everything else in the sentence. Christians rejoice in suffering because of what they know about it.

You have all heard the tired atheistic rebuttal to Christian doctrine based upon the presence of suffering in the world. It has been expressed in different forms, depending on which unbeliever has uttered it. But one common form goes like this: "If God were good, he would wish to make his creatures happy, and if God were almighty he would be able to do what he wished. But his creatures are not happy. Therefore God lacks either goodness or power or both." That objection is insulting in its simplicity, for it assumes that our lack of suffering is an ultimate good and that the only possible factors involved in our quandary are the alleged benevolence and alleged omniscience of God. The Christian knows that there is more to the problem than this.

Still, the problem of suffering is a big one, and it is not easy to answer it in a single essay or even in a single book.

A Number of Negatives

The place to begin is with some negatives, and the negatives we need to begin with are two nonChristian approaches to this problem.

1. Epicureanism. The first non-Christian approach to suffering goes by the name Epicureanism, from the name of the Greek philosopher Epicurus (342-270 B.C.). Epicurus taught that life is an inevitable mixture of good and bad experiences, and since there are always some bad experiences, which cannot be avoided, the way to handle them is by loading life with more pleasure than pain so that the bottom line is positive. This outlook is called "qualified hedonism." It is popular today. I suppose it is the basic "Yuppie" outlook or mentality. But, of course, this is not the Christian answer to unavoidable bad things.

2. Stoicism. The second inadequate answer also has a Greek name since it was developed by a body of Greek philosophers called Stoics. Their answer was what our English friends call "the stiff upper lip" or, as we say: trying to "grin and bear it."

Some years ago there was a war movie starring the quintessential Stoic actor, Jimmy Cagney. I forget the exact title of this film, but it involved a crew of air-force bomber pilots who were flying raids over Europe in support of the Allied invasion. Cagney was returning from one of these raids, but his plane had been fired upon and was damaged and it looked as if it would not be able to clear the cliffs of Dover and so be able to return to its base. The crew dropped everything they could to lighten the plane and give it height, but it was still too low. Finally the crew itself bailed out, leaving Cagney alone at the controls. The plane was close to the cliffs now, and they were looming larger and larger through the cockpit window. It was clear the plane was not going to make it. Finally, just as the plane got to the cliffs, Cagney leaned out the window and spit at the cliff—and a moment later the plane exploded in flame.

That is the Stoic temperament. It is the attitude of the man who takes whatever life brings to him and spits at fate. But, of course, this is not the approach of Christians any more than that of the Epicureans.

God's Many Purposes

I have called this chapter "God's Purpose in Human Suffering" because of the single purpose that Paul spells out in our text. But if the entire Word of God is to be taken into account, as I intend to do, it would be better to speak of "God's purposes in human suffering," since there are a number of them. Let me suggest a few as part of our general approach to this large topic.

1. Corrective suffering. The most obvious category of suffering for a Christian is what we can call corrective suffering, that is, suffering that is meant to get us back onto the path of righteousness when we have strayed from it. We have an example from family life in the spankings given to young children when they disobey and do wrong. If a child needs a spanking, he should receive one, and if he has the right kind of father or mother, he does. Why? Is it because the parent likes to inflict pain? Are good parents all naturally sadists? Not at all! Rather, they understand that a child has to learn that he or she is not free to do whatever seems desirable irrespective of the needs or feelings of others, and that there are painful consequences whenever anyone persists in wrongdoing.

It is the same in the case of the divine Father and those who are his spiritual children. The author of Hebrews quotes Proverbs 3:11-12—" 'My son, do not make light of the Lord's discipline, and do not lose heart when he rebukes you, because the Lord disciplines those he loves, and he punishes everyone he accepts as a son' "—concluding that we should: "Endure hardship as discipline.... For what son is not disciplined by his father?" (Heb. 12:5-7).

I mention this form of suffering first, for the first thing we should do when suffering comes into our lives is ask God whether or not it is intended by him for our correction. If it is, we need to confess our wrongdoing and return to the path of righteousness.

2. Suffering for the glory of God. A second important reason for suffering in the lives of some Christians is God's glory. Therefore, although when we suffer we should always ask God whether or not the suffering is for our correction, we should never blithely assume that this is necessarily what God is doing in the life of someone else. On the contrary, another person's suffering may be an evidence only of God's special favor to him or her.

How can that be?

Well, in John 9 we are told of the healing of a man who had been blind from birth. The blind man was apparently sitting at one of the gates of the temple when Jesus and his disciples passed by. The disciples made the mistake I just referred to, supposing that the man's sufferings were the result of a one-to-one relationship to some sin. They asked Jesus, "Rabbi, who sinned, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?" (John 9:2).

Jesus answered, "Neither this man nor his parents sinned, but this happened so that the work of God might be displayed in his life" (v. 3). Clearly, Jesus was teaching that the sole cause of this man's having spent the many long years of his life in blindness was so that, at this moment, Jesus might heal him and thus bring glory to God.

That idea is hard for many people to accept, particularly non-Christians. But it is not so difficult when we remember that life is short when measured by the scope of eternity and that our chief end is to glorify God—by whatever means he may choose to have us do it.

It was this knowledge that enabled Hugh Latimer to cry out to Nicolas Ridley as they were being led to the stake in Oxford, England, in 1555, "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man; we shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England as (I trust) shall never be put out."

Only those who have their eyes on eternity can assume this perspective.

3. Suffering as a part of cosmic warfare. A third kind of suffering is illustrated by the story of Job from the Old Testament. The story begins with Job as a happy and favored man, with a fine family and many possessions. But suddenly he suffered the loss of his many herds and the death of his ten children, and he did not know why. His friends came to try to help him sort it through. In fact, the Book of Job is a record of the limitations of human reasoning in wrestling through these tough problems. But we know why Job suffered, because the book tells us why at the very beginning. It was because of a conflict between Satan and God. Satan had made the accusation that Job loved and served God only because God had blessed Job physically. "But stretch out your hand and strike everything he has, and he will surely curse you to your face," said Satan (Job 1:11).

God knew that this was not so. But he allowed Satan to have his way to show that Job loved God for himself and not for what he could get out of him. Job lost everything, but in a posture of abject mourning he nevertheless worshiped God, saying: "Naked I came from my mother's womb, and naked I will depart. The LORD gave and the LORD has taken away; may the name of the LORD be praised" (v. 21). Then we are told: "In all this, Job did not sin by charging God with wrongdoing" (v. 22).

This story explains a great deal (perhaps most) of the suffering some Christians endure. I imagine that for every believer who is suffering with a particular form of cancer there is also a nonbeliever in exactly the same condition and that the Christian praises and worships God in spite of his afflictions while the unbeliever curses God and bitterly resents his fate. God is showing that the purpose of life lies in a right relationship to him and not in pleasant circumstances. For every Christian who loses a son or daughter there is a non-Christian who experiences the same thing. For every Christian who loses a job there is a non-Christian in like circumstances. This is the explanation of life's struggles, in my opinion. It is the ultimate reason for the drama of history.

4. Constructive suffering. The fourth purpose of God in suffering is what Paul presents in Romans 5, namely, that God uses our troubles, trials, and tribulations to form Christian character.

Evangelist Billy Graham illustrated this by a story from the Great Depression. A friend of his had lost a job, a fortune, a wife, and a home. But he was a believer in Jesus Christ, and he hung to his faith tenaciously even though he could see no purpose in what was happening and was naturally oppressed by his circumstances. One day in the midst of his depression he was wandering through the city and stopped to watch masons doing stonework on a huge church. One was chiseling a triangular piece of stone. "What are you doing with that?" he asked.

The workman stopped and pointed to a tiny opening near the top of a nearly completed spire. "See that little opening up there near the top of the spire?" he said. "Well, I'm shaping this down here so that it will fit in up there." Graham's friend said that tears filled his eyes as he walked away, for it seemed to him that God had spoken to say that he was shaping him for heaven through his earthly ordeal.

The Benefits of Suffering

Having approached our subject from the perspective of God's purposes, we are now ready to see what Paul says suffering will do in the lives of Christians, and why this is reassuring. What benefits does suffering bring?

First, it produces perseverance. You may notice another word used to translate this idea in your Bible—if you are using other than the New International Version—because the word seems to most translators to call for a richness of expression. Some versions say "patience," others "endurance," still others "patient endurance."

The full meaning of this word emerges when we consider it together with the word for "suffering," which occurs just before it in the Greek text and which is what Paul says produces "patience" (KJV). There are a number of words for suffering in the Greek language, but this one is thlipsis, which has the idea of pressing something down. It was used for the effect of a sledge as it threshed grain, for instance. The sledge pressed down the stalks and thus broke apart the heads to separate the chaff from the grain. Thlipsis was also used of crushing olives to extract their oil or of grapes to press out wine.

With that in mind, think now of "perseverance." The word translated "perseverance" is hypomonē. The first part of this word is a prefix meaning "under" or "below." The second part is a word meaning an "abode" or "living place." So the word as a whole means to "live under something." If we take this word together with the word for tribulation, we get the full idea, which is to live under difficult circumstances without trying, as we would say, to wriggle out from under them. We express the idea positively when we say, "Hang in there, brother." It is hanging in when the going gets tough, as it always does sooner or later.

So here is one thing that separates the immature person from the mature one, the new Christian from one who has been in the Lord's school longer. The new believer tries to avoid the difficulties and get out from under them. The experienced Christian is steady under fire and does not quit his post.

Second, just as suffering produces steady perseverance, so (according to Paul) does perseverance produce character. Other versions translate this word as "experience." But again, it is richer even than these two very useful renderings.

The Greek word is dokimē, but dokimē is based on the similar word dokimos, which means something "tested" or "approved." There is an illustration that Paul himself provides. In 1 Corinthians 9:27 Paul is speaking of self-discipline and says, "... I beat my body and make it my slave so that after I have preached to others, I myself will not be disqualified for the prize." The word disqualified is our word, but with a negative particle in front of it. This suggests an image from the ancient world. Silver and gold coins were made quite roughly in those days, not milled to exact sizes as our coins are, and people would often cheat with them by carefully trimming off some of the excess metal. We know they did this because hundreds of laws were passed against the practice. After people had trimmed away enough metal, they would sell it for new coins.

When coins had been trimmed for a long time, they eventually got so light that the merchants would not take them anymore; then a coin was said to be adokimos, "disqualified." This is what Paul is referring to. He is saying that he does not want to be disqualified, but rather to be judged "fit" as a result of his sufferings and self-discipline.

It is the same in our Romans text, where Paul says that the sufferings of life or the pressures of merely trying to live for Christ in our godless environment produce endurance, which in turn proves that we are fit.

I think of it another way, too. A disapproved coin is a light coin, and I remember (from the previous study) that this is what happens to us when we draw away from God. We become increasingly weightless. But when we draw closer to God and he to us, working in us what is well pleasing to himself, we become "weighty," as he is. We become approved persons of great value.

Ray Stedman, who discusses these benefits well in his Romans commentary, tells at this point of a time he once asked a nine-year-old-boy, "What do you want to be when you grow up?"

The boy said, "A returned missionary."

He did not want to be just a missionary, but a returned one—one who had been through the fires, had them behind him, and was shown to have been of real value in God's work.

Finally, Paul indicates that the steadfast, approved character created by perseverance in its turn produces hope. Here we have come full circle. We started with hope. We saw it as an assurance of what will one day be ours, though we do not possess it yet. Then we looked at our sufferings. We saw why we can rejoice in them. It is because they lead to endurance, endurance to an approved character, and character to an even more steadfast hope. And all this is further evidence of our security in Christ—when we share in Christ's sufferings and embrace them in like fashion.

The Church in China

Some years ago I had an opportunity to publish an article on suffering by one of the missionaries of Tenth Presbyterian Church, Dr. Jonathan Chao, an acknowledged expert on the state of the church in China. It made a comparison between the growth of the Chinese church during the relatively peaceful years of the nineteenth and early-twentieth centuries, and the years since 1950, when the Communists took over. By the end of the "missionary period," there were approximately 840,000 Christians in China. Today, however, after forty years of the most intense persecutions and suffering, the Chinese church, according to Chao's calculations, numbers fifty million. In Chao's opinion, it was the suffering of the church that produced character, the ability not only to survive the persecutions, but also to win many others even in hard times.

I mention this background for the sake of the following story. In this same article Chao told of an American student who came to Hong Kong to study the Chinese church. Before he had left the States a friend had asked him, "If God loves the Chinese church so much, why did he allow so much suffering to come upon it?"

The student confessed that he had no answer at the time. But after he had traveled to China and had made extensive and meaningful contacts with a number of Chinese Christians, he discovered an answer that he put like this: "Mr. Chao, I am going back to America and ask my friend this question: If God loves the American church so much, why hasn't he allowed us to suffer like the church in China?"

It is a good question, because, according to the Bible, suffering is not harmful; on the contrary, it is a beneficial experience. It is beneficial because it accomplishes the beneficent purposes of Almighty God. It is part of all those circumstances that work "for the good of those who love him..." (Rom. 8:28).

Chapter 64.
God's Love Commended

Romans 5:6-8

There are a number of preachers today, some of them quite famous, who do not want to say anything unpleasant about sinful human nature. They describe their approach to Christianity as "possibility thinking" and argue that people are already so discouraged about themselves that they do not need to be told that they are wicked. I do not know how such preachers could possibly preach on our text.

They should want to, I think, Romans 5:6-8 (and verse 5, which precedes this paragraph) speak about the love that God has for us. The greatness of this love, which is mentioned here in Romans for the very first time, is an uplifting and positive theme. Besides, it is brought into the argument at this point to assure us that all who have been justified by faith in Christ have been saved because of God's love for them and that nothing will ever be able to separate them from it. This is the climax to which we will also come at the end of Romans 8. Nothing could be more positive or more edifying than this theme. Yet Paul's statement of the nature, scope, and permanence of God's love is placed against the black backdrop of human sin, and rightly so. For, as Paul tells us: "God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us" (v. 8).

How can we appreciate or even understand that statement without speaking about the evil natures of those whom God has thus loved?

This is a very practical matter for two reasons. First, since Paul is describing the love of God against the dark background of human sin, he is saying that it is only against this background that we are able to form a true picture of how great the love of God is. In other words, if we think (as many do) that God loves us because we are somehow quite lovely or desirable, our appreciation of the love of God will be reduced by just that amount—just as a beautiful but very vain woman might have trouble appreciating the love of her husband, or of anyone else. If we think we deserve the best of everything, we will not appreciate the love we receive irrespective of our beauty, talent, or other supposedly admirable qualities.

The second point is this: If we think we deserve God's love, we cannot ever really be secure in it, because we will always be afraid that we may do something to lessen or destroy the depth of God's love for us. It is only those who know that God has loved them in spite of their sin who can trust him to continue to show them favor.

God's Love for Sinners

I begin with Paul's description of the people God loves and has saved, and I ask you to notice the four powerful words used to portray them, three in the passage we are studying and one additional word in verse 10. They are "powerless," "ungodly," "sinners," and "enemies." It is important to know that we are all rightly described by each of these words.

1. Powerless. This word is translated in a variety of ways in our Bible versions: "weak,"

"helpless," "without strength," "feeble," "sluggish in doing right," and so on. Only the strongest terms will do in this context, since the idea is that, left to ourselves, none of us is able to do even one small thing to please God or achieve salvation.

One commentator distinguishes between "conditional impossibilities" and "unconditional impossibilities" in order to show that this kind of inability is truly unconditional. A conditional impossibility is one in which we are unable to do something unless something else happens. For example, I might find it impossible to repay a loan unless I should suddenly earn a large sum of money. Or I might be unable to accept an invitation to some social event unless a prior commitment is canceled. An unconditional impossibility is one which no possible change in circumstances can alter, and it is this that describes us in our pre-converted state.

What specifically were we unable to do? We were unable to understand spiritual things (1 Cor. 2:14). We were unable to see the kingdom of God or enter it (John 3:3, 5). We were unable to seek God (Rom. 3:11). Paul elsewhere describes this inability vividly when he says that before God saved us we were "dead in [our] transgressions and sins" (Eph. 2:1). That is, we were no more able to respond to or seek God than a corpse is able to respond to stimuli of any kind.

2. Ungodly. This word conveys the same idea Paul expressed at the beginning of his description of the race in its rebellion against God: "The wrath of God is being revealed from heaven against all the godlessness and wickedness of men who suppress the truth by their wickedness" (Rom. 1:18).

In these verses, "ungodly" and "godlessness" mean not so much that human beings are unlike God (though that is also true), but that in addition they are in a state of fierce opposition to him. God is sovereign, but they oppose him in his sovereignty. They do not want him to rule over them; they want to be free to do as they please. God is holy, and they oppose him in his holiness. This means that they do not accept his righteous and proper moral standards; they do not want their sinful acts and desires to be called into question. God is omniscient, and they oppose him for his omniscience. They are angry that he knows them perfectly, that nothing they think or do is hidden from his sight. They also oppose him for his immutability, since immutability means that God does not change in these or any of his other attributes.

3. Sinners. "Sinners" describes those who have fallen short of God's standards, as Romans 3:23 says: "For all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God." It means that we have broken God's law and in this sense is probably parallel to the word wickedness in Romans 1:18, which was cited above. "Godlessness" is being opposed to God; that is, to have broken the first table of the law, which tells us that we are to worship and serve God only (cf. Matt. 22:37-38). "Wickedness" means to have broken the second table of the law; we have failed to treat others properly, to have respected them, and to have loved them as we love ourselves (cf. Matt. 22:39).

4. Enemies. The final word Paul uses to describe human beings apart from the supernatural work of God in their lives is "enemies," though the word does not appear until verse 10. This summarizes what has been said by the first three terms, but it also goes beyond that. It affirms that not only are we unable to save ourselves, are unlike and opposed to God, and are violators of his law, but we are also opposed to God in the sense that we would attack him and destroy him if we could. Being like Satan in his desires, we would drag God from his throne, cast him to hell and crush him into nothingness—if that were possible—> which is what many people actually tried to do when God came among them in the person of Jesus Christ.

What a terrible picture of humanity! No wonder the possibility thinkers choose other, more uplifting themes to speak about!

Yet it is only against this background that we see the brightness of God's love. "You see," writes Paul, "at just the right time, when we were still powerless, Christ died for the ungodly. Very rarely will anyone die for a righteous man, though for a good man someone might possibly dare to die. But God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us" (vv. 6-8).

Love at the Cross

Any contrast has two sides, of course, and thus far we have looked only at one side. We have looked at the dark side: ourselves. We have seen that God loved us, not when we were lovely people who were seeking him out and trying to obey him, but when we were actually fighting him and were willing to destroy him if we could. That alone makes the measure of God's love very great. However, we may also see the greatness of the love of God by looking at the bright side: God's side. And here we note that God did not merely reach out to give us a helping hand, bestowing what theologians call common grace—sending rain on the just and unjust alike (cf. Matt. 5:45), for instance—but that he actually sent his beloved Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, to die for us.

There is a further contrast, too, as Paul brings these great ideas together and compares what God has done in dying for sinners with what human beings might themselves do in certain circumstances. Paul points out that, while a human being might be willing to give his life for a righteous or, better yet, a morally superior woman or man under certain circumstances, Jesus died for us while we were still sinners, which is the precise opposite of being good, or righteous.

In his excellent study of this text Donald Grey Barnhouse gives two illustrations of exceptionally great human love.

In one story two men were trapped in a mine cave-in, and poisonous gas was escaping. One man had a wife and three children. He also had a gas mask, but his mask had been torn in the underground explosion and he would have perished apart from the act of the man who was trapped with him. This second man took off his own mask and forced it on the man who survived, saying, "You have Mary and the children; they need you. I am alone and can go." When we hear of an act like this, we sense we are on hallowed ground.

The other story concerns a tough youngster from the streets of one of our large cities. His sister had been crippled and needed an operation. The operation was provided for her. But after the operation the girl needed a blood transfusion, and the boy, her brother, was asked to volunteer. He was taken to her bedside and watched tight-lipped as a needle was inserted into his vein and blood was fed into his sister's body. When the transfusion was over, the doctor put his arm on the boy's shoulder and told him that he had been very brave. The youngster knew nothing about the nature of a blood transfusion. But the doctor knew even less about the actual bravery of the boy—until the boy looked up at him and asked steadily, "Doc, how long before I croak?" He had gotten the idea that he would have to die to save his sister, and he had thought that he was dying drop by drop as his blood flowed into her veins. But he did it anyway!

These stories sober us, because in them we recognize something of the highest human love. Yet, when we read of the love of God in Romans 5, we learn that it was not for those who were close to him or who loved him that Jesus died—but for those who were opposed to God and were his enemies. It is on this basis that God commends his love to us.

An Argument for Hard Hearts

Isn't it astounding that God should need to commend his love to us? We are told in the Bible, though we should know it even without being told, that all good gifts come from God's hands (James 1:17). It is from God that we receive life and health, food and clothing, love from and fellowship with other people, and meaningful work. These blessings should prove the love of God beyond any possibility of our doubting it. Yet we do doubt it. We are insensitive to God's love, and God finds it necessary to commend his love by reminding us of the death of his Son.

So it is at the cross that we see the love of God in its fullness. What a great, great love this is!

You may recall that when the Swiss theologian Karl Barth was in this country some years before his death, someone asked a question at one of his question-and-answer sessions that went like this: "Dr. Barth, what is the greatest thought that has ever gone through your mind?"

The questioner probably expected some complicated and incomprehensible answer, as if Einstein were being asked to explain the theory of relativity. But after he had thought a long while, Barth replied by saying: "Jesus loves me, this I know. For the Bible tells me so."

This was a profound answer and a correct one. For there is nothing greater that any of us could think about or know than that Jesus loves us and has shown his love by dying in our place.

The Greatness of God's Love

I would like to close this study by reflecting on the greatness of God's love for us, but I wonder how anyone can do that adequately. How can any merely human words sufficiently express this wonder?

Some years ago I was preaching through the Gospel of John and had come to that greatest of all verses about the love of God: John 3:16. "For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life." I wanted to say that the love of God is great, remembering that Ephesians 2:4 uses that very word: "But because of his great love for us...." But the English word great is not great enough for this subject. The week before, I had been at Houghton College in New York, and I remembered having said that I thought the work of the college was great, that some of the points the other speakers had made were great, and that I had had a great time. I was sincere in my use of the word great. But what were such uses of the word compared to the use of the word to describe God's love?

Someone once tried to express the greatness of God's love by printing on a little card a special arrangement of John 3:16, with certain descriptive phrases added. The twelve parts of the verse were arranged down one side of the card, and the added phrases were printed across from them. It went like this:

God the greatest Lover

so loved	the greatest degree
the world	the greatest company that he gave	the greatest act
his only begotten Son	the greatest gift that whosoever	the greatest opportunity believeth	the greatest simplicity in him	the greatest attraction should not perish	the greatest promise
but	the greatest difference
have	the greatest certainty
everlasting life	the greatest possession

The title placed over the whole was: "Christ—the Greatest Gift."

Let me try to express the greatness of the love of God by the words of a hymn by F. M. Lehman. Lehman wrote most of this hymn, but the final stanza (the best, in my opinion) was added to it later, after it had been found scratched on the wall of a room in an asylum by a man said to have been insane. The first and last verses of the hymn and the chorus, go as follows:

> The love of God is greater far
> Than tongue or pen can ever tell; It goes beyond the highest star, And reaches to the lowest hell. The guilty pair, bowed down with care, God gave his Son to win: His erring child he reconciled And rescued from his sin.
> Could we with ink the ocean fill,
> And were the skies of parchment made;
> Were every stalk on earth a quill,
> And every man a scribe by trade;
> To write the love of God above
> Would drain the ocean dry;
> Nor could the scroll contain the whole,
> Tho stretched from sky to sky.
>
> Oh, love of God, how rich and pure! How measureless and strong! It shall forevermore endure— The saints' and angels' song.

Did you know that the love of God seemed so great to the biblical writers that they invented, or at least raised to an entirely new level of meaning, a brand-new word for love?

The Greek language was rich in words for love. There was the word storgē, which referred to affection, particularly within the family. There was philia, from which we get "philharmonic" and "philanthropy" and the place name "Philadelphia." It refers to a love between friends. A third word was erōs, which has given us "erotic," and which referred to sexual love. This was a rich linguistic heritage. Yet, when the Old Testament was translated into Greek and when the New Testament writers later wrote in Greek, they found that none of these common Greek words was able to express what they wanted. They therefore took another word without strong associations and poured their own, biblical meaning into it. The new word was agapē, which thereby came to mean the holy, gracious, sovereign, everlasting, and giving love of God that we are studying here.

Alas, I feel that even yet I have not begun to explain how great the love of God is. There is nothing to be done but to go back to our text and read again: "You see, at just the right time, when we were still powerless, Christ died for the ungodly. Very rarely will anyone die for a righteous man, though for a good man someone might possibly dare to die. But God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us."

Perhaps I should say one more thing on this subject: If you do not yet fully appreciate (or perhaps have not even begun to appreciate) the greatness of the love God has for you, the explanation is probably that you have never really thought of yourself as God saw you in your fallen state.

Perhaps you have never thought of yourself as someone who was utterly without strength or powerless before God saved you.

Perhaps you have never considered yourself to have been ungodly.

Nor a sinner.

Nor God's enemy.

But that is what you were—and still are if you have never come to Christ in order to be justified. It is only if you can recognize the truth of these descriptions that you can begin to appreciate the love that God holds out to you through the death of his Son.

If you have never responded to this great overture of the divine love, let me encourage you to do that, assuring you that there is no greater truth in all the universe. Can you think of anything greater? Of course, you can't. How could anybody? God loves you. Jesus died for you. Let those truly great thoughts move you to abandon your sin, love God in return, and live for Jesus.

Chapter 65.
Full Salvation

Romans 5:9-11

I have been expounding Romans 5:1-11 for five studies now—this is the sixth—and in every one of these studies I have said that the point of these verses is to assure Christians of their salvation.

They are to know that they are eternally secure in Christ so that they might be able to rejoice in God fully. In this study we find the same idea. I might be inclined to apologize for this repetition were it not for the fact that this is clearly the emphasis of the chapter—and that it is going to continue in one form or another until the end of chapter 8.

This has not been mere repetition, however, since the thesis (which is repeated) has been supported by a variety of arguments:

1. We can be assured of salvation because God has made peace with us through the atoning work of Jesus Christ.
2. We can be assured of salvation because, through that same work of Christ, we have been brought into a new relationship with God in which we continue to stand.
3. We can be assured of salvation because of the sure and certain hope that we shall see God.
4. We can be assured of salvation because of the way we are able to react to sufferings in this life. We see God's purposes in them and therefore rejoice in them, which unbelievers cannot do.
5. We can be assured of salvation because God sent Jesus Christ to die for us, not when we were saved people, as we are now, but when we were God's sworn enemies.

In this last section, Paul provides yet another argument or, what is probably more accurate to say, draws his previous arguments together: "Since we have now been justified by his blood, how much more shall we be saved from God's wrath through him! For if, when we were God's enemies, we were reconciled to him through the death of his Son, how much more, having been reconciled, shall we be saved by his life! Not only is this so, but we also rejoice in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we have now received reconciliation."

Sound Logic

In the sayings that have come down to us from the great Rabbi Hillel there are some principles for Bible interpretation that Paul, as a Jewish thinker, frequently used in his writings. One is called qal w'chomer, from the Hebrew words for "light" and "heavy." It refers to a form of arguing in which, if a lesser thing is true, a greater thing must clearly be true also. Here is an example from the teaching of Jesus: "If you, then, though you are evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will your Father in heaven give good gifts to those who ask him!" (Matt. 7:11). Obviously, if we who are evil know how to do good to those who are close to us (this is the "light" part of the comparison), God, who is utterly good (this is the "heavy" part), will do good to his children.

A second principle related to the light/heavy argument is the opposite, an argument from the "heavy" to the "light." It argues that if something great is true, then something lesser in the same category will obviously be true also. Paul uses this principle twice in these verses:

1. "Since we have now been justified by his blood, how much more shall we be saved from God's wrath through him!" (v. 9), and
2. "For if, when we were God's enemies, we were reconciled to him through the death of his Son, how much more, having been reconciled, shall we be saved by his life!" (v. 10).

Each of these arguments is based upon things God has already done for us through the death of Christ. They are great works: justification on the one hand, and reconciliation on the other. They are so great that they are used by God to commend his love to us, as Paul stated earlier. But if God has already done such great works on our behalf, justifying us in Christ when we were ungodly and reconciling us to himself when we were his enemies, God will obviously continue his work in the lesser task of seeing us through life and through the final judgment.

Saved from God's Wrath

When we look at verse 9, we have a tendency to think that we have already heard everything this verse has to teach. After all, "wrath" is the term we began with back in Romans 1:18, and the doctrine of "justification" was developed fully and compellingly in Romans 3. Besides, Romans 5:9 seems to be almost an identical repeat of verse 1 of this chapter. It is true, of course, that this is the first time we have encountered the word saved in the letter. But what have we been talking about all this time if it has not been salvation?

To understand what is happening we have to realize that "saved" is used in at least three different ways in the Bible, in three different tenses. Sometimes it refers to something past, at other times to something present, sometimes to things yet to come.

Let me illustrate. Suppose you are a Christian and that someone asks you, "Are you saved?"

How do you respond? I suppose you would most likely just say, "Yes, I am." But it would be possible for you to answer in three different ways, the answer you gave ("Yes, I am") being only one of them. If you are thinking of what Jesus accomplished on your behalf by dying for you on the cross, it would be correct to have answered as you did, for Jesus did save you by his substitutionary death.

But if you are thinking of the present and of what God is accomplishing in you day by day, it would also be correct to say, "I am being saved." Paul himself uses the word this second way in 1 Corinthians 1:18: "For the message of the cross is foolishness to those who are perishing, but to us who are being saved it is the power of God." This verse means that God works through the power of the cross to save us from sin now.

Third, you could think in future terms and answer the question by saying, "No, I am not saved yet, but I will be when Jesus returns." In this case you would be looking forward to your future glorification when the work begun in the past by Jesus and continued into the present by the power of the Holy Spirit, who works in us, will be perfected. In that day we will be delivered even from the presence of sin and made like Jesus forever.

I mention these three tenses of the word, because it is important to see that it is in the third sense, the future sense of salvation, that Paul speaks here. He is not denying the other tenses, particularly not the first. But he is thinking of the judgment to come and is saying that because we have already been justified by God on the basis of the death of Christ, we can be certain of being saved from the outpouring of God's wrath in the final day. D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones says, "The apostle's argument is that this method, this way of salvation that God has planned, is a complete whole, and therefore, if we have been justified by Christ's blood we are joined to Christ, we are in Christ, and we shall therefore be saved by him completely and perfectly."

Or we could put it like this: If God has already justified us on the basis of Jesus' atoning death, if he has already pronounced his verdict, any verdict rendered at the final judgment will be only a confirming formality.

Reconciled

Arguing from the "heavy" to the "light" is, if anything, even more apparent in verse 10, where Paul speaks of reconciliation. I begin with the "heavy" part. What is this "heavy" thing God has done for us?

It is the very work we were looking at in detail in the last study. There we were dealing with the love of God, and we saw that the basis upon which God commends his love to us is that it caused him to send his Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, to die for us while we were yet sinners. Our sinfulness was spelled out in three powerful terms, and these (as we saw) are followed by a fourth term in verse 10. Paul describes us as powerless, ungodly, sinners, and enemies. Let us review those terms:

1. "Powerless" means that we are unable to help ourselves. It is what theologians mean by total depravity, not that we are all as bad as we could possibly be, but that we are all equally and totally incapable of doing anything to save ourselves. We are not able to seek out and eventually come even to understand the way of salvation.

2. "Ungodly" means that we are opposed to God in his godly nature. We do not like him for being who he is.

3. "Sinners" means that we are violators of God's moral law, particularly that second table of the law meant to govern our conduct toward other persons.

4. "Enemies," the word used in the verses we are studying now, is the worst term of all. It means not only that we dislike God in his godly nature, but that we are so opposed to God in that nature that we would destroy him if we could. Like a soldier approaching his counterpart in an enemy army in wartime, we consider it a matter of "kill or be killed." We think of God's law as suffocatingly oppressive and destructive of who we want to be. So we are set on destroying God or at least destroying his influence so far as the living of our lives is concerned.

But, says Paul, it is while we were like this that God reconciled us to himself through Jesus' death. "Reconcile" means to remove the grounds of hostility and transform the relationship, changing it from one of enmity to one of friendship. In our case, as Paul has shown earlier, it meant taking us out of the category of enemies and bringing us into God's family as privileged sons and daughters. If God did that for us while we were enemies, Paul reasons, he is certainly going to save us from the final outpouring of his wrath on the day of judgment, now that we are family members.

If God has done the greater thing, he will do the lesser. If he has saved us while we were enemies, he will certainly save us as friends.

Rejoice in God

The last verse of our text, which also marks the end of the first half of Romans 5, says that now, having been reconciled to God, "we also rejoice in God through our Lord Jesus Christ...."

There is a sense in which this idea returns us to where we started out, since the first sentence of Romans 5 speaks of just such a rejoicing: "we rejoice in the hope of the glory of God." But careful reading will show that the object of our rejoicing is not the same in both cases. In verse 2, our rejoicing is in "hope of the glory of God." That is, it is in our glorification. Knowing that we are going to be glorified is a cause of great joy for us. However, in verse 11, the object of our rejoicing is not our glorification, important as that is, but God himself who will accomplish it. And, of course, of the two ideas the second is obviously the greater. To rejoice in God is the greatest of all human activities.

We affirm this in the response to the first question of the Westminster Shorter Catechism.

Question: "What is the chief end of man?"

Answer: "Man's chief end is to glorify God and to enjoy him forever."

Up to this point I have not marked the number of ways and times Paul has referred to God in the first half of Romans 5, but this is the place to do it. In the first paragraph, he has referred to each person of the Trinity: "... we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ.... And we rejoice in the hope of the glory of God.... And hope does not disappoint us, because God has poured out his love into our hearts by the Holy Spirit..." (vv. 1-2, 5, emphasis added). In the passage as a whole, the Holy Spirit is referred to once, God the Father seven times, and the Lord Jesus Christ five times, plus four more times in which Jesus is referred to by a personal pronoun.

What exactly shall we rejoice in, if we are to "rejoice in God"? We can rejoice in any one or all of his attributes. Our passage suggests these:

1. God's wisdom. Several chapters further on in Romans, after Paul has traced the marvels of God's great and gradually unfolding salvation work in history, he will cry out: "Oh, the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable his judgments, and his paths beyond tracing out!" (Rom. 11:33). But even at this point in our study we can marvel at a wisdom so great as to be able to save powerless, ungodly, sinful enemies.

The question is: How can God save sinners without ignoring or otherwise condoning their sin? How can he save those who are filthy without dirtying himself? How can he be both just and the justifier of the ungodly? The answer is: through Christ, through his death for us. But we would not have known this or even have been able to suggest it by ourselves. It took the wisdom of the all-wise God to devise such a plan of salvation.

There is also a special display of God's wisdom in the way suffering works for our good, as Paul has shown in verses 3 and 4.

2. God's grace. Grace is usually defined as God's favor to the undeserving. But we rejoice in God's grace because, in our case, grace is favor not merely to the undeserving but to those who actually deserve the opposite. What do "enemies" deserve, after all? They deserve defeat and destruction. God did not treat us that way, however. Rather, he saved us through the work of Christ.
3. God's power. We often forget God's power when we think about salvation, reserving this theme for when we contemplate creation. But the Scripture speaks of God's power being displayed preeminently at the cross. In fact, the earliest reference to the cross in the Bible does this: Genesis 3:15. In this verse God is speaking to Satan, describing what will happen when the Mediator comes: "And I will put enmity between you and the woman, and between your offspring and hers; he will crush your head, and you will strike his heel." In this verse the cross is portrayed as a battlefield on which Satan and his hosts will be defeated. And so it was! The power of God was revealed at the cross when Satan's power over us was broken. We rejoice in God's power when we think of the cross, as well as in his other attributes.

4. God's love. There are a number of attributes of God that may be learned from nature, chiefly his power and wisdom, and perhaps his grace. But the only place we can learn of God's love is at the cross. Perhaps that is why this attribute is the only one explicitly developed in our passage: "But God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us" (v. 8). It is when we look to the cross that we begin to understand what love is and how much God has loved us.

5. God's immutability. Several times in these studies I have referred to immutability as something for which unregenerate men and women hate God, because he does not change in any of his other attributes. But it is important to say that, although in our unregenerate state we may hate God for his unchanging nature, in our regenerate state we find this something to rejoice in, since it means that God will not waver in his love and favor toward us. Having loved us and having sent the Lord Jesus Christ to save us from our sin, God will not now somehow suddenly change his mind and cast us off. His love, grace, wisdom, and other attributes will always remain as they have been, because he is immutable.

Arthur W. Pink wrote of God's immutability: "Herein is solid comfort. Human nature cannot be relied upon; but God can! However unstable I may be, however fickle my friends may prove, God changes not. If he varied as we do, if he willed one thing today and another tomorrow, if he were controlled by caprice, who could confide in him? But, all praise to his glorious name, he is ever the same."

Do We Rejoice?

The last verse of this section says, "Not only is this so, but we also rejoice in God through our Lord Jesus Christ...." This is a positive statement: "We rejoice!" It has led one commentator to say, "The one clear mark of a true Christian is that he always rejoices." But do we rejoice? Have we actually come as far as Paul assumes we have in verse 11? Honesty compels us to admit that often we do not rejoice in God.

Why is that? D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones gives a number of reasons, which I list for the sake of our self-examination:

1. A failure to grasp the truth of justification by faith only.
2. A failure to meditate as we ought, that is, a failure to think about what we do know.
3. A failure to draw the necessary conclusions from the Scriptures.

I do not know if these are your failures (if you have failed to rejoice in God) or whether there is some other hindrance in your case, as there may be. But whatever the cause, anything that keeps us from rejoicing in God is inappropriate and should be overcome by us. I challenge you to overcome it. I challenge you to think about these great truths, meditate upon them, learn how great the love, power, wisdom, and grace of God toward you are. Then glory in God, as those who have known God throughout the long ages of human history have done before you. It will make a profound difference in your life, and you will be a blessing to others.

Part Seven. Union with Christ

Chapter 66.
Union with Jesus Christ

Romans 5:12

The last ten verses of Romans 5 are a new section of the letter. They deal with mankind's union with Adam on the one hand, a union which has led to death and condemnation, and with the believer's union with the Lord Jesus Christ on the other. This latter union leads to life and righteousness. This is a difficult section of the letter, possibly the most difficult in all the Bible. But it is also very important.

Union with Christ! The Scottish pastor and theologian James S. Stewart called union with Christ "the heart of Paul's religion," adding that "this, more than any other conception—more than justification, more than sanctification, more even than reconciliation—is the key which unlocks the secrets of his soul." John Murray went even further, saying, "Union with Christ is the central truth of the whole doctrine of salvation." Yet, strangely, this is a widely neglected theme even in many otherwise helpful expositions of theology. Arthur W. Pink states the situation fairly:

The subject of spiritual union is the most important, the most profound, and yet the most blessed of any that is set forth in the sacred Scriptures; and yet, sad to say, there is hardly any which is now more generally neglected. The very expression "spiritual union" is unknown in most professing Christian circles, and even where it is employed it is given such a protracted meaning as to take in only a fragment of this precious truth. Probably its very profundity is the reason why it is so largely ignored....

Many preachers avoid such subjects, thinking it better to avoid matters that most of their hearers may be unable or unwilling to understand. But it is not wise to neglect anything God has seen fit to reveal to us, particularly something as important as this. And, in any case, union with Christ cannot be neglected in any faithful exposition of Romans.

The Theme in Context

Where are we in our exposition of this letter? How does Romans 5:12-21 fit into its context?

At this point it may be worth thinking back to what I said at the beginning of this volume when I introduced the very first words of chapter 5. I rejected the view that Romans 5 introduces an entirely new section of the letter in the sense that in chapters 1-4 Paul has been speaking about justification and that now, in chapters 5-8, he speaks about sanctification. He does speak about sanctification, of course, but not as a radically new theme. On the contrary, as I pointed out (the word therefore in Rom. 5:1 is a clue to this), Paul is carrying forward the argument begun earlier, showing that the work of justification, about which he has been speaking, is a sure thing and will inevitably carry through to the believer's full glorification in heaven at the end of life.

Thus far, Paul's arguments have had to do with the nature of our justification:

1. We can be assured of salvation because God has made peace with us through the atoning work of Jesus Christ.
2. We can be assured of salvation because, through that same work of Christ, we have been brought into a new relationship with God in which we continue to stand.
3. We can be assured of salvation because of the sure and certain hope that we shall see God.
4. We can be assured of salvation because of the way we are able to endure sufferings in this life.
5. We can be assured of salvation because God sent Jesus Christ to die for us, not when we were saved people but when we were enemies.

6. We can be assured of our salvation because, if God has justified us, which is a greater thing and demands more of God than glorification, he will surely do the lesser.

But now we have something new, as I said at the beginning of this study—and yet not new, because the apostle's objective remains the same: to enhance our assurance. We have seen that Romans 5:1-11 argues the certainty and finality of salvation from the nature of justification by faith. Now Paul also argues that when God saved us through the work of Christ, justifying us by faith, justification was not the only thing involved. Justification is immensely important, of course. But in addition to justification, and in conjunction with it, we were also united to Christ in what theologians have come to call "the mystical union." This union with Christ has been revealed to us, although we do not fully understand it.

In my opinion, Paul has anticipated this theme in the verses we have already studied, although I did not point it out at the time and the point is hidden in most of our translations. I am referring to verse 10, which says, "For if, when we were God's enemies, we were reconciled to him through the death of his Son, how much more, being reconciled, shall we be saved through his life!"

In the Greek text the last three words are not "through his life," as we have them in the New International Version (or "by his life," as in most others), but literally "in his life." Is this important? Yes, in my opinion. For, when we say "through" or "by" his life, the words seem to mean either or both of two things to us: (1) that we are saved through Christ, that is, by his work on the cross, and/or (2) that we are saved through faith in that atonement. But this is not the idea here. The first part of verse 10 does say this, but the second part goes beyond it, making a contrast. The argument is: If God has saved us through the death of Christ (through faith in his atonement), he will certainly save us by our being "in his life." At this point of the letter we may not fully understand what that means. That is why verses 12-21 explain it. But I am making the point that union with Christ, which Paul develops in verses 12-21, is suggested earlier.

D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones says, "The word 'in' means 'in the sphere of,' or 'in the realm of,' or 'in connection with' his life."

This union with Jesus makes possible the sequence of deliverances from sin, death, and the law, and the resulting spiritual victories that Paul will unfold in the next three chapters of Romans.

Probing the Mystery

Union with Christ is difficult to understand, however, and the treatment of it in Romans 5:12-21 is particularly mind-stretching. So I want to probe this doctrine a bit before we actually get into the verses. There are two important points to keep in mind.

First, the union of the believer with Christ is one of three great unions in Scripture. The first is the union of the persons of the Godhead in the Trinity. Christians, as well as Jews, speak of one God. Yet, on the basis of the revelation of God in Scripture, we who are Christians say we also believe that this one God exists in three persons as the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. We cannot explain how these three persons of the Godhead are at the same time only one God, but the Bible teaches this and we believe it.

The second mystical union is that of the two natures of Christ in one person. The Lord Jesus Christ is one person. He is not a "multiple personality." Nevertheless, he is also both God and man, possessing two natures. The theological formulation of this truth at the Council of Chalcedon (a.d. 451) said that Jesus is "to be acknowledged in two natures, inconfusedly, unchangeably, indivisibly, inseparably; the distinction of natures being by no means taken away by the union, but rather the property of each nature being preserved, and concurring in one Person and one Subsistence, not parted or divided into persons, but one and the same Son." If you understand that completely, you are a better theologian than I am. But though I do not fully understand it, I believe it since it seems to be what the Bible teaches.

We have a similar situation in the case of the union of believers with Christ. Probably we are never going to be able to understand this union fully either. But it is important. Therefore we should hold to it and try to gain understanding.

The second important point to keep in mind as we study this doctrine is that the union of the believer with Christ is not a concept that was invented by Paul; rather, it was first taught by Jesus and then built upon by the apostle. True, Jesus did not use the term "mystical union." But he taught it in other words and through analogies, which are frequent in Scripture, particularly in the later portions of the New Testament. Let me list a few examples.

1. The vine and the branches. The most important passage on this theme is the teaching in John 15. It occurs in one of Jesus' final discourses prior to his arrest and crucifixion. Jesus said, "I am the true vine.... Remain in me, and I will remain in you. No branch can bear fruit by itself; it must remain in the vine. Neither can you bear fruit unless you remain in me. I am the vine; you are the branches. If a man remains in me and I in him, he will bear much fruit; apart from me you can do nothing" (John 15:1, 4-5).

The emphasis in this passage is upon the power of Christ nourishing and working itself out through his disciples. Paul touches on this image in Romans 11:17-21, where he speaks of Jewish "branches" being broken off an olive tree so that Gentile "branches" might for a time be grafted in. He is thinking along similar lines in Galatians when he speaks of the "fruit of the Spirit" (Gal. 5:22-23).

2. The Lord's Supper. On the same evening that Jesus spoke about himself as the vine and his disciples as the branches, he gave instructions for observing the Lord's Supper in which he said, "This is my body" and "This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many for the forgiveness of sins" (Matt. 26:26, 28).

The sacrament clearly symbolizes our participation in the life of Christ. In the same way, Jesus discoursed on the bread of life ("I am the bread of life. He who comes to me will never go hungry, and he who believes in me will never be thirsty" [John 6:35]) and challenged the woman of Samaria ("Everyone who drinks this water will be thirsty again, but whoever drinks the water I give him will never thirst. Indeed, the water I give him will become in him a spring of water welling up to everlasting life" [John 4:13-14]).

The emphasis in this image is on empowering (as in the analogy of the vine) and permanence. By faith, Jesus becomes a permanent part of us, just as surely as what we eat.

3. A foundation and the structure built upon it. Jesus initiated this image when he spoke of himself as a solid foundation for building a successful life: "Therefore everyone who hears these words of mine and puts them into practice is like a wise man who built his house on the rock. The rain came down, the streams rose, and the winds blew and beat against that house; yet it did not fall, because it had its foundation on the rock" (Matt. 7:24-25).

Paul made ample use of this image. He told the Corinthians, "You are... God's building.... For no one can lay any foundation other than the one already laid, which is Jesus Christ" (1 Cor. 3:9b, 11). He told the Ephesians, "... you are no longer foreigners and aliens, but fellow citizens with God's people and members of God's household, built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets, with Christ Jesus himself as the chief cornerstone" (Eph. 2:19-20). In the next verse the building becomes a temple: "In him the whole building is joined together and rises to become a holy temple in the Lord" (v. 21). Notice the words "in him." It is only because we are "in Christ" that this is possible.

This image also shows that being joined to Christ means that we are at the same time joined to one another. We are part of the church.

4. The head and members of the body. This was one of Paul's favorite ways of speaking. "And God placed all things under [Christ's] feet and appointed him to be head over everything for the church, which is his body, the fullness of him who fills everything in every way" (Eph. 1:22-23). "It was he who gave some to be apostles, some to be prophets, some to be evangelists, and some to be pastors and teachers, to prepare God's people for works of service, so that the body of Christ may be built up.... Then we will no longer be infants, tossed back and forth by the waves, and blown here and there by every wind of teaching and by the cunning and craftiness of men in their deceitful scheming. Instead, speaking the truth in love, we will in all things grow up into him who is the Head, that is, Christ. From him the whole body, joined and held together by every supporting ligament, grows and builds itself up in love, as each part does its work" (Eph. 4:1112, 14-16).

In these verses (and others like them) the emphasis is upon two things: (1) growth and (2) the proper functioning of the church under Christ's sure direction. In 1 Corinthians Paul uses this image to show that each Christian is needed if the church is to function properly (cf. 1 Cor. 12:12-27).

5. Marriage. By far the greatest of all illustrations of the union of the believer with Christ and of Christ with the believer is marriage, in which a man and a woman are joined to form one flesh and one family. This image is in the Old Testament—Hosea, for example. There God compares himself to the faithful husband who is deserted by Israel, the unfaithful wife (Hosea 1-3). Jesus picked up on this theme when speaking of a marriage supper to which all who have faith are invited (Matt. 22:1-14). However, it is chiefly Paul who develops the theme in what is probably the best-known passage from Ephesians, mixing it with the image of the church as Christ's body.

Wives, submit to your husbands as to the Lord. For the husband is the head of the wife as Christ is the head of the church, his body, of which he is the Savior. Now as the church submits to Christ, so also wives should submit to their husbands in everything.

Husbands, love your wives, just as Christ loved the church and gave himself up for her to make her holy, cleansing her by the washing with water through the word, and to present her to himself as a radiant church, without stain or wrinkle or any other blemish, but holy and blameless. In this same way, husbands ought to love their wives as their own bodies.... This is a profound mystery—but I am talking about Christ and the church.

Ephesians 5:22-28, 32

The emphasis in this image is upon a love-bonding. This is indeed the one true "marriage made in heaven." It is a marriage not only for this life but for eternity.

Looking Back and Looking Forward

In the studies that follow we are going to be looking at the doctrine of our union with Christ in detail, comparing it initially with our corresponding but contrasting union with Adam. But I close here by trying to put our union with Christ in its widest possible setting, remembering that it is included at this point of the letter to assure us of our security. This is what we find as we look both backward and forward at this union.

Here I quote from the best statement of these themes I know: a chapter on "Union with Christ" in Redemption Accomplished and Applied by John Murray:

1. Election. "The fountain of salvation itself in the eternal election of the Father is 'in Christ.' Paul says: 'Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in the heavenlies in Christ, even as he chose us in him before the foundation of the world' (Eph. 1:3, 4). The father elected from all eternity, but he elected in Christ. We are not able to understand all that is involved, but the fact is plain enough that there was no election of the Father in eternity apart from Christ. And that means that those who will be saved were not even contemplated by the Father in the ultimate counsel of his predestinating love apart from union with Christ—they were chosen in Christ. As far back as we can go in tracing salvation to its fountain we find 'union with Christ'; it is not something tacked on; it is there from the outset."

2. Redemption. "It is also because the people of God were in Christ when he gave his life a ransom and redeemed them by his blood that salvation has been secured for them; they are represented as united to Christ in his death, resurrection, and exaltation to heaven (Rom. 6:2-11; Eph. 2:4-6; Col. 3:3, 4).... Hence we may never think of the work of redemption wrought once for all by Christ apart from the union with his people which was effected in the election of the Father before the foundation of the world.... This is but another way of saying that the church is the body of Christ and 'Christ loved the church and gave himself for it' (Eph. 5:25)."

3. Regeneration. "It is in Christ that the people of God are created anew. 'We are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works' (Eph. 2:10).... It should not surprise us that the beginning of salvation in actual possession should be in union with Christ because we have found already that it is in Christ that salvation had its origin in the eternal election of the Father and that it is in Christ salvation was once for all secured by Jesus' ransom blood. We could not think of such union with Christ as suspended when the people of God become the actual partakers of redemption—they are created anew in Christ."

4. Glorification. "Finally, it is in Christ that the people of God will be resurrected and glorified. It is in Christ that they will be made alive when the last trumpet will sound and the dead will be raised incorruptible (1 Cor. 15:22)."

This great scope of salvation from the electing counsels of God in eternity past to the glorification of the sons of God in eternity future is based on the union of the believer with Christ, and it is for this that the doctrine is so important for us. Assurance of salvation! Security in Christ! This is what we are dealing with in this doctrine, as also in the great middle chapters of Romans. While there are many things meant to encourage us in that security, the greatest of all is that we are "in Christ."

The question you must ask yourself is: "Am I really in him? Am I a Christian?"

How can you know? You cannot look into eternity past to pry into God's hidden counsels. You cannot look into eternity future to see yourself as one who has been glorified. All you have is the present. But if you probe the present, you can know. Do you remember the marriage illustration?
Ask yourself: "Am I married to Jesus?" You are—if you have taken the vow, promising to "take Jesus to be your loving and faithful Savior, in plenty and in want, in joy and in sorrow, in sickness and in health, for this life and for eternity," and if you are living for him. God has pronounced the marriage. And what God has joined together no one will ever put asunder.

Chapter 67.
Christ and Adam

Romans 5:12-14

We are studying a difficult, yet extremely important section of Romans, and we have begun by an overview of the doctrine of the mystical union of the Christian with Jesus Christ. This important New Testament theme is widely neglected, no doubt because it is so difficult. But without this doctrine we cannot understand Romans 5:12-21, and without understanding those verses the truths of this second major section of the letter (chs. 4-8) will be beyond us.

It works the other way, too. We must understand the believer's union with Christ to understand verses 12-21. But, in a parallel way, in order to understand how we are "in Christ" and what that means, we need to see how we were "in Adam," which is where the passage starts. Adam is the "man" mentioned in verse 12: "Therefore, just as sin entered the world through one man, and death through sin, and in this way death came to all men, because all sinned...." The passage starts with Adam and builds from him, showing, on the one hand, how the union of the race in Adam and the union of believers in Christ are similar and how, on the other hand, they are also quite different, the results of the first being evil and the results of the second being good.

Since the verses also deal with justification, to understand them is to move further in our understanding of this theme. Paul has been teaching that in the work of justification, righteousness has been imputed to us. But people are reluctant to accept that truth. Therefore, to help them understand and believe in the principle of imputed righteousness, Paul shows that we have already been treated on the basis of this same principle "in Adam."

The Flow of the Passage

We start with verse 12. It teaches that sin, followed by death, came into the world by Adam. But you will notice that at the end of verse 12 there is a dash, indicating that the thought breaks off at this point and that Paul inserts what we would call a parenthesis. It is even a bit more complicated than that, however. Verses 13 and 14 are a parenthesis. They explain what Paul meant when he said, at the end of verse 12, "because all sinned." But at the end of verse 14, the apostle throws in another parenthesis to elaborate the parallel between Adam and Christ, which he suggested in verse 14. This parenthesis, which is actually a parenthesis within a parenthesis, fills out verses 15-17. So it is not until verse 18 that we get the continuation of the thought begun in verse 12.

I point this out to show what is coming and to note the full parallelism between Christ and Adam. According to these verses, believers are now "in Christ," just as they once were "in Adam." That is the similarity. But there is also a contrast, since in Adam the race has experienced sin, leading to condemnation and death, while in Christ believers have experienced righteousness, leading to justification and eternal life. The two sequences are exactly parallel. Putting verses 12 and 18 together, we get something like this:

On the one hand, just as sin entered the world through one man, and death through sin, and in this way death came to all men, because all sinned—that is, just as the result of one trespass was condemnation for all men....

So also, on the other hand, the result of one act of righteousness was justification that brings life for all men.

This teaches that there were two great acts in history: the act of Adam, which brought condemnation and death, and the act of Jesus, which brought justification and life. The results are "brought" to us by virtue of our union with Adam, on the one hand, and with Jesus Christ, on the other.

Sin and Death Through Adam

Verse 12 assumes two great truths: (1) the universality of sin, and (2) the universality of death.
Paul can do so, because there is hardly anybody who would be foolish enough to challenge them. The most thoroughly secular person will not claim to be perfect. "After all, I am no saint," he might say, thus acknowledging Paul's claim that "all have sinned" (Rom. 3:23). Again, the universality of death is a given. "There is nothing certain in life but death and taxes," we say, using an absolute certainty to illustrate the nature of a lesser one.

But that raises some very big questions: How can we explain this situation? Why is sin universal? And why is death the universal experience of all? Just on the basis of the law of averages, shouldn't we expect that somewhere at some time there would or will have been a sinless person? And shouldn't we find that somewhere at some time there is a person who will not die?

In answering these questions we come to a parting of the ways between secular and Christian thought. The secular mind says two things: (1) there is no connection between sin and death at all, they are two utterly unrelated issues; and (2) each may be explained naturally.

As far as sin is concerned, the secular view assumes that sin is only an imperfection, soon to be overcome. This view of sin fits the prevailing evolutionary framework of our time, according to which all things are gradually evolving from less complex and less perfect forms to forms that are more complex and more perfect. The secular-minded person argues that sin means only that we are not yet where we hope to be and eventually will be.

There are two things wrong with this.

First, if sin is only an imperfection, then it is not really correct to call it sin, or even to look down on it as something less desirable than the next inevitable stage of the evolutionary process. "Sin" is not bad at all, which eliminates the possibility of any meaningful talk about virtue. Nobody can be said to be better or worse than someone else. No action can ever really be inherently wrong.

The second problem is this: If sin is only an imperfection to be eliminated in time as a result of the inevitable upward movement of the race, why has so much evil been around for so long? If sin is only a minor imperfection, why hasn't that imperfection been eliminated long before this? I can go further with such questions. Looking at the historical record left by human beings honestly, is it even possible to say that there has been such a thing as progress? Are we really better than our predecessors? Are we more virtuous than the Greeks? Are we more noble even than the barbarians? It is hard to say so. But if this is the case, doesn't this fact alone suggest that sin is a much greater problem than the secularist's framework allows?

The other inescapable reality is death. The secularist explains this as something inherent in nature itself. That is, it does not have anything to do with evolution—like sin, which will be overcome. It is just natural and inescapable for living things. All living things die. This point is better for the secular argument than the earlier one, since observation confirms that living things do indeed die. We can speak of a process in which organisms are born, grow, decline, and perish. The problem is that none of us really believes that this is right. We sense that we were meant to be immortal. We should not die. Hence arise those images of life beyond death—Mount Olympus, Valhalla, Hades, Sheol, the Underworld, Nirvana, Paradise, Heaven—found in all the world's civilizations and religions.

The Christian answer to the problem of the universality of sin and death is that death is not natural but that it is the punishment of God for sin. It says, moreover, that sin entered the world through the one act of Adam, who was the first man, and that—from Adam—sin and its consequence, death, passed to his descendants.

Four Views within Christianity

The Christian view is far more comprehensive than that brief statement, however. But, in order to develop it fully, I need to acknowledge that there are different views of Romans 5:12 in Christian thought. They arise out of an important question: Assuming that sin and death passed to the race from Adam, how exactly did that happen? And why should it have happened? Why should something that Adam did affect anyone?

1. Pelagianism. The first view is called by the name of Pelagius, the opponent of Saint Augustine, but it is not limited to him. Many contemporary liberal commentators on Romans also hold to it. This view teaches that each human being sins in his or her own person, entirely apart from any relationship to Adam, and that the person's death, which follows, is a consequence of that sin only. There are several reasons why this view must be rejected, even apart from the fact that Pelagianism is wrong generally.

First, it is not observably true. Not all who die, die for their own sin. For example, babies die though they have not sinned themselves.

Second, it contradicts the explanation of the phrase "because all sinned," which Paul himself gives in verses 13 and 14. Those verses, as I have already indicated, are a parenthesis in which Paul breaks off his opening statement in order to explain what he is saying. He says that death reigned "even over those who did not sin by breaking a command, as did Adam...." That is, they did not sin as Adam did. But this would be untrue if, as Pelagianism holds, every individual dies because of his or her own actual transgression, since that is exactly how Adam himself sinned and was judged.

Third, this interpretation of the universality of sin is inconsistent with the overall flow of the passage. The point of the argument is that we are declared righteous in Christ just as we have been declared sinful in Adam. But we are not declared righteous in Christ because of any righteousness of our own. Rather, it is on the basis of the righteousness of Christ imputed to us. If the parallel is to hold, we must also be declared sinful on the basis of Adam's sin and not merely on the fact that we sin personally.

Fourth, the Pelagian view is inconsistent with the tense of the verb sinned. It is an aorist. So it cannot mean that all people do sin or are accustomed to sin (that is, are sinners), but rather that they have sinned at a particular past moment. In the context of the passage this can only mean that they have sinned "in Adam."

2. The view of John Calvin. The second interpretation of the phrase "because all sinned" is attached to the name of John Calvin, though it seems to be inconsistent with what Calvin himself taught elsewhere. It seems to have been an uncharacteristic slip of interpretation on his part. Calvin took "sin" in Romans 5:12 to mean "corruption" and the verse to teach that sin passed upon all because all are corrupted. All are corrupted by sin, of course. Each would also be condemned for his or her own sin apart from Adam, were not the passage we are studying also true. But true as those points may be in themselves, Paul is nevertheless just not teaching this in Romans.

As in the case of the Pelagian interpretation, the "corruption" view is inconsistent with verses 13 and 14, and with the passage as a whole.

3. Augustinianism. The third view was proposed by the great Saint Augustine, but it has been held by many theologians in the Middle Ages and even into modern times. This view is also called the realistic or "seminal" view. It holds that the human race sinned in Adam because in a literal physical sense all future generations were in Adam at the time. So, when he acted the whole race acted, and when he was judged the whole race was judged literally in him.

Most people today would be inclined to discount this as a strange though uniquely medieval idea since, as we see things, the fact that we were in Adam "in embryo," as it were, cannot mean that we all actually sinned in him since we were not conscious entities capable of sinning at the time. But we should probably not dismiss this so quickly. This is because, as D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones points out, that very point is made in Hebrews 7:9-10, in the case of Levi, Melchizedek, and Abraham: "One might even say that Levi, who collects the tenth, paid the tenth through Abraham, because when Melchizedek met Abraham, Levi was still in the body of his ancestor." The point of the author is that the descendants of Levi paid tithes to Melchizedek because they were in the loins of Abraham, their forefather, when he paid tithes. But, if that is so, then it must also be true to say that the entire human race was in Adam and therefore sinned when he did. Because of Hebrews 7, the Augustinian or realistic view can never be dismissed too lightly, though, in my opinion, it still does not capture the full meaning of the passage.

4. Federalism. The fourth view, which is that of the best interpreters of virtually all Christian traditions—Calvinists, Arminians, Lutherans, even Rationalists—is that God appointed Adam the head or representative of the race, so that he would stand for them and they would be accounted either just or sinful on the basis of his obedience to or disobedience of God's command. This view is called federalism because of the analogy to the way an ambassador might act on behalf of his country. When he signs a document or takes an action, he does so for each of the country's citizens, and they are therefore bound by what he does.

In this view, the point is not that all people sin, though they do, but rather that Adam stood for them so that, when he sinned, not only was Adam judged but they were judged, too. It is because Adam sinned that death passed upon all. Here is how Lloyd-Jones puts it: "Adam's sin is imputed to us in exactly the same way that Christ's righteousness is imputed to us. We inherit, of course, a sinful nature from Adam.... But that is not what condemns us. What condemns us, and makes us subject to death, is the fact that we have all sinned in Adam, and that we are all held guilty of sin.... It is our union with Adam that accounts for all our trouble. It is our corresponding union with Christ that accounts for our salvation."

Proof of the Christian View

There are many reasons why federalism is the right interpretation of this passage. Charles Hodge gives nine reasons. But we do not need these or any other additional reasons. We need only the two that Paul himself gives in these verses: (1) the fact that death was in the world before the giving of the law of Moses, and (2) the fact that all die, including innocents. If sin is the transgression of law and people who did not have the law were punished, what other explanation of the universality of death can there be, except that we were all judged in Adam?

Or, to make it even more pointed, why do infants die unless they, along with the rest of the race, have been judged for Adam's sin? Or for that matter, why do they even suffer? Why do newborns get cancer or have colic?

As far as I can see, there are only two possible answers other than the Christian one, and each is clearly inadequate. The first is the doctrine of an eternity of evil: that sin, death, and evil have simply always existed. The problem with this, as I pointed out in discussing the view of sin as mere imperfection, is that the moral dimensions then vanish and there is no reason why sin should be called sin at all or why evil should be called evil. Besides, although it is possible to understand sin as a corruption of the good—that is, as something that came along to defile God's originally good creation—it is hardly possible to see good as a development out of something that is evil. Satan can be a fallen angel. But no fallen angel can become God.

The other explanation of the universality of suffering and death is reincarnation, the argument being that infants (the most striking example) suffer for the sins done in a previous life. This explains the problem for this life, of course. But it does not solve the real problem, since it only pushes it into a future life and into a life beyond that and so on. At some point the big questions inevitably reemerge.

The only really valid explanation is the one Paul gives, namely, that Adam had been appointed by God to be the representative of the race so that if he stood, we too would stand, and if he fell, we would fall with him. Adam did fall, as we know. So death passed upon everyone.

"But isn't that terribly unfair?" someone protests. "Isn't it cruel for God to act in this fashion?"

We are going to be studying this at greater length as we go on, but let me state here that far from being unfair or cruel, the federal way of dealing with us was actually the fairest and kindest of all the ways God could have operated. Besides, it was the only way it would later be possible for God to save us once we had sinned. In other words, federalism is actually a proof of God's grace, which is the point the passage comes to (vv. 15 ff.).

It was gracious to Adam first of all. Why? Because it was a deterrent to his sin. God must have explained to Adam that he was to represent his posterity. That might have restrained him from sinning. A father who might be tempted to steal his employer's funds (and would if only he himself were involved), might well decide not to do it if he knew that his crime would hurt his children if he should get caught. If something as limited as that can be a restraining influence, how much more would Adam's knowledge that what he would do would affect untold billions of his descendants?

This way of operating is also an example of God's grace to us, because to be tried in Adam was the best of all ways to stand trial. The great Charles Simeon of Cambridge wrote more than a century ago that if each human being were asked whether he would prefer to be judged in Adam or in himself, every thinking person would answer "in Adam." After all, Adam faced only one temptation and that a mere trifle. He was not to eat of one tree. Besides, he was as yet unfallen. He did not have a sinful nature. He was possessed of his full faculties (which were undoubtedly superior to our own). He lived in a perfect environment and had a perfect companion. For our part, we are sinful, weak, and ignorant, and we live in a world filled with all kinds of temptations. Was it not merciful of God to judge us in Adam? Was God not gracious in that choice?

And there is this great fact as well: If God had chosen to judge us as each of us think we would like to be judged, that is, in and for ourselves with no relationship to any other person, then we would all inevitably perish. For our only hope of salvation is that we may also be judged in Christ, he being our representative, just as we have been judged in Adam. If we were like the angels who are entities in themselves, who do not exist in families and who have no relationship to one another, then there would be no hope for us, just as there is no hope for them. But because we have been judged in Adam, we may also be judged in Christ and be acquitted.

That is what happens for those who are called by God and joined to Jesus Christ through the channel of saving faith. We do not deserve it, but this is the way grace acts. It is grace from the beginning to the end.

Chapter 68.
The Reign of Death

Romans 5:14

In Romans 5:14 there is a phrase that we have not yet adequately studied but to which we return now: "death reigned from the time of Adam to the time of Moses." It is important to do so for several reasons. First, it is repeated more than once. We find it in verse 14, which we are studying here, but it also appears in verse 17 ("death reigned through that one man"), and a variation of the thought appears in verse 21 ("sin reigned in death"). An idea stated (or implied) three times in just ten verses must obviously be important for our understanding of the passage.

Again, as we have seen in our study of the parallel between our natural, physical union with Adam and our supernatural, spiritual union with Jesus Christ, the fact that death reigns over all persons proves that God has judged everyone in Adam. In other words, the reign of death proves the principles of representation and imputation, both of which are indispensable to Paul's argument. And these principles are indispensable for salvation, since it is only because God determined to treat the entire race representationally—either in Adam or in Christ—that Jesus could die in our place and be our Savior.

Finally, the phrase "death [or sin] reigned" has its counterpart in the words "so also grace might reign through righteousness" in verse 21. Since we want to understand the latter, we must first understand the former.

From Adam to Moses

The first thing to notice about the reign of death is that for the sake of Paul's argument it is linked to a specific time period: "from the time of Adam to the time of Moses." It is a fact (which we are going to treat explicitly later) that death also reigns in our own day and will continue to reign to the end of human history. But Paul specifies the time period from Adam to Moses because he means something different merely than that all persons die.

Why does Paul cite this specific time period? The answer has to do with what we were exploring in the last study, namely, that death passed upon the race as a result of God's judgment upon all for the sin of Adam.

When we were looking at this point earlier, I focused on the death of infants, who have not committed any conscious sin, because the point is easier to grasp in that fashion. The only adequate explanation for the death of infants is that they, along with the rest of us, have been judged guilty for what Adam did. Paul's argument does not particularly specify infants, however, though they are included in what he says. Rather, he is focusing on all persons, and his argument is that in the time between Adam and Moses all persons died, even though there was no specific law for them to have broken. They were sinners, of course. The judgments of the great flood of Noah's time and the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah in Abraham's day prove it. But the race as a whole was judged by universal death, not for the specific sins of the individuals involved, but for Adam's transgression.

The critical idea here is "imputation" or, as Paul expresses it in verse 13, the fact that sin was "not taken into account." He means that, although all were sinners, God did not take their own personal sin into account when he punished them. But since they all nevertheless died, their death must have been for Adam's disobedience and not for their own sinfulness.

This is the meaning of the phrase "those who did not sin by breaking a command, as did Adam."
People sinned during this period, but it was not by breaking a specific command of God, as Adam did, since there was no specific command for them to break. Adam sinned by breaking a command: he disobeyed

God's explicit warning not to eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil (Gen. 2:16-17; 3:6).

This is so important that I want to make the point once more, this time by quoting William Barclay. The sad thing is that Barclay does not believe this teaching himself. He understands it, but he thinks that it is only a Jewish argument, which he is free to reject. Nevertheless, Barclay's is the most succinct statement of the argument I have found anywhere:

1. Adam sinned because he broke a direct commandment of God—the commandment not to eat of the fruit of the forbidden tree—and because Adam sinned, Adam, who was meant to be immortal, died.

2. The law did not come until the time of Moses; now, if there is no law, there can be no breach of the law; that is to say, if there is no law and no commandment, there can be no sin. Therefore, the men who lived between Adam and Moses did in fact sin, but it was not reckoned against them because there was as yet no law, and they could not be condemned for breaking a law which did not exist.

3. But, in spite of the fact that sin could not be reckoned to them, they still died. Death reigned over them although they could not be accused of breaking a nonexistent law.

4. Why, then, did they die? They died because they had sinned in Adam. It was their involvement in the sin of Adam that caused their deaths, although there was no law for them to break. That, in fact, is Paul's proof that all men did sin in Adam.

In my judgment, the strongest passage in the entire Bible for teaching this is Genesis 5, a chapter that contains the genealogy, not of the ungodly descendants of Adam, who were filling the earth at this time (their genealogy is in chapter 4), but of the godly line of Adam, containing the names of people like Enoch, Methuselah, and Noah. What is powerful about it is the repeated refrain:

"and then he died."

The sentences need to be read together for their intended effect: "Altogether, Adam lived 930 years, and then he died.... Altogether, Seth lived 921 years, and then he died.... Altogether, Enosh lived 905 years, and then he died.... Altogether, Kenan lived 910 years, and then he died.... Altogether, Mahalalel lived 895 years, and then he died.... Altogether, Jared lived 962 years, and then he died.... Altogether, Methuselah lived 969 years, and then he died....
Altogether, Lamech lived 777 years, and then he died" (vv. 4, 7, 11, 14, 17, 20, 27, 31, emphasis added). These were long life spans, from 365 (in the case of Enoch, who did not die but was translated) to 969 years (in the case of Methuselah, who lived longer than any other man), but each was cut off by death. Death reigned during this period, just as it has reigned over every other period of human history.

All Must Die

We must apply this now in a way that will enable us to benefit from it. This is because, even though Paul is developing an argument for the imputation both of sin and righteousness, he is not concerned merely with his argument but also with our current great dilemma—all have sinned and must die—and with the solution for it.

Do you know that you must die?

Years ago, when young girls used to learn to read and write by making samplers, the rhymes they would work out in needlepoint often came from the New England Primer, which taught Bible truths through couplets based on the English alphabet. Under "A" the child would write:

> In Adam's fall we sinned all.

Under "X," toward the end of the exercise, she would write:

> Xerxes the Great did die, And so must you and I.

That is exacdy what Romans 5 is all about: (1) "A" is for Adam ("sin entered the world through one man"); (2) "X" is for Xerxes ("death came to all men").

Nothing is as certain as death and taxes, we say. Yet we go to great lengths to avoid this inescapable reality.

Franz Borkenau is an historian who believes that cultures can be analyzed in terms of their attitudes toward death. He says that there are three basic attitudes. In ancient Greece he finds a death-accepting attitude. In our modern, post-Christian era he finds a death-denying attitude. In the Judeo-Christian system he finds a death-defying attitude.

1. A death-accepting culture. The chief example of the death-accepting attitude of ancient Greek culture is the death of Socrates, one of the best-known deaths of all time. Socrates had been sentenced to death by the rulers of Athens for corrupting the city's youth by his "atheism," which meant that he did not accept the literal existence of the Greek gods. He was to die by drinking hemlock. The moment came. His students were gathered around him. They were weeping. But Socrates did not weep. Instead of bemoaning his fate or shrinking from death, Socrates used the occasion to reason with his sorrowing students about immortality, a discourse that Plato recorded in the "Phaedo." Socrates argued that the soul is immortal and that death is the only way the individual can escape the curse of bodily existence.

The problem, of course, is that it is difficult to die serenely with just a philosophic hope. Socrates may have done it, though we do not know for sure what he was actually experiencing. But few others have. Even Plato confessed that when his mentor drank the poison he, along with the others, burst into tears at losing such a just and wise companion.

2. A death-denying culture. The second classification of cultures includes our own. Its attitude is death-denying, which Borkenau finds the most inadequate of all. Why does our culture deny death's inescapable reality? It is all about us, confronting us constantly. Why do we go to such lengths to avoid even speaking about death?

Some years ago the Forest Lawn Foundation, a large West Coast funeral institution, commissioned an American Baptist seminary professor by the name of Richard W. Doss to investigate this question and write a book on a proper understanding of death. Doss suggested several reasons why our society is death-denying. The first is psychological. Sigmund Freud, the father of modern psychology, spoke of death as an unconscious fear of man. Therefore, the more one is faced with death, as we are through the newspapers and television, the more one denies it personally. We see reminders of death every day. So we deny death vigorously.

The second reason for our denial of death is cultural. American society emphasizes youthfulness, vitality, and productivity. The worth of individuals is measured by what they contribute. Wholeness is measured by one's ability to think and act young. In America death is not the last enemy to be defeated at the last trump, as the Bible describes it, but an enemy to be defeated now—through gyms, health spas, facelifts, diets, health foods, and a variety of other bodyenhancing pastimes and procedures.

This cultural attitude is best expressed by one modern advertising slogan for face cream: "I don't intend to grow old gracefully. I intend to fight it every step of the way."

However, in Doss's judgment the chief reason for America's having become a death-denying culture is religious. The nation has lost its religious consciousness:

Religion has been a major force in shaping the ideas and lifestyle of the American people. Our forefathers came to this country with a clearly defined view of man and the world. From the Puritan settlement of New England to nineteenth-century life on the western frontier, a theological framework supported and interpreted man's place in society and his relationship with nature and God. Man believed and felt that God had a purpose for life, and more, that every man could know and understand God's plan. Death was one element within this religious framework and thus could be dealt with openly and treated as a natural part of life.

Burial of the dead was carried out with religious rites which gave expression to this view of God's purposes for man.

[But] the twentieth century has seen a virtual abolition of the traditional Christian framework with no new proposal to take its place. Secularization has separated modern man from older understandings of man and society, and in so doing has separated death from the means by which it has been isolated and denuded. With no meaningful framework for understanding death, our culture has adopted a style of denial and avoidance.

But death cannot be avoided. That is the reality. Death reigns, the very point Paul is making. We may treat death as a fiction. But suddenly death turns our corner, walks down our street, and forces its form across our threshold or enters the home of our neighbor—and we tremble before it.

Death Defeated

3. A death-defying culture. The third class of culture that Franz Borkenau lists is death-defying, which he discovers in Judaism and Christianity. The Old Testament Jew looked forward to an afterlife, like Job, who declared:

> I know that my Redeemer lives, and that in the end he will stand upon the earth.
> And after my skin has been destroyed, yet in my flesh I will see God;
> I myself will see him with my own eyes—I and not another....
>
> Job 19:25-27

Paul also looked forward. In fact, Paul is the chief example of a death-defying attitude. He wrote in 1 Corinthians 15:54-55: "'Death has been swallowed up in victory.' [cf. Isa. 25:8]

> 'Where, O death, is your victory?
> Where, O death, is your sting? [cf. Hos. 13:14]'"

The sting of death is sin, and the power of sin is the law. But thanks be to God! He gives us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

How did the apostle arrive at this answer? How did he and Job sustain their defiance of death?

The answer is: through Jesus Christ! It is the solution Job anticipated ("I know that my Redeemer lives"), and Paul, with his later and greater understanding, proclaimed it boldly.

Here is the bottom line:

1. Christianity has the only explanation for the universal reign of death, and

2. Christianity has the only solution for it.

Let me share some words written by Horatius Bonar, one of the great Scottish divines of about a century ago and a father of the Scottish Free Church. They are from his volume on Genesis, where he is writing about Adam but thinking also of our text from Romans:

The first Adam dies, and we die in him; but the second Adam dies, and we live in him! The first Adam's grave proclaims only death; the second Adam's grave announces life—"I am the resurrection and the life." We look into the grave of the one, and we see only darkness, corruption and death; we look into the grave of the other, and we find there only light, incorruption and life. We look into the grave of the one and find that he is still there, his dust still mingling with its fellow dust about it; we look into the grave of the other and find that he is not there. He is risen—risen as our forerunner into the heavenly paradise, the home of the risen and redeemed. We look into the grave of the first Adam and see in him the firstfruits of them that have died, the millions that have gone down to that prisonhouse whose gates he opened; we look into the tomb of the second Adam, and we see in him the firstfruits of that bright multitude, that glorified band, who are to come forth from that cell, triumphing over death and rising to the immortal life; not through the tree which grew in the earthly paradise, but through him whom that tree prefigured —through him who was dead and is alive, and who liveth for evermore, and who has the keys of hell and death.

How did Jesus accomplish this great transformation? He did it by dying in our place, by taking the punishment for our sins upon himself. He became our representative, just as Adam had been our representative before him. He endured the punishment of our death, and then he rose again so that we might enjoy the reality of eternal life.

In his small volume on Romans, the great Bible teacher Harry Ironside included an epitaph that is inscribed on the tombstone of four children in a graveyard in St. Andrews, Scotland. It presupposes that children who die in infancy are saved by God's grace in Jesus Christ. It reads like this:

> Bold infidelity, turn pale and die.
> Beneath this stone four sleeping infants lie:
> Say, are they lost or saved?
> If death's by sin, they sinned, for they are here.
> If heaven's by works, in heaven they can't appear.
> Reason, ah, how depraved!
> Turn to the Bible's sacred page, > the knot's untied: They died, for > Adam sinned; They live, for > Jesus died.

Do you follow that argument? We know the infants sinned because they died. Question: How is that possible? Answer: They sinned in Adam. Second question: Can they have been saved, then? Answer: Not by works certainly, because they had not performed any. Third question: Then, they must have been lost? The epitaph answers: No, they were saved—but it was by the death of Jesus Christ.

Union with Christ is the only way of salvation for anyone.

Chapter 69.

Adam: A Pattern of the One to Come

Romans 5:14

What would you say are the most important events of human history? Would you cite the discovery of fire? The invention of the wheel, whenever that may have been? The introduction of printing? How about Caesar's crossing of the Rubicon? Or the invasion of England by the Normans in the fall of 1066? Or the invention of the atomic bomb?

Listing the great moments of history can go on almost indefinitely, and the items listed can all be quite interesting—at least to specific individuals or races. But important as these events may have been, they pale before the two stupendous events that the apostle Paul cites in Romans 5: the fall of the race in Adam, and the redemption of the race by the Lord Jesus Christ. These are the pivotal points of history, and they overwhelm all other events because of two things: (1) the significance of what Adam and Jesus did, though what they did and the results of what they did were quite different; and (2) the people affected. Paul summarizes the importance of these events in Romans 5:18, saying, "... just as the result of one trespass was condemnation for all men, so also the result of one act of righteousness was justification that brings life for all men."

The New International Version captures the force of these actions by the subtitle given to verses 12-21: "Death Through Adam, Life Through Christ."

A "Type" of Jesus

Whenever we link these two events, as I have just done (following Paul's example), we stress the contrast: Adam brought death, Jesus brought life. But we need to see that although the contrast is important —verses 15-17 will develop this at some lengtg—athe ways in which Adam and Christ are similar are also important, perhaps even more so. This is because our understanding of salvation depends upon this similarity, which Paul points to by the phrase: "Adam, who was a pattern of the one to come" (v. 14).

What does this mean? We can understand how Adam might be a pattern of other human beings in his choice to sin against God. We sin, too, of course. But how can he be a pattern of Jesus Christ? How can sinful Adam, a mere man, represent the sinless Son of God?

We begin with the critical term in this passage: "pattern." It is translated "figure" in the King James Version and "type" in the Revised Standard Version. The New English Bible resorts to a verbal paraphrase, saying, "Adam foreshadows the Man who was to come." J. B. Phillips says, "Adam, the first man, corresponds in some degree to the man who was to come."

The Greek word is typos. It comes from the verb typtō, meaning "strike," which is why we have derived the words type and typing from it. A piece of type is a steel character made to fit into a printing press and strike a piece of paper, leaving an impression of the letter of the alphabet or the symbol it has been made to represent. Typing is a process by which several characters strike a piece of paper in succession. In the Greek world, typos referred to the mark left by an object that for some reason or another hit something else, a wound, for example. When Thomas told the other disciples, "Unless I see the nail marks in his hands and put my finger where the nails were, and put my hand into his side, I will not believe it" (John 20:25), the word translated "marks" is typos. It refers to the wounds left by the nails of Jesus' crucifixion.

Along the way, typos took on a wider set of meanings. It came to mean a "figure" or "form" of something, a figure of a god, for instance. It appears that way in Acts 7:43, where it is translated (in a plural form) as "idols."

More commonly, typos is translated "example." Thus, in 1 Corinthians 10:6 and 11 we read, "Now these things occurred as examples, to keep us from setting our hearts on evil things as they did" and "These things happened to them as examples and were written down as warnings for us...." Similarly, Philippians 3:17 declares, "Join with others in following my example, brothers, and take note of those who live according to the pattern we gave you."

Eventually typos came also to mean a person, object, or event that typified or prefigured something greater than itself. This is the way it is used in our text, where we are taught that Adam was "a pattern of," or "prefigured," Jesus Christ.

Adam is not the only "type" of the Lord Jesus Christ in the Bible, of course. Much (if not all) of the Old Testament prefigures Christ. I think here of that wonderful scene in which Jesus appeared to the Emmaus disciples following his resurrection and "opened the Scriptures" to them (Luke 24:32). He began with "Moses and all the Prophets" and "explained to them what was said in all the Scriptures concerning himself (v. 27). That is, he taught them from the whole Bible. I am sure that after this great opening of the Scriptures, neither of these disciples ever looked at the Bible as they had before. From this point on, everything in the Old Testament would in one way or another have been a "type" of Christ.

They would have turned to Genesis, and it would have been an entirely new book for them. They would have read of the "seed of the woman" and known that this was Christ. They would have seen him in the promises to Abraham and recognized him, too, in the moving story of Joseph. As they turned to Exodus, they would have seen Christ in the Passover Lamb.

In Numbers he would be the rock in the wilderness from which the people received the water of life freely (Num. 20:2-11; cf. 1 Cor. 10:4). Manna would have further typified Jesus (cf. John 6:32-33), and he would also have been seen in the cloud that led the Israelites during their desert pilgrimage and overshadowed them for their protection.

Deuteronomy pictures Christ as "the righteous one" and defines that righteousness.

In Joshua he is "the commander of the army of the Lord."

So on throughout the Bible. In Malachi, the last book of the Old Testament, he is the "sun of righteousness" risen with healing in his wings.

Four Similarities

What about Adam? Our study of "types" has not yet answered the question of how Adam can be said to represent Jesus Christ. But it has put us on the right track in the sense that we have seen that "types" represent their fulfillments in certain great particulars, though not in all respects. This means, then, that we are not looking for a perfect correspondence between Adam and Jesus Christ. As a matter of fact, in the next study we are going to see some important differences. What we are looking for here are the important similarities.

So we ask again: "How can Adam be said rightly to represent Jesus Christ? How can sinful Adam typify the sinless Son of God?" There are four important parallels.

1. Both Adam and Jesus Christ were appointed by God to be representatives for other men. We have already seen how God appointed Adam to stand for humanity as our federal head or representative, so that if he stood firm in righteousness, we would stand with him, and if he fell, we too would fall. Jesus was also appointed to be a representative. We find this, for example, in Hebrews 10:5-7:

Therefore, when Christ came into the world, he said:

> "Sacrifice and offering you did not desire,
> but a body you prepared for me;
> with burnt offerings and sin offerings you > were not pleased.
> Then I said, 'Here I am—it is written > about me in the scroll— I have come to > do your will, O God.'"

According to this and other texts, Jesus was appointed to be a federal head of the race to accomplish our salvation.

2. Both Adam and Jesus Christ became heads of particular bodies of people, a race or descendants. Thus, each is the source of what can be called either the old or the new humanity.

The old humanity is the race as it stands apart from Jesus Christ, lost in its sin and headed for destruction. It is what we see about us in the world. The new humanity is that redeemed people who have been saved by Jesus. In Romans 5, Paul speaks of this as "the many [who] were made sinners" in contrast to "the many [who] will be made righteous" (v. 19). In 1 Corinthians 15 he speaks of it again, saying that "in Adam all die" and "in Christ all will be made alive" (v. 22). And again: "'The first Adam became a living being'; the last Adam, a life-giving spirit" (v. 45).

Notice the words "first Adam" and "last Adam." Paul did not say, "first" and "second," but rather "first" and "last," because he was thinking of Adam and Christ, not as mere men, but in this representative capacity. It is a way of saying that there are only two humanities (not three or four or more), only two representative heads of these humanities—there will never be a third—and that the entire race is divided into these two humanities by virtue of people's relationships to these representatives.

3. Both Adam and Jesus Christ had covenants made with them by God. A covenant is an agreement between two parties, usually confirmed by a symbolic act or oath. We have many examples, particularly in the Old Testament: the covenant with Noah; the covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; the Deuteronomic covenant; the covenant with David; and so on.

The word covenant is not used in the Bible specifically of Adam, but there can be little doubt that God established a covenant with him. The pertinent words are in Genesis 2, where God says, "You are free to eat from any tree in the garden; but you must not eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, for when you eat of it you will surely die" (vv. 16-17). That is a short statement. But in light of Romans 5 and similar teaching elsewhere, it can surely be expanded to mean: "If you obey me by refusing to eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, which I have placed in the garden, then you will be established in righteousness and live forever. Moreover, all who descend from you will also be established in righteousness and enjoy the fruit of righteousness, which is eternal life. But if you disobey me and eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, you will die. And not only will you die; death will also come to your descendants. You will be their ruin, and they will be condemned for your act." (We explored that idea in a previous study.)

In the same way, a covenant was made by God with Jesus Christ. It would have gone as follows: "If you will become the federal head or representative of a new humanity, taking upon yourself the task of fulfilling my divine law and then dying to make satisfaction for the sins of a people I will give to you, then that people shall be freed from sin's bondage, be given eternal life, and be raised to life to reign with you in heaven throughout eternity."

This is a great covenant, which is why the author of Hebrews contrasts it with the covenant made with Israel (which was similar to the covenant made with Adam), saying, "... the covenant of which he [Jesus] is mediator is superior to the old one, and it is founded on better promises" (Heb. 8:6).

4. Both Adam and Jesus Christ passed on to others the effects of their disobedience or obedience. The effect of Adam's disobedience was sin, condemnation, and death. The effect of Jesus' obedience was righteousness, justification, and eternal life.

D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones, who has an excellent summary of these important similarities, says, "Adam's sin and its consequences was passed on to us all without exception: Christ's obedience and righteousness is passed on to all who believe in him."

Robert Haldane also makes the point nicely: "The two Adams are the heads of the two covenants. The one the representative of all who are under the covenant of works, communicating his image unto them; the other the representative of all who are under the covenant of grace, and communicating his image to them. By the one man's disobedience many were made sinners, and by the obedience of the other many shall be made righteous."

A Historical Adam

In the next study we will explore the other side of the comparison between Adam and Christ, namely, the differences between them. But before we do, we need to remind ourselves of what the comparison itself, including both the similarities and the differences, teaches about Adam and the events that surround him in Genesis.

The first point is that Adam was an actual historical character, every bit as real as ourselves.

There has been a tendency in recent times, perhaps since the middle of the last century, to dismiss Adam (as well as many other parts of the Book of Genesis) as mythology. A myth is a story meant to tell a religious truth. It differs from a fable, which is an imaginary story with a moral, like Aesop's fables, in which animals speak. It also differs from a legend, which is an heroic saga involving larger-than-life characters. The tales of King Arthur fit the legend category. On the other hand, a myth is a religious story. It does not necessarily have to do with gods and goddesses or heroes or heroines, though it often does. But a myth deals with timeless or religious truths and—this is the important point—it is not meant to be taken literally. This is why so many liberal scholars in particular have viewed the story of Adam as mythology.

Whenever I hear that judgment, I think of a contrasting judgment by the great English literary scholar and Christian apologist, C. S. Lewis, who made his reputation writing about mythology. Lewis was dealing with claims that the New Testament is mythology, but his points apply to the Genesis accounts equally well. He wrote:

A man who has spent his youth and manhood in the minute study of New Testament texts and of other people's studies of them, whose literary experiences of those texts lacks any standard of comparison such as can only grow from a wide and deep and genial experience of literature in general, is, I should think, very likely to miss the obvious things about them. If he tells me that something in a gospel is legend or romance, I want to know how many legends or romances he has read, how well his palate is trained in detecting them by the flavor; not how many years he has spent on that gospel.

Lewis then introduced the Gospel of John as an example of biblical material considered to be mythology, concluding, "I have been reading poems, romances, vision-literature, legends, myths all my life. I know what they are like. I know that not one of them is like this."

Nor are they like Genesis. If the story of Adam is a myth, then we are going to have to find a new definition for the word! For there was an historical Adam; his story is to be taken literally.

The real proof of the historicity of Adam is the parallel the aposde Paul draws between the person of Adam and the person of Christ, which we have been studying. Jesus was a specific historical character. He came to earth at a specific past time—in the days of Herod the king, when Caesar Augustus was the ruler of the Roman Empire and Quirinius was governor of Syria (Luke 1:5; 2:1-2)—and he accomplished a literal redemption for us by his death at the hands of Pontius Pilate. Jesus came into our history to undo the effects of Adam's literal transgression. Therefore, Adam himself (and his deeds) must have been historical.

You do not need an historical atonement to undo a mythological fall or a mythological transgression. All you need is another myth. But if Christ needed to be real to save us, then Adam was real, too. It is because Adam was real that Christ also had to be real to make atonement.

That brings us to the second thing the comparison between Adam and Jesus Christ teaches: that the fall of the human race was also historical. It was a real event. That is important because it involves guilt before God—true guilt, not merely imagined guilt or a feeling of guilt.

I am convinced that the major reason why the liberal scholars want to regard the opening chapters of Genesis as mythology is that they do not want to face the reality of the fall of the race in Adam or the guilt that flows from it. If there was no fall, then all this business about Adam and Eve and the serpent and the Garden of Eden is meant only to describe our unfortunate but inevitable human condition. It is meant only to say that we live in an imperfect world and must therefore continually struggle against imperfection. Rather than involving guilt, a framework like that actually gives us cause for pride and an imagined heroic stature. We are not to be blamed for anything. We have simply inherited imperfection and are, if anything, to be praised for how well we are struggling against it. In fact, we can be said to be doing better and better all the time.

But it is not that way. We are not doing better and better, nor are we merely struggling against imperfections. We were once right with God in Adam. But we rebelled. Now we are actually falling away from God as rapidly as our depraved powers and the downward-spiraling flow of our culture will take us. Romans 1 describes this decline. If we are to be saved, it must be by another historical act. The Lord Jesus Christ, who entered history precisely for that reason, must perform it.

In Adam or in Christ?

I close with these paragraphs from Donald Grey Barnhouse:

Apart from the story of his fall, it is remarkable how little is written in the Bible concerning Adam. He was created by God; he was commanded to take dominion over creation; he fell; for him the first blood sacrifice was made. He had several children, the first of whom was a murderer; the second, a type of those who believe and follow Christ; and the third, the progenitor of the race and fulfillment of the promises of God. There is also recorded Adam's age at death— an extremely meager biography. But two stupendous facts make Adam one of the most famous names in history. He was the first man, and he was the first sinner. He dissipated his children's heritage, and we have all been in spiritual poverty ever since. But as we peer at him through the shadows of time we do not judge him too harshly, for we know that he did exactly what we would have done in his place.

And, indeed, we can look rather kindly upon Adam, because through him we learn the principle of the one standing for the many. At the cross of Jesus Christ we see that other one also standing for the many. As Adam stood for many and brought death upon all, so our Lord Jesus stood for many and brings life to all who believe. Without question everyone of us is in Adam.

Can you look away to Calvary and know that you are in Christ? Having been defiled by the stream that flows from Adam, you can find cleansing only by plunging into the stream that flows from the Lord Jesus Christ dying for us, as head of the new race.

Chapter 70.
Three Great Contrasts

Romans 5:15-17

The paragraph to which we come now, Romans 5:15-17, is one in which Paul develops the differences between our being in Adam and our being in Christ. But in order to understand it we have to go back to the overall analysis of Romans 5:12-21, which I did earlier. If you remember that analysis, you will recall that in those verses Paul is writing about Christ and Adam and that, at the beginning of the section, he started to develop an important comparison: "Therefore, just as sin entered the world through one man [he means Adam], and death through sin, and in this way death came to all men, because all sinned...."

At this point Paul obviously intended to go on with something like what we find in verse 18: "... so also the result of one act of righteousness was justification that brings life to all men." But when he got to the point of saying, "and in this way death came to all men, because all sinned," he interrupted his thought, as we have already seen. Apparently he sensed that the majority of his readers (if not all) would be confused by the words "because all sinned." They would not have even the faintest idea what he was really talking about. They would think he meant only that all people sin, when actually he meant that all have been accounted sinners because of Adam's first transgression. So Paul did the only sensible thing. He broke off what he was saying to explain himself.

Verses 13 and 14 are that explanation. In them he shows that the punishment for sin, which is death, was in the world even before the law was given through Moses. Therefore, since people everywhere died during this period, though they were not technically transgressors of the law, which was not yet given, they must have been condemned, not for their own transgressions (though they were guilty of them), but for the sin of Adam. Paul's point is that we were condemned by reason of our union with Adam, just as we have now been saved by virtue of our union with Jesus Christ. It is an important and great similarity.

Parenthesis within a Parenthesis

Here we might have expected Paul to have resumed the contrast with which he began the section, as I indicated he does do when he gets to verse 18. But he does not do this immediately, and the reason must be that when he got to the end of verse 14 he began to think that a further clarification was needed. He had shown that we are united to Christ, just as we were united to Adam. But he must have said to himself, "I cannot give the impression that the parallel holds true on every level. Although it is true that we are justified in Christ, just as we have been condemned in Adam, that is only part of the story. Actually, the differences are as great as the similarities.
We are condemned in Adam, true. But the salvation that we have because of our union with Christ is far greater and more glorious."

For this reason, Paul interjects here what I have called a parenthesis within a parenthesis or, as you might prefer to say, a further digression. In verses 13 and 14 he has explained how we have "sinned in Adam." In verses 15-17 he digresses further to explain how union with Christ is greater in its nature and effects than our original union with Adam.

I have called this study "Three Great Contrasts," because of the way Paul sets out his contrasts in the three verses we are studying here, verses 15, 16, and 17. But actually the paragraph is filled with contrasts:

trespass versus gift death versus eternal life condemnation versus justification one versus many sin versus righteousness
Adam versus Christ

The comparisons continue in verses 18-21:

disobedience versus obedience sinners versus those who have been made righteous law versus grace.

The final idea, the triumph of grace over law and the "reign" of grace, is a climax to which the entire chapter moves. It supports the position with which Romans 5 began: that the one who has been joined to Christ by faith is secure in that relationship.

Natural Versus Supernatural

Of these three verses (vv. 15-17), the hardest to understand is the first, because it is least explicit. It says: "But the gift is not like the trespass. For if the many died by the trespass of the one man, how much more did God's grace and the gift that came by the grace of the one man, Jesus Christ, overflow to the many!" In what way is the gift of salvation in Christ not like the trespass? In what sense is the gift much more?

Let me begin by saying that there is a sense in which this verse is a generic or inclusive statement of the contrasts that follow, so that the remainder of the chapter might be considered exposition. But that aside, it is still right to ask: What is the particular contrast, the unique idea, that verse 15 introduces?

I suggest that the contrast is found in the first key word Paul uses, after having said that "the gift is not like the trespass." It is the word died.

The sin of Adam brought death. It brought death to all. By contrast, the gift of God brought life to many.

We must not be misled by Paul's use of the word many. To most people today "many" suggests "number." So we immediately begin to weigh the "many" who sinned and therefore fell in Adam with the "many" who are being saved in Christ and ask which is greater. Does this verse teach that the saved will outnumber the lost eventually? (There are expositors who say this.) Does it perhaps teach that eventually all will be saved, that is, universalism? I maintain that it is not teaching either one of these things. Paul has been thinking of the union of the race with Adam and the union of the saved with Christ. He is not thinking quantitatively at all. So when he writes of "the many" who died because of Adam's transgression, he means just that: the many who died in Adam, that is, all persons. And when he writes of "the many" to whom the gift of life overflows, he also means many, for surely "many" are being saved.

But what is the contrast, if it is not between a smaller number and a greater number, or between numbers at all? It is, as I suggested, between death, which has come upon all because of Adam, and life, which has been given to every believer in Christ.

Death is a natural thing, "natural" in the sense that if we are left to ourselves without any supernatural intervention, death simply comes. God told Adam and Eve that if they ate of the fruit of the forbidden tree, they would die. They ate of it, and they did die. It did not require any special intervention of God to produce the effect. Sin always produces death. Moreover, it produces death equally for all. Because Adam sinned, death passed in a natural and inevitable way upon the human race. To that extent, the secularists are right when they speak of a normal biological sequence in which organisms are born, mature, grow old, and eventually die. This is so natural and so understandable that Oswald Spengler used it to explain the equally natural and equally understandable rise and decline of nations. He even used it to prophesy the decline of the western nations in the title of his monumental history, The Decline of the West.

Is death natural? Of course.

Even taxes are not as inescapable as mortality.

"But the gift is not like the trespass." Over against the natural outworking of the sin of our first parent, resulting in the death of all, stands the supernatural working of the gracious God. Left to ourselves, the cause is hopeless. Nothing is more characteristic of the presence of man upon earth than graveyards. But God has not left us to ourselves. He has intervened to save us, apart from anything we can do or could ever have done. It is what Paul says in Ephesians 2:1-7:

As for you, you were dead in your transgressions and sins, in which you used to live when you followed the ways of this world and of the ruler of the kingdom of the air, the spirit who is now at work in those who are disobedient. All of us also lived among them at one time, gratifying the cravings of our sinful nature and following its desires and thoughts. Like the rest, we were by nature objects of wrath. But because of his great love for us, God, who is rich in mercy, made us alive with Christ even when we were dead in transgressions—it is by grace you have been saved. And God raised us up with Christ and seated us with him in the heavenly realms in Christ Jesus, in order that in the coming ages he might show the incomparable riches of his grace, expressed in his kindness to us in Christ Jesus.

This is what Paul will write about later on in Romans, though more briefly: "For the wages of sin is death [that is natural part], but the gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord [this part is supernatural]" (Rom. 6:23). Think of what follows from this:

1. Glory goes to God and not man, and 2. Salvation is certain, because the work of God is a lasting thing, unlike our own weak achievements. It is because the work is of God and not man that nothing in creation "will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. 8:39).

One Sin Versus Many Sins

Verse 16 carries the contrast between the effects of Adam's sin and the effects of God's work in Christ further, pointing out that "the gift of God is not like the result of the one man's sin: The judgment followed one sin and brought condemnation, but the gift followed many trespasses and brought justification."

As I suggested earlier, this verse is easier to understand than the previous one, which is generic and somewhat understated. It is hard to see the precise contrast in verse 15, but this is not true of verse 16. Here a clear contrast is found between the "one sin" that brought condemnation, that is, the sin of Adam in eating from the forbidden tree, and the "many trespasses," which Adam and all who followed him have committed but which are atoned for by the blood of Christ.

Let me elaborate: If in some way—which we know is impossible, but I put it like this only for the sake of argument—the one sin of Adam in eating of the forbidden tree turned out to be the only sin Adam ever committed, and if no one who came after him in all the long ages of human history (including Eve and Cain and Abel and all the rest of mankind down to and including ourselves and our contemporaries) ever committed another sin in thought, word, or deed, it would still have been necessary for Jesus to die to save us. Since we are condemned for Adam's sin, he having been our federal representative, we would still need a Savior to rescue us from that original sin and God's consequent condemnation. And even if that had been the situation and Jesus had come to save us from the effects of only that one sin, salvation would still have been glorious, and the angels would still rightly have used their time singing: "You are worthy to take the scroll and to open its seals, because you were slain, and with your blood you purchased men for God from every tribe and language and people and nation" (Rev. 5:9).

But that is not the situation! Adam's one sin did bring condemnation to all, from which Christ alone has redeemed us. But Adam's one sin was not the only sin Christ died for. Adam, having become a sinner, sinned many more times before he died. In fact, it would have been as true of him as Scripture later says it is of the entire race that "every inclination of the thoughts of [man's] heart was only evil all the time" (Gen. 6:5). And Adam's many sins were followed by countless billions of sins by countless billions of sinners, all of whom added their own evils, arrogance, brutality, malice, and other vices to the grim moral history of mankind.

What is the essence of human history? From God's point of view, is it not what Paul has already summarized in Romans 1:29-32?

They have become filled with every kind of wickedness, evil, greed and depravity. They are full of envy, murder, strife, deceit and malice. They are gossips, slanderers, God-haters, insolent, arrogant and boastful; they invent ways of doing evil; they disobey their parents; they are senseless, faithless, heartless, ruthless. Although they know God's righteous decree that those who do such things deserve death, they not only continue to do these very things but also approve those who practice them.

Since Christ died for such a vast accumulation of sins, is it any wonder that Paul marvels in Romans 5 how "judgment followed one sin and brought condemnation, but the gift followed many trespasses and brought justification" (v. 16, emphasis added).

Death Versus the Reign of Life

The third and final great contrast is in verse 17: "For if, by the trespass of the one man, death reigned through that one man, how much more will those who receive God's abundant provision of grace and of the gift of righteousness reign in life through the one man, Jesus Christ."

What does that mean?

The key to understanding this verse is to emphasize the word abundant in the phrase "God's abundant provision of grace and of the gift of righteousness," and the thought that those who have been thus abundantly blessed are enabled to reign in life now through Jesus. To put it simply, the work of Christ in dying for us did not merely restore us to the position in which Adam stood before the fall, but rather carries us beyond that. One commentator says, "Those redeemed by the death of Christ are not merely recovered from the fall, but made to reign through Jesus Christ, to which they had no title in Adam's communion."

D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones, righdy noting the reappearance of the word justification in this section, says,

It is not only that we are forgiven, but over and above being forgiven, the righteousness of Jesus Christ is put to our account, is put upon us.... Unfallen Adam was righteous, but it was his own righteousness as a created being, it was the righteousness of a man. Adam never had the righteousness of Jesus Christ upon him. What he lost was his own righteousness. But you and I are not merely given back a human righteousness, the righteousness that Adam had before he fell—we are given the righteousness of Jesus Christ. "Much more"—abundance, superabundance—give full weight to it! We receive this abundance of grace and the gift of righteousness.

If Adam had remained in a state of righteousness, he could have sung: "In my own righteousness I stand,/Soon to join God's glorious band." But Adam did not stand. He fell, because he was not able by his own strength to confirm himself in righteousness. Similarly, were we to attempt to stand in our own righteousness, assuming that we could attain to it in the first place, we would fall also. But we do not fall. We stand instead, and the reason we stand is that we do not stand in our own righteousness. So we sing:

> Jesus thy Blood and righteousness
> My beauty are, my glorious dress; 'Midst flaming worlds in these arrayed, With joy shall I lift up my head.

Moreover, it is not only that we will stand in that final day of divine judgment. We stand now, which is what the phrase "reigning in life" refers to. It means that by the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God, and the communion and empowering of the Holy Spirit, we are victorious now. In this way, the gift of God in Christ far surpasses the effects of Adam's and all other transgressions.

Through Jesus Christ

I close by noting some words that Paul has kept repeating in these verses and that also occur later. They are "through the one man," that is, "through Jesus Christ." They occur in verse 17, but we have already encountered a similar phrase in verse 15: "by the grace of the one man, Jesus Christ." And the same idea is found later, in verses 19 and 21: "through the obedience of the one man" and "through Jesus Christ our Lord."

The apostle never leaves this idea out because, as we have been seeing, it is the one glorious and absolutely essential truth in this passage. We were in Adam once, and we fell in him. His sin brought death on the human race. What then? Good news! We can escape the effects of Adam's fall, Paul tells us. More than that, we can rise above the position in which Adam first stood. We can stand in a divine righteousness, which is perfect and which can never be taken away from us.

It enables us to reign in life, triumphing over sin, as Adam, in his own human (though once perfect) righteousness, could not. Therefore we can sing:

> On Christ the solid rock I stand; All other ground is sinking sand.

Are you "in Jesus"? Adam was not "in Jesus," and he fell, even from his high pinnacle of human perfection. If he who was once humanly perfect fell, what chance do you have to stand, you who are corrupted by many sins and wholly disposed to unrighteousness?

Your only hope is to believe on Jesus and be joined to him. It is to stand in him, as you originally stood (but also fell) in Adam.

Chapter 71.
Grace

Romans 5:15-17

In the preceding five studies, we have been looking at Romans 5:12-21 with attention to its outline and great themes, trying to follow Paul's thought as he compares our natural union with Adam, on the one hand, with our spiritual union with Christ, on the other. It is a comparison that has involved both similarities and differences. Now we must look at just one word: grace. It is a wonderful, magnificent word. "Grace" occurs five times in this passage, three times in verses 1517, which we are particularly studying here, and twice more in verses 20 and 21. In these verses Paul says that grace is of God and that it comes to us through the Lord Jesus Christ. It is free, triumphant, and overflowing.

What is grace? It is God's favor toward the undeserving. Grace lies behind the plan of salvation, but it is also what brings that salvation to us individually and effectively, which is why the great Baptist preacher of the last century, Charles Haddon Spurgeon, called it both the "fountain" and "stream" of salvation. Someone has made grace into an acrostic, calling it: "God's Riches At Christ's Expense." Another has said, "Grace is favor shown to people who do not deserve any favor at all, who, indeed, deserve the exact opposite."

Amazing Grace!

Whenever I come to a word like "grace" and want to capture something of its special meaning for a sermon, I frequently turn to a hymnbook to see how it has been described in poetry by earlier Christians. When I do this for grace, I find that I am almost overpowered by the words and hymns available. In the hymnbook I commonly use there is a table of contents that is organized theologically, and when I turn to it I find that "grace" appears not only in one section or category but in many. It appears under the doctrine of God in two listings: "His [that is, God's] Love and Grace" and "The Covenant of Grace." Under "Jesus" I find "His Love and Grace."
Later on there are listings for "Salvation and Grace" and "God's Refreshing Grace."

In the back of this hymnbook there are listings for "converting grace," "efficacious grace," "magnified grace," "refreshing grace," "regenerating grace," "sanctifying grace," "saving grace," and "sovereign grace."

The hymns themselves swell this powerful verbal litany, using phrases like "amazing grace," "abounding grace," "matchless grace," "marvelous grace," and "pardoning grace." A number of these are among the great literary treasures of the English language.

There are the classic lines of John Newton:

> Amazing grace—how sweet the sound— That saved a wretch like me! I once was lost, but now am found, Was blind, but now I see.

Or these by Philip Doddridge:

> Grace! 'Tis a charming sound,
> Harmonious to the ear;
> Heaven with the echo shall resound, And all the earth shall hear.

My favorite hymn about grace was written by Samuel Davies, a former president of Princeton University:

> Great God of wonders! All thy ways
> Are worthy of thyself—divine;
> And the bright glories of thy grace Among thine other wonders shine;
> Who is a pardoning God like thee? Or who has grace so rich and free?
>
> Pardon from an offended God!
> Pardon for sins of deepest dye!
> Pardon bestowed through Jesus' blood!
> Pardon that brings the rebel nigh!
> Who is a pardoning God like thee? Or who has grace so rich and free?

O may this glorious, matchless love,
This God-like miracle of grace,
Teach mortal tongues, like those above, To raise this song of lofty praise:
Who is a pardoning God like thee? Or who has grace so rich and free?

Theologians speak of "common grace," "saving grace," "irresistible grace," and "persevering grace." "Sovereign grace" is among the most powerful of all theological expressions.

No wonder Spurgeon said of grace: "What an abyss is the grace of God! Who can measure its breadth? Who can fathom its depth? Like all the rest of the divine attributes, it is infinite. God is full of love, for 'God is love.' God is full of goodness; the very name 'God' is short for 'good.' Unbounded goodness and love enter into the very essence of the Godhead. It is because 'his mercy endureth for ever' that men are not destroyed; because 'his compassions fail not' that sinners are brought to him and forgiven."

Boring Grace?

Despite all this, there are today in most of our churches probably only a small percentage of people who really believe in grace, much less appreciate it. They pay lip service to grace; they know we are "saved by grace" apart from our own good works. But there they stop. If they were to tell the truth, most would probably say that they find the topic of "grace" boring.

The great English theologian J. I. Packer has noted this, observing of such people, Their conception of grace is not so much debased as nonexistent. The thought means nothing to them; it does not touch their experience at all. Talk to them about the church's heating, or last year's accounts, and they are with you at once; but speak to them about the realities to which the word "grace" points, and their attitude is one of deferential blankness.

They do not accuse you of talking nonsense; they do not doubt that your words have meaning; but they feel that, whatever it is you are talking about, it is beyond them, and the longer they have lived without it the surer they are that at their stage of life they do not really need it.

What could possibly have caused such indifference, particularly to such a sublime concept? Packer believes that it reflects a failure to understand, acknowledge, and "feel in one's heart" the four great truths that the biblical doctrine of grace presupposes:

1. The moral ill-desert of man. Modern man is complacent about his grim spiritual condition, and he assumes that God is also. "The thought of himself as a creature fallen from God's image, a rebel against God's rule, guilty and unclean in God's sight, fit only for God's condemnation, never enters his head."

2. The retributive justice of God. "The idea that retribution might be the moral law of God's world, and an expression of his holy character, seems to modern man quite fantastic."

3. The spiritual impotence of man. "To mend our own relationship with God, regaining God's favor after having once lost it, is beyond the power of any of us." Yet few think this in our century.

4. The sovereign freedom of God. Most people think God owes them something. But, says Packer rightly, "The God of the Bible does not depend on his human creatures for his wellbeing... nor, now that we have sinned, is he bound to show us favor.... God does not owe it to anyone to stop justice taking its course.... Only when it is seen that what decides each man's destiny is whether or not God resolves to save him from his sins, and that this is a decision which God need not make in any single case, can one begin to grasp the biblical view of grace."

Grace upon Grace

Each of these missed points, so well defined by Packer, has already been spelled out in Romans. Therefore, if we have come to this point having understood what has been taught earlier, we know what grace is and are prepared to marvel at it, as Paul himself does in this section. In fact, this is what we are going to do in the studies that close out our treatment of Romans 5. They are entitled: "Justification by Grace," "Law and Grace," "Abounding Grace," "God's Motives for Grace," and "The Reign of Grace." Each will help us to explore this marvelous concept further.

But what should we do here? In this first study of grace, I want to set the subject in its broadest context, showing how the grace of God operates. There are five main categories.

1. Electing grace. As soon as we see that grace really is apart from any possible merit in its object, we understand that God is utterly sovereign in his choices. Most people probably think of God's saving men and women (if they think of this at all) on the basis of some good in them, either seen or foreseen. That is, most people think that God waits to see the good we are capable of performing and then saves us, if the good is good enough. Or, if we insist with such people, as the Bible teaches, that God has made a decision to save whom he will save in eternity past — before we were created and thus had any opportunity of doing anything—they answer that the decision must have been made on the basis of the good God foresees. Even those who think they believe in grace will sometimes argue this way, supposing that what God foresees is the "faith" that enables him to save us.

But answer this: If men and women really are as corrupt as the Bible describes us as being, what possible "good" in us could God foresee, unless he himself should first decide to put it there? If, as Genesis 6:5 maintains, "every inclination of the thoughts of [our hearts is] only evil all the time," even faith must be created in us sovereignly as an expression of God's grace.

Another way of saying this is to say that grace is eternal; it is before all things.

Still another way is to say that grace is the source or fountainhead of salvation; it is not dependent on anything.

Some years ago, Dr. John H. Gerstner, a former Professor of Church History at Pittsburgh Theological Seminary, was preaching a series of sermons on Romans and had just gotten around to teaching about election in what had turned out to be the eighth sermon in the series. There was a question period afterward, and one man asked, "Why are you Presbyterians always talking about predestination? Why don't you focus on the atonement?" This was the eighth sermon in the series, remember. Gerstner had actually been talking about the atonement for the previous seven messages. But he overlooked that matter and instead pointed out to the man who had asked the question that there would have been no atonement at all if there were no predestination. "If God had not unconditionally elected you to salvation, can you suppose for one moment that he would have sent his precious Son into the world to redeem you?" Gerstner asked.

We can never pre-distance grace. The grace of God, like God himself, is before all other things. It is from grace that all good comes.

2. Pursuing grace. Do you remember what happened to Adam and Eve when they sinned by eating of the forbidden tree? We might have expected that God would have cast them off, abandoning them to hell, since that is what they deserved. But, instead of this, Adam had not moved far from the place of his rebellion when God came to him, calling him by name, and eventually pursuing him into the grove of trees where he and Eve were hiding. There he made great promises of grace, announcing that the Messiah would one day be sent to destroy Satan and restore the guilty pair to Paradise.

It has always been like this. Saul, the self-righteous Pharisee fled God, kicking even against the "goads" of conscience. He fled God by religious activity and zeal, even to the point of hunting out, arresting, and killing Christians. But God pursued Paul. He pursued him to Damascus, stopping him in his furious outward flight. He called to him:

"Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?" (Acts 9:4). Grace did that, and Paul never forgot the fact.

The God of grace has been called "The Hound of Heaven," who pursues rebellious man down the long corridors of time and circumstance.

We may think at times that we have sought God. But as we grow in grace and increasingly learn the nature of our own sinful hearts, we discover that we have sought him only because he first sought us.

> I sought the Lord, and afterward I knew He moved my soul to seek him, seeking me; It was not I that found, O Savior true. No, I was found of thee.

3. Pardoning grace. Samuel Davies marveled at this when he wrote: "Who is a pardoning God like thee? Or who has grace so rich and free?" And no wonder! What he was marveling at was no less than the very core of salvation. We are more accustomed to speak of this core as justification by faith, but that is only a convenient theological shorthand. What we mean when we speak of justification by faith is justification by the grace of God through faith, according to which we are moved from "the status of a condemned criminal awaiting a terrible sentence to that of an heir awaiting a fabulous inheritance." And that is grace! Why was it that God "spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all"? (Rom. 8:32), asks J. I. Packer. It is grace alone!

We did not deserve it. We could never deserve it. "But because of his great love for us, God, who is rich in mercy, made us alive with Christ even when we were dead in transgressions—it is by grace you have been saved" (Eph. 2:4-5).

4. Persevering grace. Reformed Christians refer to the last of the well-known points of Calvinism as "the perseverance of the saints" and explain rightly that those who have been saved by grace persevere. They note Jesus' saying that "he who stands firm to the end will be saved" (Matt. 10:22). This is a sound emphasis. The Christian life is not passive on our part. We are active in it. When Christ calls us we come running, and we keep on running. But notice: We persevere because he perseveres. We endure to the end because the grace of God preserves us. Indeed, it is absurd to suppose that we are able to keep ourselves in grace even for a single moment. If it were up to us, in the final analysis all would be lost.

Do you remember the third verse of John Newton's hymn?

Through many dangers, toils, and snares, I have already come;

'Tis grace has brought me safe thus far, And grace will lead me home.

That is it exactly. Grace has brought us to where we are now, and that same grace, persevering grace, will lead us to glory.

5. Saving grace. I have left the category of "saving grace" until now because, although salvation is usually thought of in reference to our being justified or pardoned only, salvation is actually a more embracing concept. It refers to the past: God saved us from sin's penalty in Christ. It concerns the present: God is saving us from sin's power now. It looks to the future: God will save us from sin's very presence when we are given our resurrection bodies and are taken into his holy presence forever.

How? It is by grace, grace only.

Grace in God's People

I have two main conclusions in this study. First, if we have been saved entirely by grace, as we see we have, this very fact should draw us closer to God. Why? Because without him we are lost. We must never trust ourselves.

> Oh, to grace how great a debtor
> Daily I'm constrained to be;
> Let that grace now, like a fetter,
> Bind my wandering heart to thee.
> Prone to wander, Lord, I feel it,
> Prone to leave the God I love;
> Here's my heart, Oh, take and seal it,

Seal it for thy courts above.

Robert Robinson, 1758

Second, let us revel in grace, abounding in it even as it is abounding. Why? Because, as D.

Martyn Lloyd-Jones says, "It is only when you and I, and others who are members of the Christian Church, are rejoicing in this abounding grace as we ought to be, that we shall begin to attract the people who are outside the church." There are lots of things about Christianity that will always be unattractive to the world: holiness, discipleship, self-sacrifice, and more. There are scores of them. But grace is not one. Grace is attractive, and those who have received grace should be attractive, too.

Later on, Paul is going to speak of grace "abounding." Let it abound! He is going to speak of grace "reigning." Let it reign! Let it reign until all about turn to you and say, "If that is Christianity, then that is what I want." Do not live like a pauper when God has made you a king.

Chapter 72.
Justification by Grace

Romans 5:18-19

I do not know when or where it happened, but somebody was sitting in his apartment, getting ready to go to bed, when he heard his neighbor drop a shoe on the floor above him. The upstairs neighbor was obviously getting ready for bed, too, and the man below him waited for the thud of the other shoe. Afterward he must have talked about it, and the expression "waiting for the other shoe to drop" became an expressive figure of speech in our language.

Now we come to what we have been waiting for ever since we started to study Romans 5:12-21. Our expectation arose because Paul began this great passage with a contrast: "Therefore, just as sin entered the world through one man, and death through sin, and in this way death came to all men, because all sinned...." But just when we were expecting the second half of that thought, he broke it off, and everything we have been studying since has in a sense been a digression, or parenthesis.

In fact, there have been two major digressions, which it might be helpful to review before proceeding.

First, Paul explained the sense in which "all sinned." He did not mean that all have become sinners and have therefore sinned, though we would naturally think this, but rather that each of us was declared a sinner because of Adam's original sin or transgression. It is true that we also sin and should be condemned for that, if there were nothing more to be said. But that is not Paul's meaning. He meant that all have been accounted sinners in Adam, so that those who were going to be saved could be accounted righteous in the Lord Jesus Christ.

Since this digression finished at the end of verse 14, we again expected the other shoe to drop. But instead of completing the contrast introduced by verse 12, Paul worked in another long parenthesis to show the differences between our union with Adam, on the one hand, and our union with Jesus Christ, on the other. This second digression started at verse 15 and occupied the next three verses.

It is only when we get to verse 18 that the second shoe finally falls and we get the full impact of the contrast. Paul backs up to give it, restating the first part again, although in slightly different words: "[1] Consequently, just as the result of one trespass was condemnation for all men, [2] so also the result of one act of righteousness was justification that brings life for all men." There we have it!

But then, lest we have fallen asleep in the meantime and have somehow missed the point after this long wait, Paul makes it again in verse 19, adding: "[1] For just as through the disobedience of the one man the many were made sinners, [2] so also through the obedience of the one man the many will be made righteous."

What a great list of contrasts is implied here! In a previous study we have already seen "Three Great Contrasts" in verses 15-17. They were intended to show the ways in which the work of Adam and the work of Christ were dissimilar. The new list of contrasts in verses 18 and 19 shows the fullness of what Paul is teaching and serves as a summary. Those contrasts are:

Adam	versus	Christ
The one trespass of Adam	versus	the one act of righteousness of Christ
The disobedience of Adam	versus	the obedience of Christ
Death	versus	life
Condemnation	versus	justification

Of these five contrasts, the greatest is the one between condemnation and justification, since this is what the chapter has been dealing with in one way or another all along.

By Faith or By Grace?

In the previous study, I said that we would be dealing with the subject of God's grace through the end of Romans 5, and for that reason I have called this study "Justification by Grace." But I wonder if that sounds right to you. We already know about "justification by faith." It was the rallying cry of the Protestant Reformation, Martin Luther having said that it is the doctrine by which the church stands or falls. But if that is so, why should we speak of justification by grace? The answer, of course, is that both statements are parts of the same truth, since the justification that is received by faith alone (sola fide) is also by grace alone (sola gratia).

A full statement of the doctrine would be: "Justification by the grace of God alone, received through faith alone."

Justification is an act of God as judge by which he declares us to be in a right standing before him so far as his justice is concerned. We are not just in ourselves, of course. So the only way by which we can be declared to be in a right standing before God is on the basis of the death of Jesus Christ for our sins, he bearing our punishment, and by the application of Christ's righteousness to us by God's grace. This grace is received through the channel of human faith, but it is nevertheless utterly of grace. It is apart from all deserving.

Is Etymology Helpful Here?

"Justification" is what this great section of Romans is all about, and we need to see the passage's force. But before getting into the text, let me mention another reason why some people might be confused about justification and thus misunderstand it—the problem lies with the word's etymology, its linguistic history.

Anyone who knows Latin can tell at a glance that "justification" is constructed out of two Latin words: iustus and facio, facere. The first word is an adjective meaning "just," "equitable," "fair," or "proper." In legal terminology it means "having a right status in reference to a law." We have preserved the Latin term in English words like "just," "justice," and "justify." The second word is a verb; it means "to make" or "to do." We have it in such words as "factory," which is a place where things are made, or "manufacture," which literally means "to make a thing by hand." Putting these two Latin words together, we have a meaning for "justification" that would go something like this: "to make just, right, or equitable." Used of people, this would suggest that they are literally to be made righteous.

But here the etymology of the word justification is misleading to most English speakers. The reason is that "justification" actually refers not to a righteousness attained by or produced in an individual, but to the act of God by which the righteousness of Christ is credited to that person.

The context of Romans 5 is of great help in coming to understand and appreciate this term. You will remember from the list of contrasts I presented earlier that justification is contrasted with condemnation in verse 18: "Consequently, just as the result of one trespass was condemnation for all men, so also the result of one act of righteousness was justification that brings life for all men." If this is the contrast, we need to ask what happens when people are "condemned." Does the act of condemnation make them lawbreakers? To use biblical terminology: Does it make them sinners? Or does it merely mean that they are declared to be such? The answer is: It means that they are declared to be sinners. They are lawbreakers already. The act of condemnation merely declares this to be so and subjects them to whatever penalty the law in the case prescribes.

The same idea applies to justification. Even though the etymology would suggest that justification means "to make just or righteous," the term actually means "to declare one to be in a right standing before God's law." In human courts, this might be on the basis of the individual's own personal righteousness. But this can never be the basis in God's court, since no one is truly righteous, as Paul has shown in the preceding chapters.

How can God declare us to be righteous, then? Only on the grounds of Jesus' own perfect righteousness imputed to us. That is, we are justified by God by grace alone.

There is another explanation derived from the wording of verse 19. Paul says that on the basis of Adam's one act of disobedience many "were made sinners." We have already seen how that is to be taken. It does not mean that all were affected by sin and thus became sinning individuals, though that did happen and is true. Rather, here it means that the entire race was declared to be sinful because of Adam's sin. That is why death passed upon all, even upon those (like infants) who died before they had any opportunity to sin. If "the many were made sinners" in that sense, it must be in a corresponding sense that "the many will be made righteous," namely, through the one act of obedience by Jesus Christ.

The Obedience of Christ

This brings us to another important idea: the obedience of Jesus. Paul mentions this in verse 19, and it is the first time he has used the word. He has really been speaking of the difference between Adam's disobedience and Christ's obedience all along, but up to this point he has used different terminology. What is the significance of his use of the phrase "through the obedience of the one man" here?

In discussing the obedience of Christ, theologians usually distinguish between what is called the active obedience of Jesus and the passive obedience of Jesus.

The active obedience of Jesus refers to his submission to and active conformity to the law of Moses. Do you remember how in Galatians Jesus is described as having been "born under law, to redeem those under law" (Gal. 4:4-5)? This means that when Jesus became man he deliberately subjected himself to the law of Moses, so that when he went to the cross to die for our sin, it might be known that he did so as a perfect sin-bearer, "a lamb without blemish or defect" (1 Peter 1:19).

Jesus' baptism signified the same thing. When Jesus came to John to be baptized, John protested at first, saying, "I need to be baptized by you, and do you come to me?" (Matt. 3:14). He meant that Jesus was perfect, that he needed no baptism of repentance from his sins. But Jesus replied, "Let it be so now; it is proper for us to do this to fulfill all righteousness" (v. 15). In other words, Jesus did not come to John for a baptism of repentance, as the others were doing, for he had no sin for which to repent. By his baptism he identified with us, putting himself under law as our federal head or representative. The law was there to be kept, and Jesus kept it. Throughout his life he exercised a full and active obedience to God's standards and thus showed himself to be the only acceptable sacrifice for sin.

The passive obedience of Jesus Christ is something else. It refers to his submission to the cross. Do you recall how Jesus wrestled with this in Gethsemane? He prayed, "My Father, if it is possible, may this cup be taken from me..." (Matt. 26:39). Jesus was not asking if he could somehow escape the cruel death of crucifixion. It was his being made sin for us that troubled him. He was to be placed on the cross, and the full weight of the sin of men and women was to be placed on him and punished there. The Father was even going to turn his back upon him.

That is what Jesus dreaded and what he referred to when he asked if there were not some other way open.

This was Jesus' passive obedience, and it is what Paul is referring to when he speaks of "the obedience of the one man" through which "the many will be made righteous." Christ's active obedience qualified him for this role. But it was his one act of passive obedience, corresponding to Adam's one act of disobedience, that atoned for our sin and made it possible for the Father to credit Jesus' righteousness to our account.

Where Are Your Sins?

But enough explanation. Here is an illustration from the life of Donald Grey Barnhouse, one of my predecessors as pastor of the Tenth Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. It is the story of his conversion.

When Barnhouse was about fifteen years old he heard the testimony of a man who had been a narcotics addict but had been delivered from that life and become a minister of the gospel. Barnhouse approached the man and asked about his experience of Christ, because he believed that the preacher had something he himself lacked. The preacher gave him an object lesson. He took Barnhouse's left hand, turned it palm upward and then said intently, "This hand represents you." On it he placed a hymnbook, saying, "This book represents your sin. The weight of it is on you. God hates sin, and his wrath must bear down against sin. Therefore, his wrath is bearing down on you, and you have no peace in your heart or life." It was a good statement of the truths in Romans 1, and Barnhouse knew it was true.

Then the preacher took the young man's other hand and said, "This hand represents the Lord Jesus Christ, the Savior. There is no sin upon him, and the Father must love him, because he is without spot or blemish. He is the beloved Son in whom the Father is well pleased." There were Donald's two hands, the one weighted down by the heavy book, the other empty. Again he knew it was true. He had the sin. Jesus had none.

Then the older man put his hand under Barnhouse's left hand and turned it over so that the book now came down on the hand that previously had been empty. He released the left hand, its burden now transferred to the hand that stood for Jesus. Then he said, "This is what happened when the Lord Jesus Christ took your place on the cross. He was the Lamb of God, bearing away the sin of the world."

While the hymnbook representing Barnhouse's sin still rested on the hand representing Jesus Christ, the preacher turned to his Bible and began to read verses that taught what he had just illustrated.

First Peter 2:23-24: "When they hurled their insults at him, he did not retaliate; when he suffered, he made no threats. Instead, he entrusted himself to him who judges justly. He himself bore our sin in his own body on the tree, so that we might die to sins and live for righteousness...." Isaiah 53:4-6 (the verses to which Peter was referring):

> Surely he took up our infirmities and carried our sorrows,
> yet we considered him stricken by God, smitten by him, and afflicted.
> But he was pierced for our transgressions, he was crushed for our iniquities;
> the punishment that brought us peace was upon him, and by his wounds we are healed.
> We all, like sheep, have gone astray, each of us has turned to his own way;
> and the LORD has laid on him the iniquity of us all.

The preacher stopped reading and addressed the young man directly. "Whose sins were laid on Jesus?" he asked.

"Our sins," Barnhouse replied.

"Whose sins does that mean?" the preacher probed.

"Our sins," came the same answer.

"Yes, but whose sins are those?"

"Well, everybody's sins—your sins, my sins..."

The older man interrupted and caught the words almost before they were out of Barnhouse's mouth. "My sins; yes, that's it," he said. "That's what I want. Say it again."

Young Barnhouse obeyed. "My sins," he repeated.

The preacher then went back to Isaiah 53:6. He put the hymnbook back on Barnhouse's left hand and pressed down upon it as he read, "We all, like sheep, have gone astray, each of us has turned to his own way." The pressure was strong. But then he turned the book and hand over once again, so that the burden was transferred to the hand that represented Jesus Christ, and he continued his reading: "and the LORD has laid on him the iniquity of us all."

Barnhouse understood it then, and he never forgot it. In fact, he used that very illustration to teach many others about justification and lead them to the Savior. He also expanded it. For just as the transfer of the hymnbook showed the transfer of our sin to Jesus, where it has been punished, so also is it possible to show the transfer of the righteousness of Christ to us by movement in the opposite direction. As I showed when we were studying Romans 4, a double transfer is involved. Barnhouse used a Bible to show this corresponding reality.

Horatio G. Spafford knew these truths. He wrote:

> My sin—O the bliss of this > glorious thought!— My sin, not > in part, but the whole,
> Is nailed to the cross, and I bear it no more:
> Praise the Lord!
> Praise the Lord! O my soul.

All of Grace

But this double transfer is all of grace! Nothing compelled God to act this way toward us.

Nothing made Christ die for your sin or made God credit the righteousness of his Son to you. There was nothing in you, under that great blanketing weight of sin, that drew his love downward. God did it because it pleased him to do it, and because it is his nature to be gracious.

At the end of his very excellent treatment of these verses, D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones asks whether we have understood the doctrine of justification by grace, and suggests (rightly I think) that there is a connection between understanding this and being truly saved. He does not mean that everyone who is saved understands everything about justification, of course. None of us does. He means that if these truths seem impossible or even crazy to you—if you are objecting, "But how could God possibly treat us as if we were in Adam and as if we are in Christ? How can he save us because of something someone else has done?"—it is probably because you are not saved.

For those who are not saved, these doctrines will always sound foolish. They may even sound like an invitation to sin, which is the objection Paul deals with in the very next chapter of Romans. It will always be thus, for how can those who do not possess the Spirit of God understand spiritual matters? Ah, but to those who are saved, these truths are wonderful. They are the very essence of life—which is, of course, what Paul speaks about here: "Justification that brings life for all men."

If you understand this and it seems right to you—not pointless, incorrect, or irrational—and if you believe it, you are one of those saved persons.

Chapter 73.
Law and Grace

Romans 5:20

At the end of Romans 5 is a short paragraph of two verses that a careless reader might be inclined to overlook, because at first glance the verses seem merely to be tacked on as an afterthought. We have followed Paul's argument in the previous nineteen verses of this chapter in detail, particularly from verse 12 on, and we have seen that the contrast between the sin of Adam and its consequences, on the one hand, and the obedience of Christ and its consequences, on the other, has at last been wrapped up. The sin of Adam led to condemnation and death. The righteousness of Christ led to justification and eternal life. This was so important to state that Paul has actually done so twice, once in verse 18 and a second time in verse 19.

Why, then, do we have a reintroduction of the "law," "trespass," "sin," "grace," "death," "righteousness" and "eternal life" in this short paragraph? Isn't it redundant? Wouldn't we be better served by moving on directly to chapters 6 and 7?

Well, the words are not redundant, and they are not unimportant. They are important for three reasons. First, they are a summary of what Paul has already been saying. That is why so many of the key terms of verses 12-19 are repeated. Second, they are a capsule treatment of the themes that chapters 6 and 7 will develop in detail. One commentator says that the following chapters are "virtually nothing but an extended commentary" on these verses. Third, verses 20 and 21 answer a question that has not been answered but has been suggested by something Paul wrote earlier. It is this question (and the answer) that concern us now.

Why Was the Law Given?

Verse 20 begins by mentioning the law. So let's back up a moment to what Paul has already said in Romans about the law of God. He has said two important things.

First, he has pointed out that the law was not given as a way by which we can be justified. The Jewish people thought differently. They believed that one could be justified by observing the law, which was Judaism's greatest treasure. But Paul has been at pains to disabuse the Jew of this opinion. "The law tells you what you should do," he says, "but it does not enable you to do it. All it does is reveal that you are a sinner." Paul made this clear in Romans 3, where he said: "Now we know that whatever the law says, it says to those who are under the law, so that every mouth may be silenced and the whole world held accountable to God. Therefore no one will be declared righteous in his sight by observing the law; rather, through the law we become conscious of sin" (vv. 19-20).

Second, in Romans 5:12-19 Paul has gone further, showing that the law was not even necessary to condemn us, since we have all already been condemned for the sin of our first parent, Adam.
It is because of his trespass, not our own, that "the many were made sinners" (v. 19).

Can you see how someone might be confused at this point? A person might say, "Paul, you have shown us that the law was not given as a means of justification, and we accept that. You have also shown that the law was not even necessary to condemn us, since we have all already been condemned for the sin of Adam. That is harder for us to understand, but we are willing to accept that, too. But look: If these two things are so, then please tell us, what was the purpose of the law? If we cannot be saved by the law and if the law is not even necessary for our condemnation, why was it given? What does it do? Does it, in fact, do anything? As we look at it now, the law of God seems to be without a real purpose."

This is the question that has not been answered but was suggested by Paul's mention of the law earlier in Romans 5, particularly in verses 13 and 14. His answer is in verse 20, our text: "The law was given so that the trespass might increase...."

But that creates an entirely new set of problems, doesn't it? It seems to say that God wanted more sin and that he decided to create sin by giving the law. That can't be true. That is an obvious error. God is not the author of sin, nor does he encourage it. James says that he does not even tempt us: "... God cannot be tempted by evil, nor does he tempt anyone; but each one is tempted when, by his own evil desire, he is dragged away and enticed" (James 1:13-14). If Romans 5:20 does not mean what on the surface it seems to mean, what does it mean? Why was the law "added"?

A proper approach to this verse is suggested by the word added. The Greek word is translated in various ways in the versions: "came in" (RSV and NASB), "keeps slipping into the picture" (Phillips), "intruded" (NEB), "was introduced" (TEV). But this is the same word that was used for the entrance of sin into the world in verse 12 ("therefore, just as sin entered the world through one man"), but with the prefix para (meaning "alongside of) joined to it. The literal meaning is:

"the law entered alongside of."

Alongside of what? Obviously, alongside of the sin that had already entered into the world. I point this out because, as soon as we see that God sent the law to be alongside of sin, we understand that the law was meant to exist in relationship to the sin that was already there. In other words, it does not cause sin, but rather does something to it. Since the sentence goes on to say that this was done "so that the trespass might increase," it must mean that the law somehow brought out the true nature and magnitude of sin so that it could be seen for what it truly is.

Moreover, as we are going to see, it was because of grace and in order that the grace of God might abound that God did this.

But we need to spell this out carefully. I have been greatly assisted at this point by D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones's careful treatment of this subject, and I want to follow his outline as I explore the ways in which the law increased (and was meant to increase) sin. There are three of them.

"I Would Not Have Known Sin, Except..."

The first way in which the law increased sin was by increasing our knowledge of it. This is what Paul is going to explain more fully in Romans 7, where he says, ".... I would not have known what sin was except through the law. For I would not have known what coveting really was if the law had not said, 'Do not covet'" (v. 7). Obviously, the law did not make Paul covetous. He was that already. It merely showed him that he was.

Lloyd-Jones breaks this down into four parts, asking: How does the law increase our knowledge of sin specifically? Then he answers:

1. The law defines sin for us. Before the giving of the law we were in a sense like children. You know how it is with children. They have the seeds of sin in them and also behave sinfully. But there is a sense in which they often do not know that what they are doing or are inclined to do is sinful. They are selfish, for example. But they only begin to learn what selfishness is, and that it is wrong, when a teacher or parent explains that it is important to share the toys in nursery school. No one is allowed to hog them all. Or they are willful. But they discover what this is only when their wills are opposed by the wiser and steadier wills of their parents, expressed in a list of things they can and cannot do. In the same way, sin is defined for us by the written law of God.

Another way of saying this is that law turns sin into transgression. All wrong acts are sinful, even without the law. But they are only seen to be sin when they are exposed as transgressions of the law of God. Paul said this earlier in this letter: "For before the law was given, sin was in the world. But sin is not taken into account when there is no law" (5:13) and "... where there is no law there is no transgression" (4:15).

2. The law reveals sin's nature. The true essence of sin is that it is rebellion against God. But there is a sense in which we do not fully know that or understand it until we are confronted with the law pertaining to the case. I mean by this that most people have a God-given sense of right and wrong. Even the native in the jungle, without any knowledge of the Bible, has a certain moral code. But he does not know God, and as a result he does not know that violations of his code, which he knows he violates, are actually directed against the God who has given him his moral sensibilities.

To give an example: When David committed adultery with Bathsheba and then conspired to have her husband killed, he would have known, even if he were an unenlightened heathen, that he had done wrong. Adultery and murder are not condoned anywhere. But because he was also an instructed member of God's chosen race, David saw his sin on a deeper level and therefore confessed it to be against God, saying: "Against you, you only, have I sinned and done what is evil in your sight..." (Ps. 51:4). David had sinned against (as well as with) Bathsheba, Uriah, and the nation of Israel. But it was only when he saw his sin as being against God that its true horror gripped him and he was led to confess it openly.

3. The law exposes sin's power. Let me give an example here, too. There is a man who is a heavy smoker. A number of people suggest he should stop, and his reply is that he can stop smoking anytime he wants to. After all, he has proved it by stopping dozens of times. He really does not know (or will not admit) that he has a nicotine addiction. Then he visits his doctor, who examines him, tells him that his smoking is killing him, and orders him to stop. Now he has a law to deal with, the law of his doctor. "All right, doctor," he says. "I'll stop smoking." But when he tries to stop he finds that he really cannot do it. Before, he thought he could. Now, when the doctor's "law" commands him to stop, he discovers that he cannot. He needs help.

This is the way with us. And it is this sense of helplessness that has actually been a step in many persons' conversions. They supposed that the cure for sin was within their own power—until they were convicted by the law of God and actually attempted reformation. It was then they discovered their own spiritual inability and turned to Christ.

4. The law unveils sin's deceit. Until we are directly exposed to the law of God we excuse our conduct, calling sin by some lesser name or denying it. The written law shows us that sin is sin and that it has fooled us into taking it lightly. Only the law exposes the pitfalls on sin's primrose path.

Martyn Lloyd-Jones applies this first way in which the giving of the law increased sin by saying:

One of the greatest troubles in the church today, as well as in the world, is that men do not have a knowledge of sin as they should have. Sin is regarded very lightly and loosely.... Men are prepared to admit that they need a little help, and that they are weak in this or that respect; but the Scripture teaches the depth and the foulness, and the exceeding sinfulness of sin. Our fathers, our grandfathers, and especially those who preceded them, knew all about this, and it was in such times that great spiritual revivals occurred. It is when men and women realize the depth of iniquity and sin that is in them that they begin to cry out to God. But if men have no real knowledge of sin, if they are lacking in the knowledge of sin which is given only by the law, then they will be content with a superficial evangelism. This is surely one of our main troubles today.

Those words state the case exactly.

Conviction of Sin

But the law does not only bring a knowledge of sin by defining it and exposing its power and its true and deceitful nature. It convicts us of sin, which is where the points in the previous section have been leading. Does the law also do the opposite? Yes, it sometimes does that: It can harden the heart. But when the Spirit of God is moving, the preaching of the law brings conviction and teaches those who have been convicted of sin to recoil from it.

Why does that happen? It is because the law reveals sin to be an offense against God, as I said earlier. As long as we think of sin only as a violation of some abstract moral code, it will not trouble us very much. We will just try to get away with the sin if we can. Sin will not even trouble us if we think of it as violation of a law made by other human beings. Why should their will restrict us? However, when we discover sin to be against the God who has made us and who has provided us with all good things, when we see that it is a rebellion against our Creator—an offense and an insult to him—we then experience real conviction.

In Romans 7, where Paul is discussing the role of the law at length, he not only says that the entrance of the law gave knowledge of sin. He adds that it awoke sin and allowed sin to produce even more sinful desires: "But sin, seizing the opportunity afforded by the commandment, produced in me every kind of covetous desire..." (v. 8).

This idea is not hard to understand. Everyone knows how the knowledge of a law somehow produces the desire in us to break it. If we are going down the highway at what we regard as a reasonable speed and see a sign restricting us to a speed we judge to be unreasonable, often we do not slow down. We hold our speed constant, and at times we even increase it. Do you remember Prohibition? I am told that during those days people who did not drink before became drinkers, and the sale of alcoholic beverages went up. A related story is told about John Nance Garner (who later became vice-president of the United States under Franklin Delano Roosevelt).
Supposedly, after the law prohibiting the sale of alcoholic beverages was passed, Garner would greet every visitor to his home by opening a cupboard, taking out a decanter and two glasses, pouring two drinks, and then saying solemnly, "Let us strike a blow for liberty."

This truly is the very nature of sin, and it is the coming of the law of God that reveals its stiffnecked nature within us.

Where Does Grace Come In?

Because we are studying grace in these concluding messages of Romans 5, at this point a person might well be asking, "Where, in the midst of all this definition and exposure of sin, can grace come in?" Or, to put it differently, "Why is this chapter entitled 'Law and Grace,' when thus far all we have talked about is law?"

There are several answers to those questions. Let me give two of them.

First, the very exposure of sin is an act of grace by God. He did not need to give the law. He could have left us in ignorance, allowing us to suppose in our blind sinfulness that all was well with us, when actually we were under his wrath and were perishing. He could have left us to compare ourselves with other persons, as a result of which we all inevitably suppose that we are fairly good. But, by giving us the law, God has disabused us of those fantasies and allowed us to see our condition as it truly is. The first step in seeking a doctor is to know that you are sick. In order to seek salvation you must know you need it.

Second, the law contained an anticipation of the gospel. The law was given at Mount Sinai amidst many visible demonstrations of God's presence. God declared what the people of Israel were and were not to do: "I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of Egypt, out of the land of slavery.

"You shall have no other gods before me.

"You shall not make for yourself an idol in the form of anything in heaven above or on the earth beneath or in the waters below. You shall not bow down to them or worship them; for I, the LORD your God, am a jealous God, punishing the children for the sin of the fathers to the third and fourth generation of those who hate me, but showing love to thousands who love me and keep my commandments.

"You shall not misuse the name of the LORD your God, for the LORD will not hold anyone guiltless who misuses his name.

"Remember the Sabbath day by keeping it holy. Six days you shall labor and do all your work, but the seventh day is a Sabbath to the LORD your God. On it you shall not do any work, neither you, nor your son or daughter, nor your manservant or maidservant, nor your animals, nor the alien within your gates....

"Honor your father and your mother, so that you may live long in the land the LORD your God is giving you.

"You shall not murder.

"You shall not commit adultery.

"You shall not steal.

"You shall not give false testimony against your neighbor.

"You shall not covet your neighbor's house. You shall not covet your neighbor's wife, or his manservant or maidservant, his ox or donkey, or anything that belongs to your neighbor."

Exodus 20:2-10, 12-

7 But that is precisely the code of law we have broken! What can we do?

Here is where the grace of God comes in. For in addition to giving us the law, which exposes our sin and shows us our deep need, God at the same time also pointed to the sacrifices by which sin might be punished and the guilt of sin be removed. At the very time God gave Moses to the people, God also gave them Aaron and the priests.

God showed how, when the people sinned, they were to take an animal and present it to the priest, who would then kill it and offer it up on the altar. It was a way of acknowledging the grim nature and dread consequences of sin—"The soul who sins... will die" (Ezek. 18:4b)—while, at the same time, it was also a way of portraying the grace of God, who was thereby shown willing to accept the death of an innocent substitute rather than requiring the sinner's own death and condemnation.

All this pointed forward to the atonement provided by Jesus Christ.

And remember that he did not take the law lightly! Philip E. Hughes writes:

Jesus when he came to save the world did not set aside the law: he fulfilled it—that is to say, he kept the law fully, without fault or lapse. In contrast to all other men, who are lawbreakers, he is the sole law-keeper. He alone is without sin (Heb. 4:15; 7:26; 1 Pet. 2:22). He alone is full of grace and truth (John 1:14; 14:6). He is Jesus Christ the righteous (1 John 2:1). This perfect obedience of Christ to the law is an essential element in the salvation which he came to procure for us.... The first stage of his work of salvation required that, as man, he should keep fully the law of God which mankind had broken. Only thus would he be qualified to offer himself, as the spotless Lamb of God (1 Peter 1:18-19), in sacrifice for man.

Which is precisely what he did! For, as Paul writes in Galatians, "But when the time had fully come, God sent his Son, born of a woman, born under law, to redeem those under law, that we might receive the full rights of sons" (Gal. 4:4-5). At the cross of Christ the law of God and the grace of God met, and each was fully satisfied.

God's grace saves us from the law's condemnation. And what is more, as we will see in our study of Romans 6 and 7, that same grace of God enables those who were once lawbreakers to become law-keepers. Both the law of God and the grace of God are magnified.

Chapter 74.
Abounding Grace

Romans 5:20

The second half of Romans 5:20 is one of the truly great verses of the Bible. Even in the midst of a book in which every sentence is splendid, Romans 5:20 stands out like a brilliant beacon on a dark and dangerous night. The dark background is sin and its horrible proliferation in the world. But the beacon flashes, "Where sin increased, grace increased all the more."

This sentence is so wonderful that it is difficult to do justice to it, especially in translation. In the New International Version the word increase is used twice: once of sin, which is said to have "increased," and once of grace, which is said to have "increased all the more." This is a reasonably accurate translation.

But it is weak, because Paul used two different Greek words for the two kinds of increase, and the strength of the verse is enhanced by the resulting contrast.

The Greek word that refers to the increase of sin is based on a term (polys) meaning "much" or "many." So the verb (pleonazō) has the idea of a numerical increase. The NIV translation of this first verb is not bad, since it means "to increase in number," "grow," or "multiply." The second word is different, however. It is the verb perisseuō, which means "to abound," "overflow," or "have more than enough." This verb does not have to do with numbers so much as with "excess." However, lest we miss the point, Paul adds the prefix hyper (we would say "super"), which gives the word the sense of "superabundance" or "abundant excess."

Most people probably know this verse best in the Kings James translation, which uses the idea of "abundance" for both parts of the comparison: "But where sin abounded, grace did much more abound." The New American Standard and the Revised Standard Bibles do better by using "increase" for the first part and "abound" for the second: "Where sin increased, grace abounded all the more."

But how about this? The New English Bible says, "Where sin was thus multiplied, grace immeasurably exceeded it."

Or this? J. B. Phillips paraphrases the verse, saying, "Though sin is shown to be wide and deep, thank God his grace is wider and deeper still."

Even this does not seem to satisfy the commentators, however. One of them suggests, "Where sin reached a high-water mark, grace completely flooded the world." Another says, "The idea is that of an overflowing, as if a mighty flood were let loose, sweeping everything before it. Indeed, we might well use the term 'engulfed'; such an abundance, such a superabundance that it drowns and engulfs everything."

What Paul says of grace in this verse prepares us for what he is going to say in the continuation of the sentence. In verse 21 he is going to show that although sin has triumphed over us, grace has now triumphed over sin and reigns victoriously.

John Bunyan's Text

Romans 5:20 is the text of John Bunyan, the English Puritan preacher who is best known as the author of The Pilgrim's Progress. But although that book reflects his spiritual experience, Bunyan's life and religious progress is spelled out best in his classic devotional autobiography, Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners. The title is taken from our verse and 1 Timothy 1:1316.

Bunyan was born in 1628. His parents were poor. His father was a traveling tinker, that is, a mender of pots and pans, and Bunyan practiced this trade for a time, as a result of which he was known as "the tinker of Bedford." He had little formal education, though he was an avid reader. In his youth he was quite profligate and in time became greatly troubled by an acute sense of personal sin. He wrote of himself in those days that it seemed "as if the sun that shineth in the heavens did grudge to give light, and as if the very stones in the street, and tiles upon the houses, did bend themselves against me; methought that they all combined together to banish me out of the world; I was abhorred of them, and unfit to dwell among them, or be partaker of their benefits, because I had sinned against the Savior."

God saved Bunyan and gave him great peace, and the title of his autobiography is testimony to what he discovered. He had learned that, no matter how great his sin was, the grace of God proved itself to be greater.

No Withholding of Grace

I want to make two points about this superabounding grace of God, and the first is this: Grace is not withheld because of sin. We need to understand this clearly, because in normal life you and I do not operate this way. If we are offended by someone, we tend to withdraw from that person and restrain any natural favor we might otherwise show. If someone offends us greatly, we find it hard even to be civil. God is not like this. On the contrary, where sin increases, grace superabounds.

What happened when Adam and Eve sinned? They feared that God would withdraw his grace, as he had every right to do. Although God had been good to them, they rebelled against his command concerning the forbidden tree, and God had said, "You must not eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, for when you eat of it you will surely die" (Gen. 2:17). When God came to them, calling in the garden, they hid in terror, thinking that the threatened judgment would now be fully executed. Instead, they found grace abundant.

Donald Grey Barnhouse has written:

Adam had not gone very far from the scene of his rebellion before the grace of God sought him, called him by name, pursued him in the obscurity of the grove where he was hiding.... God did not withhold his grace because of Adam's sin. Instead, he made great promises of grace, announcing that the Messiah would come, the Deliverer, the Seed of the woman, the Lord Jesus Christ, who would destroy the destroyer and bring man back into fellowship with himself. Although man... sought to cover his shame with fig leaves, God intervened in grace and clothed the guilty pair with coats of skins, in the very garden where they had rebelled. The first blood ever shed upon this planet was shed by God Almighty to provide covering for the man and woman who believed his word about the redemption that would be provided. Grace was not withheld because of sin; grace was given in spite of sin.

It was the same in the days of Moses, when the people had come to Mount Sinai and the law was being given. On the mountain God told Moses, "I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of Egypt, out of the land of slavery. You shall have no other gods before me" (Exod. 20:2-3).

But, while God was saying that, the people he had brought out of Egypt were breaking not only this command, but also all the other commands he was giving. They were taking his name in vain, dishonoring their fathers and mothers, committing adultery, stealing, bearing false witness, coveting, and other things besides.

Was this a barrier to God's grace? Barnhouse, from whom I am quoting freely, replies, "Not at all. On the very mount whence God looked down on the awful sin of this people, he gave the specifications for the tabernacle, altar, priesthood, and the method of approach that honored his holiness and was consistent with his justice. 'Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound.' Sin rolled as high as Mount Sinai; the grace of God rolled as high as heaven."

When we come to the New Testament, the same principle unfolds with ever-increasing splendor.
Peter denied his Lord, even with oaths and cursings. But Jesus did not condemn Peter. Instead, Jesus appeared to him personally following the resurrection (1 Cor. 15:5) and recommissioned Peter to service (John 21:15-19):

"Simon son of John, do you truly love me more than these?" asked Jesus.

"Yes, Lord, you know that I love you," Peter answered.

"Then you must feed my lambs and take care of my sheep," Jesus countered.

The same thing was true of Paul, the apostle used by God to give us the text we are studying here. Paul's testimony is nearly identical to Bunyan's, which is why Bunyan paraphrased Paul's words to describe his own experience. Paul told the Corinthians, "For I am the least of the apostles and do not even deserve to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God. But by the grace of God I am what I am, and his grace to me was not without effect. No, I worked harder than all of them—yet not I, but the grace of God that was with me" (1 Cor. 15:810).

Near the end of his life Paul wrote to his young co-worker Timothy:

Even though I was once a blasphemer and a persecutor and a violent man, I was shown mercy because I acted in ignorance and unbelief. The grace of our Lord was poured out on me abundantly [here he uses a combination of the two words found in Romans 5:20, the first of the two verbs plus the emphasizing prefix hyper, which is part of the second], along with the faith and love that are in Christ Jesus. Here is a trustworthy saying that deserves full acceptance: Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners—of whom I am the worst. But for that very reason I was shown mercy so that in me, the worst of sinners, Christ Jesus might display his unlimited patience as an example for those who would believe on him and receive eternal life.

1 Timothy 1:13-16

Now we come to you. Today most people have very little awareness of their sin, which shows how desperate their condition has become. But perhaps you are one who, like John Bunyan, is very conscious of your sinfulness. You may consider yourself to have forfeited all hope of salvation by some sinful action that rises up before you like a great concrete dam against grace. I do not know what that transgression is. It may be some gross sexual sin or adultery. Or it may be a perversion.

Perhaps you have stolen from your employer or your parents or someone else who is close to you.

Have you destroyed somebody's life work or reputation?

Committed murder?

Perhaps you remember a time in your life when you were so tyrannized by sin that you lashed out against God with blasphemies. Perhaps you cursed God. Perhaps you called down damnation on yourself. When you think back on those days—and they may not be long in the past—you shudder and tremble. You are sure you have passed beyond all bounds of hope, that you are destined to be lost eternally.

If you are such a person—fortunate at least in your knowledge of your sinfulness—then this text is a great cry of hope for you: "Where sin increased, grace increased all the more." Where sin multiplied, grace overflowed! No dam erected by sin can hold back the abundant flow of God's grace. Grace is never withheld because of sin—not Adam's sin, not the sin of the people at Sinai, not Peter's sin, not Paul's sin, not John Bunyan's sin—not your sin. Therefore, you may come to God through Jesus Christ. Right now. Regardless of what you have done, you can repent and find full forgiveness in Jesus.

Have you done that? If not, will you do it now? Paul said that even "God's kindness leads you toward repentance" (Rom. 2:4).

No Depletion of Grace

The second point I want to make about the superabounding grace of God is that God's grace is never reduced because of sin. There is an unlimited supply of grace available.

Some people mistakenly suppose that there is only so much grace to go around. They envision God as looking down on mankind and seeing a great variety of sinners in need of salvation. One man is fairly good, but he is not perfect. He can only be saved by grace, of course, so God dips into his bucket of grace and splashes out just enough for this man to find Christ and salvation.

Here is another person, a woman. She is not as "good" as the man. She needs more grace. Finally, here is a very terrible person. He has committed every sin in the book and is not the least bit inclined toward God or godliness. This man is also saved by grace, but it takes a lot of grace to save him. God has to scrape the very bottom of the bucket to get this vile profligate in.

All this is a gross misunderstanding. Grace is not something that is depleted as it covers our deficiencies. Furthermore, by grace God provides one hundred percent of what is necessary for the salvation of one hundred percent of the people he is saving. Grace is not doled out in proportion to our misdeeds. And God's superabundant supply never runs dry!

There is another error related to the first. Imagine a man who was once walking close to God but who fell into some great sin. I do not care what sin it was. It may have been Moses' sin, David's sin, your sin. Having fallen into sin, this man now thinks that he has forfeited something of God's grace. It is as if he had originally been given one hundred percent of God's grace but now supposes that he is slowly wasting away this treasury of grace by his major transgressions.

Do you ever find yourself thinking that? Are you thinking that now? That you were saved in the past and you were once a first-class Christian; but now, having sinned, you are condemned to be only a second-class or third-class Christian forever? Forget that idea. Your sin did not keep God's grace from flowing to you in full measure when you came to Christ. It will not keep grace from you now.

I do not mean to suggest even for a moment that God condones sin. God hates sin so much that he sent Jesus Christ to die to rescue men and women from its destructive rule and tyranny. He hates sin in you. He will continually work to remove it and give you victory over it. But the point I am making here is that God will never diminish his grace toward you because of your sin. In fact (Can I say it this way and not be misunderstood?), it is in your sin that you will most find grace to be abundant. The reason Paul was such a champion of grace was that he had been forgiven a great deal.

And do not think that you can fall from grace! I know that phrase is in the Bible. It is in Galatians 5:4, which in the New International Version is translated, "You have fallen away from grace." But let me tell you what that means. It does not mean, "You have lost your salvation." It means, "You have fallen into law as a way of living."

The Galatians had been taught the true gospel of salvation through faith in Jesus Christ, but they had been confused by Jewish legalists, who had been teaching that it was necessary for them to keep the law of Moses to be saved. Particularly, they had been insisting that Gentile believers must be circumcised. Paul's letter to the Galatian church was written to refute that heresy and encourage the Galatians to stand firm in the freedom Christ had purchased for them and not be entangled again in legal bondage. The related text says, "Mark my words! I, Paul, tell you that if you let yourselves be circumcised, Christ will be of no value to you at all. Again, I declare to every man who lets himself be circumcised that he is obligated to obey the whole law. You who are trying to be justified by law have been alienated from Christ; you have fallen away from grace" (Gal. 5:2-4).

What happens when you fall away from grace?

You do not lose your salvation. If you could, that sin of yours in falling from grace would diminish grace, and we have already seen that grace is neither withheld nor reduced because of sin. What happens is that you fall into law! You become a miserable legalist instead of a joyous thriving Christian.

But, even then, grace will still be working to deliver you from your bondage.

Grace to a Slave of Slaves

In the first volume of these studies, in a commentary on Romans 3:22-24, I told the story of John Newton, the "slave of slaves" who was miraculously delivered by God. I want to tell it again here, since we are dealing with the text that, of all texts in Scripture, most aptly describes Newton's experience.

Newton lived from 1725 to 1807. He was raised in a Christian home in which he was taught verses of the Bible. But his mother died when he was only six years old, and he was sent to live with a relative who hated the Bible and mocked Christianity. One day, at an early age, Newton went to sea as an apprenticed seaman. He was wild and dissolute in those years, as John Bunyan had been. He had the dubious reputation of being able to swear for two hours without repeating himself. At one point Newton was conscripted into the British Navy, but he deserted, was captured, and then beaten publicly as a punishment. Eventually he was released into the merchant marine and went to Africa. Why Africa?

In his memoirs he wrote that he went there for one reason only: "that I might sin my fill."

In Africa Newton fell in with a Portuguese slavetrader in whose home he was cruelly treated. This man often went away on slaving expeditions, and when he was gone the power in the home passed to the trader's African wife, the chief woman of his harem. This woman hated all white men, and she took out her hatred on Newton. For months he was forced to grovel in the dirt, eating his food from the ground like a dog and beaten unmercifully if he touched it with his hands. In time, thin and emaciated, Newton made his way to the sea, where he was picked up by a British ship on its way up the African coast to England.

When the captain of the ship learned that the young man knew something about navigation as a result of his time in the British Navy, he made him a ship's mate. Even then Newton fell into trouble. One day, when the captain was ashore, Newton broke out the ship's supply of rum and got the crew drunk. He was so drunk himself that when the captain returned and struck him on the head, Newton fell overboard and would have drowned if one of the sailors had not hauled him back on deck just in the nick of time.

Near the end of the voyage, as they were approaching Scotland, the ship ran into bad weather and was blown off course. Water poured in, and she began to sink. The young profligate was sent down into the hold to pump water. The storm lasted for days. Newton was terrified, sure that the ship would sink and he would drown. But, there in the hold of the ship, as he pumped water desperately for life, the God of grace—whom he had tried to forget but who had never forgotten him—brought to his mind Bible verses he had learned in his home as a child. The way of salvation opened up to him. He was born again and transformed. Later, when the storm had passed and he was again in England, Newton began to study theology and eventually became a distinguished preacher, first in a little town called Olney and later in London.

Of this storm, William Cowper, the British poet who became a personal friend of Newton and lived with him for many years, wrote:

God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform;
He plants his footsteps in the sea
And rides upon the storm.

And Newton, who became a poet as well as a preacher, declared:

Amazing grace—how sweet the sound—
That saved a wretch like me!
I once was lost, but now am found,
Was blind, but now I see.

Newton was a great preacher of grace, for he had learned on a very personal level that where sin increased, grace abounded all the more. He is an outstanding example of the truth that grace is neither withheld nor reduced because of sin. He is proof of the fact that God can save anybody.

Chapter 75.
God's Motives for Grace

Romans 5:20-21

There are many times in life when we examine another person's motives. And it is right that we should be acutely aware of them. A person can do something that turns out badly, but we may excuse the failure if his or her motivations were commendable. Or, by contrast, a person may do something good, but we will discount the apparently worthy act if, for example, it was done only to enhance the person's reputation or outdo someone else.

We have been talking about the grace of God for the past few studies, and probably at this point someone is beginning to ask about God's motives. We have seen that God operates by grace in saving men and women. If he did not, no one could be saved. But you may now want to ask whether the Bible reveals a reason for God's grace. Are there motives behind it? Why has God functioned in this manner?

Since these are valid questions, they might have occurred to anyone entirely "out of the blue," as we say. But even if they did not, they would certainly have been suggested by our text—for two reasons.

First, we have explored the contrast in verses 20 and 21 between the law of God and the grace of God. The first verse gives a motive for the entry of God's law, saying: "The law was added so that the trespass might increase...." When we studied that verse we saw what "increasing" the trespass meant: (1) the law increased sin by increasing our knowledge of it, that is, defining it for us, which is good; (2) the law increased sin by convicting us of sin, thus showing it to be an offense against God, which is also good for us to know; and (3) the law provoked even more sin in us, thereby uncovering sin's true nature. All this opened us up to grace. But if God's motives for giving the law are suggested and if the verse contains a contrast between the law and grace (as we have seen), what about the motivation underlying grace? The very fact that the first half of the contrast involves God's motives for the giving of the law causes us to look for his motives for the operation of grace also.

Then, too, the text itself encourages us to search for God's motives. The key word here is "so" or "so that," which occurs three times in verses 20 and 21. The first time is in reference to the law: "The law was added so that the trespass might increase." The second and third times are in reference to grace, in the first case comparing grace to sin (or law), and in the second case linking grace to its accomplishments. The sentence says: "Grace increased all the more, so that, just as sin reigned in death, so also grace might reign through righteousness to bring eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord."

The point is even clearer in the Greek text. For, after having stated in verse 20 that "grace superabounded," Paul writes the word hina, which means "in order that," thereby marking off what follows as an explanation of why God has been gracious.

In exploring this subject I have been helped by an excellent treatment of "God's Motives for Grace" by Donald Grey Barnhouse. It is a chapter in his multi-volume study of the Book of Romans. Barnhouse lists five motives for grace, and I want to follow his outline in this study.

To Do Us Good

The first motive for the superabounding grace of God is stated in our text, which says that God acted in grace in order "to bring eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." This refers to all redeemed men and women, and it is a statement that one reason why God acts in grace, an initial reason, is that he might do us good.

Here is another verse that says exactly the same thing in Jesus' own words. You know it well: John 3:16—"For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life." Like Romans 5:21, John 3:16 also has a purpose clause introduced by the important Greek word hina. But in John 3:16 the purpose for grace is expressed both negatively and positively. The negative statement is that we "shall not perish." The positive statement is that we "have eternal life." Some people have considered a motivation like this to be unworthy of God, as if the only reason for grace is that Christians might escape hell's fires. If that were all there were to grace, there might be some point to the objection. Nevertheless, the desire of God to do us good is not unworthy of being mentioned, even by itself. For it means that God is good. Remember that: God is good! That is wonderful, is it not? It is something we should converse about and even shout about, because if God were not good, there would be no hope for any of us.

Barnhouse comments rightly: "The sinner who comes to Christ discovers this motive for grace. He can say: God does not want me to perish; God wants me to have everlasting life. God has done something about it.... How wonderful to me that God did not want me to perish! For I deserve to perish. How wonderful that God wanted me to have eternal life, for I deserve death."

To Enable Us to Do Good

The second motive for grace flows from the first, for if God is gracious to us because he is good, it is natural that he acts also in grace so that we, in our turn, might do good. The key text is Ephesians 2:8-10: "For it is by grace you have been saved, through faith—and this not from yourselves, it is the gift of God—not by works, so that no one can boast. For we are God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus to do good works, which God prepared in advance for us to do."

It has been pointed out by more than one commentator that there is a striking repetition of the word works in verses 9 and 10. The first mention of works is negative. It tells us that because we have been saved by grace through faith, we are not saved "by works." Otherwise, it would be possible for a person who was saved "by works" to boast over another person who did not do these works and therefore was not saved. There would be boasting on earth and in heaven. But verse 9 utterly repudiates works as contributing to justification in any way. If we imagine that our good works have anything to do with our justification, we are not justified. We are still in our sins and therefore not saved.

On the other hand, no sooner has Paul emphatically repudiated works as having anything to do with the Christian's justification than he brings works in again, saying that God has created us precisely "to do good works." This is said in such strong language—"good works, which God prepared in advance for us to do"—that we are correct in saying that if there are no good works, the person involved is not justified.

This may sound confusing to some. But the problem vanishes as soon as we realize that the "good works" Christians are called upon to do are the result of God's prior working in them. It is why, in verse 10, Paul prefaces his demand for good works by the statement "we are God's workmanship" and why, in his letter to the Philippians, he says in a similar vein, "Therefore, my dear friends... continue to work out your salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God who works in you to will and to act according to his good pleasure" (Phil. 2:12-13).

Let me say this another way. One reason why God has saved us by grace regardless of any merit on our part is that we might be enabled to be gracious to others regardless of any merit on their part. In other words, we are to do good to others as God has done good to us.

This is important, because it is only through such an altruistic and unselfish approach to benevolence that any uniquely original and compelling good works are done. What is wrong with so much of the "good works" of this world is that they are done for selfish reasons, for what the "do-gooders" can get out of it themselves. For example, a man will be helpful to those who can advance him up the career ladder or improve his social status, or a woman will be charitable because this will enhance her reputation. It is obvious that such "good works" do nothing to advance true goodness. What really advances goodness is when someone does good simply to do it—out of love for others—with no hidden, self-serving motive, such as getting something for oneself.

That is what God does in salvation, of course. And that is why those who have learned from God can actually be agents for good in this world.

To Make God's Wisdom Known

A third motive for God's grace is stated in another important verse in Ephesians. Paul has been speaking in Ephesians 3 of the way in which God has saved men and women from all walks of life and ethnic backgrounds and has brought them together into one new body, which is the church, thereby overcoming the formidable natural barriers that formerly existed. He then says of God, "His intent was that now, through the church, the manifold wisdom of God should be made known to the rulers and authorities in the heavenly realms" (v. 10). The "rulers and authorities in the heavenly realms" are the fallen angels. So the text means that one of the motives for grace was to reveal the wisdom of God to these beings. This raises the subject of God's motivation to the cosmic level, beyond the merely human level.

How does this principle operate?

Barnhouse writes:

When Lucifer and the angels were created, power was given to them on various levels. Lucifer became Satan, and many of the angelic beings—the principalities and powers—followed him in his rebellion. They thought they had sufficient wisdom to govern, and to carry on the administration of creation without recourse to the authority and wisdom of God. The universe was engulfed, chaos came into the world, and sin's erosion became manifest to the uttermost part of creation. In the fullness of time, God revealed his plan of salvation. Christ would go down, down to the cross. Because of his death a great number of sinners would be called out of the world and form the true Church—the organism, not the organization. God would then exhibit these believers before the hosts of Satan as a demonstration of the true method of government and administration. Instead of seeking exaltation within themselves, all who have been redeemed recognize that there is no power within themselves. All that they accomplish is through total reliance upon the wisdom and power of God. Thus, in the very place where powerful and wise beings rebelled in their imagined self-sufficiency, God took from men, greatly inferior to angels, a company which accomplishes what the latter could never accomplish.

The fallen angels sought to accomplish all by independence; we accomplish by total dependence.
They followed Lucifer who said, "I will ascend... I will exalt my throne... I will be like the most High" (Isa. 14:14). We follow the Lord Jesus Christ, "who, though he was in the form of God did not count equality with God a thing to be grasped, but emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being born in the likeness of men. And being found in human form he humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even the death on a cross" (Phil. 2:6-8).

There is a wisdom here that the world will never understand. For the world says, "You've got to look out for number one" and "The devil take the hindmost." Yet, the way of the cross, not the way of self-seeking or self-advancement, is what overcomes evil and leads to true happiness.

His Body: The Fullness of Christ

The fourth motive for the superabounding grace of God in salvation is found in Ephesians 1:23, with its startling revelation of the church as "the fullness of him who fills everything in every way."

This is a difficult phrase to interpret, because it can be taken in three ways. First, it can be taken, not as a description of the church, but as a description of Christ, so that it would read: "[the church] which is the body of him [that is, Christ] who is the fullness of him [that is, God]] who fills all in all." This is appealing to many interpreters since the Bible elsewhere speaks of God as filling all things (Jer. 23:24) and asserts that the fullness of the Godhead does indeed dwell in Christ (Col. 1:19). On the other hand, this strength is also a weakness, since the Bible does not say anywhere that Christ is God's fullness. Besides, this interpretation just does not seem to be what the verse is talking about.

Second, it can be taken as referring to the church as that which somehow fills or completes Christ. Barnhouse holds to this view, illustrating it by the way a princess of relatively humble origins might be said to complete the glory of a great king, should he choose to marry her. John Calvin held to this interpretation, too, writing that "our Lord Jesus Christ, and even God his Father, account themselves imperfect unless we are joined to him." D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones holds it in a guarded fashion.

Third, the phrase can be taken in a passive sense, that is, of the church as that which Christ fills. This is the view of John Stott, who considers it far more natural to say that Christ fills the church, just as he also fills the entire universe, than to say (unnaturally, Stott thinks) that the church somehow fills or completes Jesus.

I think Stott is right in holding to the third of these positions. But I also realize that the difference between the third and the second is quite slight. Moreover, it is true beyond doubt that something of the splendors of Christ are to be seen only in his people, as they live for him and serve him— something of Christ that in any given historical situation would be seen in no other way. Just before his crucifixion Jesus prayed to the Father for those he was leaving behind, saying, "Glory has come to me through them" and "I have given them the glory that you gave me, that they may be one as we are one. I in them and you in me. May they be brought to complete unity to let the world know that you sent me and have loved them even as you have loved me" (John 17:10b, 2223).

The point is that God has saved us by grace so that something of the nature of Christ, and even of the Godhead, might be seen in believers by the world outside. We might say that the chief place where the superabounding grace of God is to be manifested is in the saints.

To Exhibit God's Grace Eternally

The fifth motive for the salvational grace of God is "in order that in the coming ages he [that is,

God] might show the incomparable riches of his grace, expressed in his kindness to us in Christ Jesus" (Eph. 2:7). This text brings us back to Romans, for the exhibit of grace in believers is one of the elements involved in the "reign" of grace, which Romans 5:21 speaks of. We will be looking at this more closely in the next study.

Lewis Sperry Chafer has some thoughts on this motive in his book Grace, where he calls it the "greatest" of God's motives. He writes:

God's supreme motive is nothing less than his purpose to demonstrate before all intelligences— principalities and powers, celestial beings and terrestrial beings—the exceeding riches of his grace. This God will do by means of that gracious thing which he does through Christ Jesus. All intelligences will know the depth of sin and the hopeless estate of the lost. They will, in turn, behold men redeemed and saved from that estate appearing in the highest glory—like Christ. This transformation will measure and demonstrate the "exceeding riches of his grace."

The supreme purpose of God is to be realized through the salvation of men by grace alone. So fully does that supreme purpose now dominate the divine undertakings in the universe that everything in heaven and in the earth is contributing solely to the one end. To gain the realization of this supreme purpose, this age, which continues from the death of Christ to his coming again, was ushered in. These long centuries of human struggle were decreed for this one purpose. No vision which is less than this will prove sufficient. Men with blinded eyes do not see afar off. To such the world is moving on by mere chance, or to the supposed consummation of some human glory on earth. Eyes thus blinded see naught of the glory of heaven; minds thus darkened understand nothing of the supreme purpose of God in the demonstration of the exceeding riches of his grace. But when this age is consummated, it will be clearly seen by all beings in heaven and in the earth that these centuries of the on-moving universe have been designed for no other reason than the realization of the supreme purpose of God in the salvation of men by grace alone.

We speak often of a Christian world-view, but nearly as often we also fail to define it. Well, here is a Christian world-view that is very well defined: namely, that history is the field upon which the manifold grace of God in the salvation of sinners is displayed.

I have sometimes compared history to a play, the title of which is "God's Grace." The angels are the audience. We are the actors. Satan is there to do everything he can think of to resist God's purposes and discredit his grace. This drama has unfolded across the centuries, and in its early acts has starred such leading characters as Adam and Eve, Noah, Abraham, Moses, David, Isaiah, John the Baptist, Peter, Paul, and the other dramatis personae of the Old and New Testaments and church history. There have been dominant players and minor walk-ons, strong persons and weaklings, but each has been brought onto the stage to speak the words God has written and all have contributed to the movement of the drama.

You and I are now the actors in this long-running play. Satan is attacking, and the angels are all straining forward to look on. Are they seeing the "manifold wisdom" of God in you as you go through your part and speak your lines? What kind of contribution does your life make to the drama known as "God's Grace"?

At the end of Barnhouse's study, to which I have referred several times, this great champion of grace wrote:

I have no doubt that in the ages to come—what we might call billions of years from now—there will be angels who will look at you and me with awe and wonder, and say to each other, "There are two of the saints! They were on earth in the times of the rebellion. They were dead in trespasses and sin. They were ungodly sinners, the enemies of God. But he loved them when they were like that. Think of that! How marvelous is his love! How great his condescension! How free his grace! He did all that for them!"

And we will say to those angels: "You were right in giving all glory to him. He is the wonderful one. He is the gracious one. There is none like unto him." And amid all the ceaseless activities of heaven, while we are associated with him as the queen is with the king, we shall ever point to him as the source of all grace, and be, in ourselves, the exhibit of the exceeding riches of his grace.

Chapter 76.
The Reign of Grace

Romans 5:20-21

At the end of the last study I used the illustration of a play to show how God is exhibiting his grace in history and how you and I have been given important acting roles in that drama. I called the play "God's Grace."

The drama analogy is a good one, of course (or I would not have used it). But all such illustrations have a downhill side, and the downside of this one is that someone may think the theme is not a serious matter—just because I have called this a play. "After all," such a person might argue, "a play is just make-believe. It might be interesting, informative, even entertaining for a while. But nobody takes a play too seriously; after it is over, we all have to get back into the real world." If you found yourself thinking that way as a result of the last study, I want you to pay particular attention to this one. Because here I want to explore Paul's own illustration of what grace is about and show that the drama of "God's Grace"—Paul would call it "The Reign of Grace"—is as serious as it is real.

Rival Kingdoms

The illustration Paul uses is of two rival kingdoms, and the way he gets into his illustration is by personifying the power of sin, on the one hand, and the power of grace, on the other. He compares these powers to two monarchs, two kings, if you will. The one king is a despot. He has invaded our world and has established ruthless control over all men and women. The end of this king's rule is death, for all persons. This king's name is Sin. The other king is a gracious ruler. He has come to save us from sin and bring us into a realm of eternal happiness. The end of this king's rule is eternal life. His name is Grace.

This illustration tells us something about grace that we have not yet adequately considered. It tells us that grace is a power. We tend to think of grace as an attitude; and, of course, it is that. We even define it that way. We call grace "God's unmerited favor toward the undeserving," in fact, toward those who deserve the precise opposite. But grace is more than an attitude. It is also a power that reaches out to save those who, apart from the power of grace, would perish.

This means that grace is more than an offer of help. It is even more than help itself. To use the illustration of the two rival kingdoms, it would be possible to say that grace is an invasion by a good and legitimate king of territory that has been usurped by another. The battle is not always visible, because this is a matter of spiritual and not physical warfare. But the attack is every bit as massive and decisive as the invasion of the beaches of Normandy by the Allied Forces at the turning point of the Second World War. The Allies threw their maximum combined weight into that encounter and won the day. In a similar way, God has thrown his weight behind grace, and grace will triumph.

The Kingdom of Grace

All earthly kingdoms have a beginning, perhaps a military victory that brings a new monarch to the throne, perhaps a peaceful succession in which a new and particularly able ruler takes over a government and begins a new era of influence and prosperity, perhaps an election of an outstanding ruler in a democratic land.

What was the origin of the kingdom of grace about which Paul is writing? When was it inaugurated?

The answer, to use the classic phrase of the apostle Peter, is "before the creation of the world" (1 Peter 1:20). In that verse Peter is referring to the decision made in the eternal counsels of the Godhead in eternity past to send God's Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, to be our Redeemer.

Theologians call this the Covenant of Redemption, and it took place before sin entered the world. In fact, it took place even before the world was created.

In that eternal covenant between the persons of the Godhead, God the Father said, "I want to demonstrate the nature and power of my grace before the hosts of heaven. To do that I am going to create a world of creatures to be known as men and women. I am going to allow them to fall into sin. I am going to allow sin to reign over them, enslaving them by its power and leading them at last to physical and spiritual death. But when sin has done its worst and the condition of the race seems most hopeless, I will send a heavenly being of infinite grace and power to rescue them and effect a new kingdom of love. Who will go for us? Who will accomplish the salvation of this yet-to-be-created race?"

The Lord Jesus Christ responded, "Here am I; send me. I will do what needs to be done. I will take the form of one of these creatures, thereby becoming man as well as God. I will die for them. I will die in their place, the innocent for the guilty, God for man. I will bear the punishment of their transgressions. Then, when I have paid the penalty for their sin so that they will never have to suffer for it, I will rise from the dead and be for them an ever-reigning and ever-gracious Lord."

So a covenant was enacted to establish a kingdom of grace, in which Jesus would die for a people whom God would give to him.

The Holy Spirit, who was also present at the inauguration of this kingdom, covenanted to lead those whom God had first chosen for this kingdom to faith in the crucified and risen Lord, by which alone they could enter it.

The Growth of God's Kingdom

Every earthly kingdom has a period of growth in which, the reign of the new monarch having been declared, territory is conquered and those who are to be part of the kingdom are drawn into it. There is also a parallel here to God's kingdom.

1. The announcement of the kingdom. God wasted no time in announcing the kingdom of grace. On the same day that Adam and Eve sinned, thus welcoming the contrary reign of sin and death into the world, God appeared in the Garden of Eden to foretell the coming of his Son. The words were spoken to Satan, who had been instrumental in our first parents' fall: "And I will put enmity between you and the woman, and between your offspring and hers; he will crush your head, and you will strike his heel" (Gen. 3:15). This was a prophecy of the incarnation of Jesus Christ and the atonement, and although Adam and Eve did not understand it fully, they understood enough of it to believe God and look for the coming of the Redeemer. As a result, they became the first citizens of the kingdom. They were saved by God's grace.

2. The preparation for the kingdom. The Old Testament records a long period of preparation for the new king's coming, and again the God of all grace was doing it. God established a godly line in the midst of the world's ungodliness, a line in which his name was remembered and faith in the coming Redeemer was kept alive. Seth, the third son of Adam and Eve who replaced godly Abel after Cain had killed him, was the first of this new line. From Seth came the line of the godly antediluvians, including such persons as Enoch, who "walked with God," and Noah, who received grace at the time of the great flood. Later Abraham was chosen, and from Abraham came Isaac, Jacob, and Jacob's sons, the twelve patriarchs of Israel. There were priests like Aaron, prophets like Isaiah and Jeremiah, and godly kings like David. On the eve of the birth of Jesus, there were people like Zechariah and Elizabeth, Joseph and Mary, Simeon and Anna, and others, all of whom looked forward to Christ's coming.

"These were all commended for their faith, yet none of them received what had been promised" (Heb. 11:39). They were saved by grace. They were part of the preparation for God's kingdom. But "The true light that gives light to every man was [only then] coming into the world" (John 1:9).

3. The atonement. The death of the Lord Jesus Christ for sin is the very basis and center of God's kingdom. So we are not surprised to find Paul thinking of this specifically as he unfolds his illustration, saying that grace reigns "through righteousness to bring eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. 5:21).

His words remind us that grace does not mean the setting aside of God's law or the waiving of justice, as if God were saying, "Well, you have been bad, but it does not matter; I forgive you." Sin does matter. Sin is a terrible thing. It leads to death, death in this life (life without righteousness is "a living hell," as we say) and death in the age to come. God does not overlook sin. He deals with sin. Christ dies for it, and God counts Christ's divine and utterly perfect righteousness as ours. This is what Paul has been writing the entire Book of Romans to explain. It is what chapter 3 is particularly about. It is the doctrine with which he now ends chapter 5.

Do you want to see the nature of the kingdom of grace? There is no place you will see it better than at Christ's cross. There, grace and righteousness come together. Each is satisfied. It is by the death of Jesus that eternal life is "poured out for many" (cf. Matt. 26:28).

4. The citizens of the kingdom. It takes more than territory to make a kingdom. No one has ever gotten very excited over a king who ruled nothing but a desert. A kingdom requires subjects. Therefore, God is in the business of providing subjects for this kingdom. How? Theologians speak of the ordo salutis or the "order of salvation." It refers to the steps God takes to bring individuals into the kingdom of his Son.

First, there is foreknowledge. It means that God takes saving notice of them and sets his favor on them.

Second, there is predestination or election. This means that, in the eternal counsels of his will, God has determined to save them by bringing them to Christ.

Third, there is effectual calling. This is the call of the gospel, which is not merely general but which actually produces a proper, believing response in those who hear it. It is like the calling of Lazarus, which brought him from death back into life.

The fourth step is regeneration. This is a spiritual quickening or making alive. Everything that becomes good in us, including each of the next two items, flows from it.

The fifth step is repentance and faith. We turn from sin and believe on Jesus because we have been made alive.

Sixth, justification. This is the act by which God reckons our sin to be punished in Christ and Christ's righteousness to be ours.

Seventh, sanctification. The new life of Christ within the believer works itself out in an increasing growth of holiness and good works.

The final step is our glorification, in which we are made into the image of Jesus Christ, without sin, forever.

No more glorious unfolding of the kingdom of grace toward individuals can be imagined. For it is the power of God, providing for and then actually saving those who apart from it would certainly be lost. If grace were only a handout or an offer to help, we would perish. The only reason any of us are saved is that grace first provides the way of salvation and then actually reaches out to turn us from sin, quicken us, and draw us to salvation.

A Bountiful Kingdom

Much of what I have written already speaks to the nature of the reign of grace. But it is worth looking at this in detail, since we know that some of this world's kingdoms, though beneficial, are nevertheless hard to live with. We have looked at the inauguration of God's kingdom and the unfolding of it in history. What can we say about the nature of the reign of God's grace?

1. Grace is bountiful. The first thing we can say is that the reign of grace is bountiful. I mean by this that it is overflowing with benefits. We can think of a kingdom as "good" though it is nevertheless a very stringent one. For example, following a war, a good kingdom might make hard demands on its people and even require them to live without what we would think of as necessities. Of course, God does demand obedience, and in the Christian life sacrifice is required. But when we think of the reign of grace, we usually do not consider it in terms of sacrifice and denial so much as fullness of life and provision. The reign of grace is not something that any of the children of grace find odious.

In preparing for this sermon I read through dozens of studies of this text (there are many such studies, since commentators seem naturally to have been attracted to it), and I found many memorable statements. But among them is one from D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones that I think is so ontarget that I want to repeat it more than once. I even suggest you memorize it. It is this: "Grace always gives, whereas sin always takes away." Let me say that again: "Grace always gives, whereas sin always takes away."

Sin—the despotic king—says the opposite. He tells us that he will give us all we have ever wanted, and that grace is the way of deprivation. Sin says, "Look at those Christians; they never have any fun!" Or, "Look at all the things they can't do." So, like the Prodigal, we listen to the bad king, take our inheritance and journey into a far country where we do not have to listen to the good king's voice or respond to the Father's wise will. What do we do there? You know the answer. We spend our assets on wild living. Because we waste our inheritance, when we come to the end of our days it is all gone. Sin has taken it all, and we find, as the Prodigal did, that no one will give us anything. In the end, when we look to the tyrant named Sin, whom we have followed, and ask for his help, Sin laughs at us as he reaches out to snatch away even life itself.

Follow sin, and sin will rob you of your innocence and character.

Follow sin, and sin will wither away your health.

Follow sin, and sin will turn to ashes even the common, precious things of life—things like friendship, love, laughter, the innocence of children, hope, and contentment.

Follow sin, and sin will usher you to damnation and smirk as you stagger through the door.

How different is the king whose name is Grace! Grace sees us staggering and comes alongside to help us and bear us up. Grace sees us destitute and pours the inexhaustible riches of Christ and the Father into our laps. Grace sees us dying and imparts eternal life. The Bible says through Paul that "the wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. 6:23).

Grace says, "What do you need? Tell me. Tell me anything at all." And then grace provides that need in accord with God's perfect wisdom, invincible power, and unlimited supply. It is because of grace that the author of Hebrews urges: "Let us then approach the throne of grace with confidence, so that we may receive mercy and find grace to help us in our time of need" (Heb. 4:16).

2. Grace is invincible. In this life it is not always true that the good triumph and the evil are defeated. Looking at this life, we might ask, "Can anything as good as grace really triumph in the end? To be sure, grace offers everything. But how can we know that in the end sin will not somehow still be there to assert its rule and snatch God's bountiful gifts from our hands?"

Ah, but that would be possible only if we were speaking of grace in human terms. If it were only my grace or your grace that we are talking about, sin would snatch our good gifts away. We could not stand against this powerful adversary. But it is not my grace or your grace that is reigning. It is the grace of God, and God is the Almighty One. Who or what can stand against God or his purposes? Paul writes in Romans 8:31-39:

... If God is for us, who can be against us? He who did not spare his own Son, but gave him up for us all—how will he not also, along with him, graciously give us all things? Who will bring any charge against those whom God has chosen? It is God who justifies. Who is he that condemns? Christ Jesus, who died—more than that, who was raised to life—is at the right hand of God and is also interceding for us. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall trouble or hardship or persecution or famine or nakedness or danger or sword? As it is written:

> "For your sake we face death all day long; we are considered as sheep to be slaughtered."

No, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him who loves us. For I am convinced that neither death nor life, neither angels nor demons, neither the present nor the future, nor any powers, neither height nor depth, nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

This brings us back to the first study in this volume, where I pointed out that all of Romans 5
(indeed, all of chapters 5-8) is designed to assure us of salvation. We can be assured of salvation because, through Christ, we have gained permanent access by faith "into this grace in which we now stand" (Rom. 5:2).

Here are two hymns for us to think of as we end these six studies of God's grace. The first is by Augustus M. Toplady, who is also the author of the well-known hymn "Rock of Ages." The hymn I cite here is "A Debtor to Mercy Alone," and I refer to it because of the word indelible, which occurs in the third and final verse. It goes:

My name from the palms of his hands
Eternity will not erase;
Impressed on his heart it remains,
In marks of indelible grace.
Yes, I to the end shall endure,
As sure as the earnest is given;

More happy, but not more secure,
The glorified spirits in heaven.

Nothing can erase that which is indelible. So, if grace is written out in indelible characters, it is forever and ever. For the reign of grace there is no defeat, and there can be no end.

The other hymn is by Charles Wesley, and I would imagine every English-speaking Christian in the world has heard and probably also sung it:

O for a thousand tongues to sing
My great Redeemer's praise,
The glories of my God and King,
The triumphs of his grace!

There are no triumphs anywhere like those triumphs. There are none so happy or so certain. Let grace triumph in you. Yield to it. Yield to the grace of God in Christ. Open your arms to grace, and let grace draw you to the winning side.

Chapter 77.
Where Do We Go from Here?

Romans 6:1-2

The week before I was to start preaching in Philadelphia on Romans 6, I was at a Bible college for some meetings and mentioned my upcoming series to one of the school's professors. His reply was instantaneous: "Ah, that is a good Baptist chapter for a Presbyterian." The comment took me entirely off guard, because the chapter has nothing whatever to do with baptism, as I understand it. In fact, the only reason I can think of that this professor might have said what he did is that Paul uses the illustration of baptism in verses 3 and 4 to reinforce his earlier point about our being united to Jesus Christ by God's grace.

Actually, the sixth chapter of Romans is a parenthesis dealing with the first and most logical objection that anyone might bring against the gospel, namely, that it leads to Antinomianism or sinful conduct.

Two Parentheses

But let me back up a moment. I have called Romans 6 a parenthesis, following the approach to Romans 5-8 by the English preacher D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones. But that arrangement is not universally accepted, and I need to explain this position.

You will recall that when we began chapter 5, I pointed out that I was departing from the most common outline of Romans, according to which these chapters (and especially chapter 6) deal with sanctification. In the traditional division of Romans, chapters 1-4 deal with justification, chapters 5-8 with sanctification, chapters 9-11 with the problem of Israel, and chapters 12-16 with practical matters. There is some truth to this arrangement, of course. The first chapters obviously do present the great doctrine of justification. The next section does touch on sanctification, the next mentions the Jews, and so on. But, as I pointed out in the first study in this volume, to approach Romans as if it were arranged in four segregated compartments is to misunderstand it completely. And, of course, an error in the overall analysis will lead to errors in handling the parts, which is particularly the case here.

What did we see when we began Romans 5? Some people have approached the chapter as if it is listing the results of justification, a sort of wrap-up of the previous chapters, after which the author supposedly launches into his second important theme, which is sanctification. But we saw that this is not the case at all.

What Paul is concerned to show in chapter 5 is that our justification is permanent. In other words, his concern is not with the results of justification, though some of these results are mentioned, but with the assurance of it. That is why he writes at the start of the chapter that "we rejoice in the hope of the glory of God" (v. 2). Those words are a reference to the Christian's glorification, the ultimate and inevitable outcome of God's work in him or her. It is also why, a few verses further on, we find Paul saying, "Since we have now been justified by his blood, how much more shall we be saved from God's wrath through him!" (v. 9). These words anticipate the triumphant note on which the eighth chapter ends: "... If God is for us, who can be against us? He who did not spare his own Son, but gave him up for us all—how will he not also, along with him, graciously give us all things?" (Rom. 8:31-32).

In Romans 5, as well as in Romans 8, the apostle passes directly from justification to glorification, not because he is unaware that sanctification fits into the middle of that sequence, but because he wants to stress the permanent nature of our justification: "And those he predestined, he also called; those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified" (Rom. 8:30).

Since I have not explicitly made this point before, let me also point out that this is the direction the second half of Romans 5 has been heading. Verses 12-21 deal with the Christian's union with Jesus Christ, showing that just as we were united to Adam, so that his fall became our fall and we were condemned in him, so also have Christians now become united to Jesus Christ, so that his death for sin became our death to it and his triumph ours. This, too, is permanent. So when Paul gets to the end of the chapter and speaks of the "reign" of grace "through righteousness to bring eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord," his point is that nothing is going to defeat God's great plan for us. In terms of the overflow of thought, what follows immediately after chapter 5 is chapter 8.

But if that is so, if these middle chapters of Romans are dealing chiefly with assurance, why are chapters 6 and 7 here at all? Or to put it another way, since I have called chapter 6 a parenthesis, why does Paul interrupt the flow of the letter at this point?

The answer lies in what he said in chapter 5. In verse 20 he said that the law of God was given "so that the trespass might increase." Then, in verse 21, he spoke of the triumph of God's grace in us. Anyone who has been thinking carefully about these things will see immediately that this introduces two problems. First, if grace is destined to triumph in us, as Paul says it is, doesn't this inevitably lead to loose living? In fact, doesn't this even suggest that we should sin more so that grace might have even more space in which to be triumphant? That can't be right. But since it seems to follow from Paul's teaching, doesn't it discredit Paul's doctrine? The second problem concerns the law. In verses 12-21 Paul passed quickly from Adam to Jesus Christ. But everyone knows that between those two great historical events the law was given to Israel. The law must have had a purpose, or God would not have given it. But how can that be fit into Paul's teaching? If you retain the law, you destroy the gospel of salvation by the grace of God through Jesus Christ. But if, on the other hand, you retain the gospel, the law is superfluous.

These are valid questions. Rather than ignore them and pass on directly to what he says in chapter 8, the apostle stops at this point and answers them. He deals with the problem of Antinomianism in chapter 6 and with the problem of the law in chapter 7.

A Rational Objection

As we begin Romans 6, we see at once that we are not entering upon a radically new section, as if here for the first time Paul begins to address the problem of the Christian's sanctification. This is because the chapter begins with a question that immediately turns us back to chapter 5. "What shall we say, then?" Paul asks.

"Say about what?" we reply.

Obviously, about what he has just said in Romans 5: "... where sin increased, grace increased all the more, so that, just as sin reigned in death, so also grace might reign through righteousness to bring eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord" (vv. 20-21). In other words, where does the doctrine of the triumph of God's grace lead us? There are two possibilities. On the one hand, it could lead to sinful conduct, the antinomian objection. If sin is going to be conquered by grace, let us keep sinning. Sin doesn't matter. On the other hand, the triumph of grace could lead to righteousness, the position that Paul will actually uphold.

In one way or another, the entire sixth chapter is going to be an answer to this question. But before we launch into it, we need to take time to feel the full force of the objector's argument. I want you to see three things about it.

1. It is logical. I mean by this that it is a reasonable question to ask after one has understood the true gospel. The gospel is one of salvation by grace apart from human works. If that is so, if works are not the basis of our salvation, why do we have to worry about works at all? Shouldn't we just go on sinning?

The presence of this question is in one sense a test of whether or not one's gospel really is Pauline. Most religious teaching is not. Most religions tell you that in order to get to heaven what you must do is stop sinning and do good works, that you will be saved if you do this well enough and long enough. If a person is preaching along those lines, it is inconceivable that anyone would ever ask him, "Shall we go on sinning so that grace may increase?" Such a teacher is not talking about grace but about works, and his whole point is that salvation comes by doing lots of them. To "go on sinning" is the exact opposite of his doctrine. Nobody ever raises that question to one who is teaching works-righteousness.

But if one teaches, as Paul did, that a person is saved by grace apart from works, the objection we are looking at is the first thing that comes to mind. It is the argument religious people raised with Martin Luther. It was the question repeatedly thrown up to George Whitefield. Ray Stedman suggests, "There is something about the grace of God and the glory of the good news that immediately raises this issue."

2. It is natural. Stedman also talks about this point, saying that "sin is fun" and that "we like to do it." That may be too strong when we are talking about Christians, since a reaction against sin as well as an attraction to it will be present. But the point is well taken, at least in the sense that our "flesh"—or "sinful nature," to use Paul's own term (cf. Rom. 7:5, 18, 25)—inclines to sin naturally. To put this another way: As far as our old nature is concerned, righteousness calls us to an unnatural path, the path of self-denial and cross bearing (cf. Luke 9:23).

3. It is pious. When I say that the objection that Paul's gospel leads to sin is "pious," I mean that it only occurs within a religious setting and among those who are at least somewhat concerned with being righteous. That is why it was it was such a major problem among the Jews.

In 1 Corinthians 1:23, Paul wrote of the gospel being "a stumbling block to Jews and foolishness to Gentiles." It was foolish to Gentiles, because it ran counter to their philosophy. They could not see how God could become man, since in their mind "spirit" was good while "flesh" was evil and, for God to become man, the "good" (God) would have to take on "sin" or in some way become "evil." Again, the Gentiles could not see how Jesus could be a Savior of others when, on the cross, he could not even save himself. These were their problems with the gospel. With the Jews it was different. The Jews had the law, and their religion was chiefly concerned with right conduct. Therefore, when Paul came along teaching that salvation could not be achieved by moral living but had to be a gift of God apart from good works, the Jews naturally saw this as an attack on practical righteousness and objected to it. It was their very religiosity that acted as a "stumbling block."

If you do not see or care about the problem Paul raises at the start of Romans 6, you are obviously missing something. Either: (1) you have not yet understood the gospel; (2) you are blind to your own sinful inclinations; or (3) you are not really concerned about religion. On the other hand, if any of these things are true of you, you will not only see the problem but will be troubled by it.

An Unthinkable Position

And yet, you should not be troubled long. This is because, as soon as we begin to explore this problem, as Paul does in Romans 6, we see that the inference that Christians should "go on sinning" is unthinkable.

Paul's response, after he has asked the question, "Shall we go on sinning so that grace may increase?" is, "By no means!" (v. 2). This expression has already occurred in a similar exchange in chapter 3, and it is a powerful one. The Greek words (mē genoito) literally mean "let it not be," and they have the force of a powerful negation. They actually mean, "It is inconceivable for it to be thus" or "It is unthinkable,"—"It should not even be considered." Some translators render the expression, "God forbid!"

Why is it unthinkable? "In fact," someone might ask, "isn't it even contradictory to suggest this? You have just said that the question posed in verse 1 is logical. You have admitted that it is both natural and pious. How then can you say that it should not even be considered?"

The answer, of course, is that although the objection is logical, natural, and pious on the superficial level to one who is newly hearing the gospel of salvation through faith by the grace of God, it is seen to be completely untenable as soon as one probes further. In fact, one does not even have to probe deeply. The answer, given quite simply, as Paul does in the assertion that immediately follows his vehement repudiation, is "We died to sin; how can we live in it any longer?" There have been so many misunderstandings of what Paul meant by the statement "we died to sin" that I want to devote our entire next study to explaining it. But even without a full investigation of this phrase we can already see the folly of the "let us go on sinning" position.

Why is this objection absurd? There are several reasons.

First, it overlooks God's purpose in the plan of salvation, which Paul has been unfolding. What is this purpose? Clearly, it is to save us from sin. What does that mean? Does it mean to save us only from the punishment due us because of our sin? It does mean that, but not only that. Yes, we are justified by God in order that we might be saved from wrath at the final judgment, but that is only one part of God's plan. Well, then, does salvation mean that God is saving us from sin's guilt? Yes, that too. But again, not only that. Sin brings guilt, so one of the blessings of salvation is to be delivered from guilt, knowing that sin has not merely been overlooked or forgiven but has also been punished in Jesus Christ. Still, deliverance from the guilt of sin is also only a part of what is involved. How about deliverance from sin's presence? Of course! But again, that only happens at the end, when we are glorified.

Each of these matters is important. But the one thing that has not been mentioned thus far is salvation from the practice of sin now, and that is clearly also part of God's purpose. No one part of our deliverance from sin can rightly be separated from any other. So, if we go on practicing sin now, we are contradicting the very purpose of God in our salvation.

Second, the antinomian objection is absurd because it overlooks God's means of saving sinners. Our discussion of the early chapters of Romans was concerned with justification, the act by which God declares a person to be in a right standing before his justice due to the death of Jesus Christ. This is basically a declaration. But at the same time we saw that this is not all that is involved. God justifies, but Christ also redeems. God forgives, but the Holy Spirit also makes us spiritually alive so that we can perceive and by faith embrace that forgiveness.

Indeed, what has Paul been talking about in Romans 5? He has been talking about the believer's union with Jesus Christ, hasn't he? And what is that union like? It is not a mechanical bonding, or legal only. It is as vital as the union between a vine and its branches or between a head and the other parts of a person's body. Therefore, if we are saved, we are "in Christ." And if we are "in Christ," he is in us and his life within us will inevitably turn us from sin to righteousness.

One commentator says, "Union with Christ, being the only source of holiness, cannot be the source of sin." Therefore, if we find it possible to "go on sinning so that grace may increase," we only prove by our actions that we are not really saved. It is as simple and as strong as that! "We died to sin," Paul says—"How can we live in it any longer?"

Third, it is absurd to think that we can "go on sinning so that grace may increase," because, if we think that way, we have never understood God's grace. In the previous six studies, I said that grace is neither diminished nor withdrawn because of sin. That is, God does not cease to be gracious to us because we fall into sin. But just because grace is not diminished by sin does not mean that it is ever defeated by it. In fact, the contrary is true. As Paul said, "... grace increased all the more, so that... grace might reign through righteousness to bring eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. 5:20-21).

"What is the business of grace?" asks D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones. "Is it to allow us to continue in sin? No! It is to deliver us from the bondage and the reign of sin, and to put us under the reign of grace." A reigning monarch is a triumphant monarch. If grace is reigning in us, grace is advancing its conquest over sin. Christians sin. But they are not defeated by sin, and they do not continue in it.

Do you understand the absurdity of the objector's question now?

"Shall we go on sinning so that grace may increase?" If you understand the nature of grace, you will understand that for grace to increase, sin must decrease, not increase. The goal of grace is to destroy and vanquish sin. Therefore, if a person goes on sinning, as the objection suggests, it shows that he or she actually has no part in grace and is not saved.

Two Warnings

I close with two warnings, the first being obvious from what I have said, and the second being a deduction from it.

The first is directed particularly to the many people in religious circles who have much head knowledge about doctrine and who suppose, just because they know such things and give mental assent to them, that all is therefore well with their souls, that they are saved. That is not necessarily the case. If you are such a person, I need to warn you that it is not enough for you only to believe these things. Salvation is not mere knowledge. It is a new life. It is union with Christ. Therefore, unless you are turning from sin and going on in righteousness, as you follow after Jesus Christ, you are not saved. It is presumptuous to believe you are. So examine your life. Make sure you are saved. The Bible warns you to "make your calling and election sure" (2 Peter 1:10). The very doctrines of justification, grace, and sanctification urge this upon you.

The other warning is to all Christians, and it is in the words of an old Puritan preacher who asked in relation to our passage from Romans: "Is there anyone here who, by his conduct, gives occasion for this objection?" You may not believe—I hope you do not believe—that you can be saved and go on sinning. But is your life so careless that a unsaved person looking on might reasonably conclude that this is precisely where the doctrine of justification by grace leads Christians?

If that is the case, correct that impression at once. Remember our Lord's words: "Things that cause people to sin are bound to come, but woe to that person through whom they come. It would be better for him to be thrown into the sea with a millstone tied around his neck..." (Luke 17:1).

The writer to whom I was referring says, "It is a lamentable fact that one man who dishonors the gospel by an unholy walk does more injury to the souls of men than ten holy ones can do them good." I urge you to be part of the solution, part of the ten, rather than part of the problem. Let your life be marked by righteousness, not marred by sin—for your own soul's good as well as for the good of other people.

Chapter 78.
Death to Sin

Romans 6:2

From time to time in our Bible study we come across a verse that we immediately perceive to be of fundamental importance. Sometimes this is a personal matter; the verse speaks to us in a way we know it would not equally speak to others. If you have been a Christian for any length of time and have been faithful in Bible study, you probably have many verses like that and can even tie them to specific times of trial, growth, or blessing in your life. There are other verses that are important in a broader sense. They stand out as classic statements of basic Bible doctrines. The verse we come to now is in this second category.

John Murray calls Romans 6:2 the "fundamental premise" of the apostle's thought in this chapter. That is quite literally true. In verse 1 Paul has raised an objection to his doctrine, asking the question that must have been asked him many times in the course of his ministry: "Shall we go on sinning so that grace may increase?" His answer is emphatic: "By no means!" His explanation is straightforward: "We died to sin; how can we live in it any longer?" (v. 2). That is the whole of his position. So there is a sense in which everything that follows in Romans 6 is an elaboration of that point. For one thing, he repeats the idea of our having died to sin in every verse up to and including verse 8. Verse 3—"All of us who were baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death." Verse 4—"We were therefore buried with him through baptism into death." Verse 5—"We have been united with him like this in his death." Verse 6—"Our old self was crucified with him." Verse 7—"Anyone who has died has been freed from sin." Verse 8—"We died with Christ."

By the end of verse 10 Paul has explained his doctrine. Next he applies it, urging his readers: "In the same way, count yourselves dead to sin but alive to God in Christ Jesus" (v. 11). The application continues through verse 14. Then, in verse 15, Paul begins to do the same thing all over again but by using a different image, the image of slavery.

An analysis of the chapter shows that the idea of our death to sin is fundamental throughout. So our understanding of the statement "we died to sin" in verse 2 is critical to our understanding of the whole.

But the statement is even more important than that. For this is the first section of Romans in which Paul begins to talk about the Christian life specifically, that is, about living a life of holiness that is pleasing to God. If Romans 6:2 is the key to understanding this section, it is therefore also obviously the key to understanding the doctrine of sanctification. To understand this statement is to understand how to live a holy life. And because it is the key to sanctification, I would go so far as to say that Romans 6:2 is the most important verse in the Bible for believers in evangelical churches to understand today.

"We Died to Sin"

Yet this is not an easy verse to understand. I want to handle it by first analyzing a number of wrong or inadequate explanations of what the key words, "we died to sin," mean and then giving what I believe is the proper understanding. Before doing that, it will be helpful to note exactly what the verse says.

There are two things to keep in mind. First, there is an emphatic use of the word we. As you may know, in the Greek language the pronoun subjects of verbs are included in the verbal endings. So it is not necessary to have a separate pronoun. However, when an author wants to emphasize the subject the pronoun can be explicitly added to the sentence, which is the case here. The thrust of the statement is to contrast the "we" who are now in Christ with (1) others who are not in Christ but who are still in Adam, and (2) even ourselves as we were before God saved us. This is an important key to the right interpretation. As D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones says, "The whole emphasis is on our uniqueness, our special position, we 'being what we are.' That is what makes the question of verse 1 unthinkable."

The second thing we need to keep in mind as we think through the various interpretations of this verse is the tense of the verb died. It is an aorist tense, which means that it refers to a single action that has taken place in and been completed in the past. We are going to see how important this is as we go along, since a number of people read the verse as if "died" were in a different tense entirely. Some treat it as if it were a present tense: "we are dying to sin." Some as a past imperfect tense: "we have died and are continuing to die to sin." Some as a future tense: "we shall die to sin." But "died" is none of these things in this verse. It is an aorist and refers to a finished past action.

Five Misinterpretations

Since this verse is so critical to our understanding of why and how we are to live a holy life, we must proceed very deliberately. To do that we must begin by eliminating some of the misinterpretations. I want to discuss five of them.

1. The Christian is no longer responsive to sin. This is a very popular view, though a harmful one. It is an argument from analogy, and it usually goes like this: What is it that most characterizes a dead body? It is that its senses cease to operate. It can no longer respond to stimuli. If you are walking along the street and see a dog lying by the curb and you are uncertain whether or not it is alive, all you have to do to find out is nudge it with your foot. If it immediately jumps up and runs away, it is alive. If it only lies there, it is dead. In the same way (so this argument goes), the one who has died to sin is unresponsive to it. Sin does not touch such a person. When temptation comes, the true believer neither feels nor responds to the temptation.

J. B. Phillips, the translator of one of the most popular New Testament paraphrases, seems to have held this view. I say this because his rendering of verse 7 reads, "a dead man can safely be said to be immune to the power of sin" and of verse 11, that we are to look upon ourselves as "dead to the appeal and power of sin."

What should we say about this? The one thing in its favor is that it takes the tense of the Greek verb translated "died" at face value. It says that Christians have literally died to sin's appeal. But the problem with this interpretation is that it is patently untrue. There is no one like this, and anyone who is persuaded by this interpretation to think he or she is like this is due to be severely disillusioned. Moreover, it makes nonsense of Paul's appeal to Christians in verses 11-13, where he says to "count yourselves dead to sin but alive to God in Christ Jesus. Therefore, do not let sin reign in your mortal body.... Do not offer the parts of your body to sin, as instruments of wickedness...." You do not urge one who is as unresponsive to sin as a corpse is to physical stimuli not to be responsive to it.

We can dismiss this interpretation, even though (unfortunately) it is held by many people.

2. The Christian should die to sin. This view has been common in a certain type of holiness meeting, where Christians are urged to die to sin. They are to "crucify the old man," which, they are told, is the secret to a "victorious" Christian life. The best thing that can be said for this view is that it is obviously correct to urge Christians not to sin. Indeed, that is what Paul himself will do later: "Do not let sin reign in your mortal body" (v. 12) and "Do not offer the parts of your body to sin" (v. 13). But aside from that, everything else about this view is in error. The starting point is wrong; it begins with man rather than with God. The image is wrong: one thing nobody can do is crucify himself. Above all, the tense of the verb is wrong; for Paul is not saying that we ought to crucify ourselves (or die) but rather that we have died. He is telling us something that is already true of us if we are Christians.

3. The Christian is dying to sin day by day. All this view means to say is that the one who is united to Christ will grow in holiness, and this is true. But it is not by increasingly dying to sin. It would be true to say that we will have to be as much on guard against sin's temptations at the very end of our lives as we need to be now, though we will do so more consistently and effectively then. To look at the verse that way, though it touches on something true, nevertheless gets us away from the proper and only effective way of dealing with sin. And what is equally important, the tense of the Greek verb for "died" is again wrong. This interpretation takes "died" as if it is an imperfect tense ("are dying"), rather than as an aorist ("have died"), which is what Paul actually says.

This is an important point, one that we are going to see again as we move through the chapter. I put it in this way: The secret of sanctification is not our present experience or emotions, however meaningful or intense they may be, but rather something that has already happened to us.

4. The Christian cannot continue in sin, because he has renounced it. This view carries no less weighty a name in its favor than that of Charles Hodge, and it is to be respected for that reason, if for no other. To begin with, the great former professor at Princeton Theological Seminary notes the full aorist tense of the verb died, saying rightly that "it refers to a specific act in our past history."

But what was that act? Hodge answers that it was "our accepting of Christ as our Savior." That act involved our firm renunciation of sin, since "no man can apply to Christ to be delivered from sin, in order that he may live in it. It is "a contradiction... to say that gratuitous justification is a license to sin, as much as to say that death is life, or that dying to a thing is living in it." This is a good interpretation for two reasons: (1) it recognizes the full force of the aorist verb died, and (2) what it argues is true. Coming to Christ as Savior really does include a renunciation of sin, and to renounce sin and at the same time continue in it is a real contradiction. If we had no other possible interpretations to go on, this would be an attractive explanation.

But I cannot help but feel that D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones is correct when he rejects this as being other than Paul's meaning. Why? Because in Hodge's interpretation "dying to sin" is something we do. It is our act, the act of accepting Christ. However, in Paul's development of the idea, "dying to sin" is not something we do or have done but is something that has been done to us. It is the same as our being joined to Jesus Christ, which Paul is going to talk about in a moment under the figure of baptism. We did not join ourselves to Christ. Rather, we were in Adam, and then God by his grace took us from that position and transferred us into the kingdom of his Son.

It is because of what has happened to us that we are now no longer to continue in sin. It is because of God's work that our continuing in sin is unthinkable.

5. The Christian has died to sin's guilt. This last and, in my view, inadequate understanding of the phrase "we died to sin" is by Robert Haldane. He sees it as having nothing whatever to do with sanctification but rather as another way of talking about justification or one result of it. Haldane says, "It exclusively indicates the justification of believers and their freedom from the guilt of sin." The problem with that statement is the word exclusively. I put it that way because what Haldane says is undoubtedly true as far as it goes. The justification of the believer has certainly freed him or her from the guilt of sin, and it is true that in this sense the person has indeed died to it. As far as the guilt of sin and its resulting condemnation are concerned, sin no longer touches the Christian. He has nothing to do with it.

But that does not go far enough. True, we have died to sin's guilt. But what Paul is dealing with in this chapter is why we can no longer live in sin. If all he is saying is that we are free from sin's condemnation, the question of verse 1 is unanswered: "Shall we go on sinning so that grace may increase?" At the end of chapter 5 the apostle spoke of the inevitable reign of grace; now (in chapter 6) we must be told why this is so.

Our Old Life and Our New Life

It is obvious, having rejected five important interpretations of the phrase "we died to sin," including no less weighty interpretations than those of Charles Hodge and Robert Haldane, that I must have a better view in mind—presumptuous as that may seem. But I think that is exactly what I do have, though I have certainly not invented this new view. It is expressed in various forms by such scholars as F. Godet, John Murray, and D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones. I have found the most helpful expression of it John R. W. Stott's Men Made New: An Exposition of Romans 5-8.

Stott begins by noting that there are three verses in Romans 6 in which Paul uses the phrase "died [or dead] to sin." It appears in verse 2, which we are studying, and it occurs again in verses 10 and 11. In two of those instances, the first and the last, the reference is to ourselves as Christian men and women. In the second of those verses the reference is to Christ. It is a sound principle of interpretation that whenever the same phrase occurs more than once in one context it should be taken in the same way unless there are powerful reasons to the contrary. If that is so, the first question we have to ask in order to understand how we have died to sin is how Christ died to it. How did Jesus Christ die to sin?

The first answer we are inclined to give is that he died to sin by suffering its penalty. He was punished for our sin in our place. If we carry that analogy through, we will come out near the position of Robert Haldane. We will be thinking of justification only and of our death to sin's guilt.

But I want you to notice two things. First, the reference to Jesus's death in verse 10 does not say that he died for sin, though he did, but that he died to sin—the exact thing that is said of us. That is a different idea, or at least it seems to be.

Second, Paul's statement does not say only that Christ "died to sin" but adds the very important words "once for all." The full verse reads, "The death he died, he died to sin once for all; but the life he lives, he lives to God." This means that as far as sin is concerned, Jesus' relationship to it is finished forever. While he lived upon earth he had a relationship to it. He had come to die for sin, to put an end to its claims upon us. But now, having died, that phase of his life is past and will never be repeated. Moreover, verse 9, which leads into verse 10, says exactly that: "For we know that since Christ was raised from the dead, he cannot die again; death no longer has mastery over him."

We must now apply that understanding of "death to sin" to the other two instances, which refer to us. How? By realizing that, as a result of our union with Christ in his death and resurrection, that old life of sin in Adam is past for us also. We can never go back to it. We have been brought from that old life, the end of which was death, into a new life, the end of which is righteousness. Therefore, since this is true of us, we must embrace the fact that it is true and live for righteousness.

But perhaps even this is not clear. Let me share an illustration that Stott uses:

Suppose there is a man called John Jones, an elderly Christian believer, who is looking back upon his long life. His career is divided by his conversion into two parts, the old self—John Jones before his conversion—and the new self—John Jones after his conversion. The old self and the new self (or the "old man" and the "new man") are not John Jones' two natures; they are the two halves of his life, separated by the new birth. At conversion, signified in baptism, John Jones, the old self, died through union with Christ, the penalty of his sin borne. At the same time John Jones rose again from death, a new man, to live a new life to God.

Now John Jones is every believer. We are John Jones, if we are in Christ. The way in which our old self died is that we were crucified with Christ.

[A little further on, Stott amplifies his illustration in this way:] Our biography is written in two volumes. Volume one is the story of the old man, the old self, of me before my conversion.
Volume two is the story of the new man, the new self, of me after I was made a new creation in Christ. Volume one of my biography ended with the judicial death of the old self. I was a sinner. I deserved to die. I did die. I received my deserts in my Substitute with whom I have become one. Volume two of my biography opened with my resurrection. My old life having finished, a new life to God has begun.

Nowhere to Go but Forward

In the last study I asked the question: Where do we go from here? And I posed what seemed like two alternatives: Do we continue in a life of sin so that, as some might piously choose to put it, grace may increase? Or do we choose the other path, the path of God-like conduct? By now you should be able to see that there is no possible alternative to God's path, for those who are truly saved. The life of sin is what we have died to. There is no going back for us, any more than there could be a going back to suffer and die for sin again by our Lord. If there is no going back—if that possibility has been eliminated—there is no direction for us to go but forward! This is why I say that a right understanding of Romans 6:2 is the key to sanctification.

Some people try to find the key in an intense emotional experience, thinking that if only they can make themselves feel close to God they will become holy. Others try to find sanctification through a special methodology. They think that if they do certain things or follow a prescribed ritual they will be sanctified. Godliness does not come in that fashion; in fact, approaches like these are deceiving. A holy life comes from knowing—I stress that word—knowing that you can't go back, that you have died to sin and been made alive to God. Stott says, "A born-again Christian should no more think of going back to the old life than an adult to his childhood, a married man to his bachelorhood, or a discharged prisoner to his prison cell."

Can an adult still want to be a child or an infant? A happily married man a bachelor? A freed man a prisoner again? Well, I suppose some could. But no right-minded woman or man would want to.

Chapter 79.
Baptized into Jesus Christ

Romans 6:3-4

After I had first preached the sermon that constitutes the previous study, a member of the congregation at Tenth Presbyterian Church said, "That message was so important and yet so hard to understand that you ought to preach it all over again next week." I felt that way myself, and that is what I did. However, I did it as Paul himself did it: by going on to Romans 6:3-4, which is what this study is. These two verses are a restatement of the principle for living a godly life laid down in verse 2.

I remind you of where we are. Paul has asked a question that must have been asked of him a thousand times in the course of his ministry: "Shall we go on sinning so that grace may increase?" He answered by saying: "By no means! We died to sin; how can we live in it any longer?"

The key words in this answer are "we died to sin." We saw in the last study that there have been many ways of interpreting those words: that the Christian is no longer responsive to sin; that Christians should die to sin; that the Christian is dying to sin day by day; that Christians cannot continue in sin, because they have renounced it; that the Christian has died to sin's guilt. But we saw, too, that the real meaning of the phrase is that we died to our old life when God saved us. I used John Stott's illustrations of John Jones before his conversion and John Jones after his conversion, and of volumes one and two of "our biography."

The bottom line of this discussion has been that the key to a holy life is not our experiences or emotions, however meaningful or intense these may be, but rather our knowledge of what has happened to us. I stressed the word knowledge because the most important and basic reason for going forward in the Christian life is that we cannot go back.

Knowing and Growing

When you hear this for the first time, you may think that it is just too simple or even that it is a novel (and therefore questionable) interpretation of Romans 6:2. But I would argue that it is neither novel nor questionable, and in proof of this I refer to the very next words Paul writes: "Don't you know...?" These words are the start of the question by which Paul reminds us of our identity with Jesus Christ.

Do not pass over those words lightly. Remember that Paul had never been to Rome, though he was planning to visit Rome on a proposed trip to Spain (Rom. 15:24). He had not taught the Christians in Rome personally. Moreover, so far as we know, the church had never had the benefit of any apostolic teaching. Yet, although the Christians in Rome had never had such teaching, Paul assumes their knowledge of this doctrine by these words. In other words, what he is referring to here was common Christian knowledge. Christians have died to sin! Or, to put it in the words he is going to use next, they have been "baptized into Christ Jesus... into his death." The apostle assumes that this was known to believers everywhere, and he appeals to our knowledge of it as the key to our growth in holiness.

So I say it again: The secret of sanctification is not some neat set of experiences or emotions, however meaningful or intense they may be. It is knowing what has happened to you.

The Meaning of "Baptism"

What Paul says we are to know in verses 3 and 4 also supports my interpretation of verse 2. But before we plunge into that we need to think about the meaning of the word baptism, since it is the key term he uses.

The reason we need to do this is that for the vast majority of today's people, the mere mention of baptism immediately sets them thinking about the sacrament of water baptism and blinds them to what any text that mentions baptism may actually be saying. It has blinded commentators, too, of course. They also think of the sacrament, and because they do they have produced many wrong interpretations of these verses based on their assumption. Some have taught that the sacrament joins us to Christ and is therefore necessary for salvation. This view is called "baptismal regeneration." Some assume that Paul is thinking of our baptismal vows, others that it is a matter of coming under Christ's influence, still others that what is important is our public testimony to our faith in Christ. The last three of these actually do have something to do with water baptism. But Paul is not thinking along these lines at all in these verses, and therefore any approach to them with the idea of the sacrament of water baptism uppermost in our minds will be misleading.

What is "baptism"? A good answer starts by recognizing that there are two closely related words for baptism in the Greek language and that they do not necessarily have the same meaning. One word is baptō, which means "dip" or "immerse." The other word is baptizō, which may mean "immerse" but may have other meanings as well. This is a normal situation with Greek words. The simpler word usually conveys the most straightforward meaning. The longer word adds specialized and sometimes metaphorical meanings.

It is the longer word that is used for "baptism" in the New Testament. So we need to ask next what the precise meaning of the longer word is.

We gain help from classical literature. The Greeks used the word baptizō from about 400 B.C. to about the second century after Christ, and in their literature baptizō always pointed to a change having taken place by some means. Josephus used it of the crowds that flooded into Jerusalem and "wrecked the city." Other examples are the dyeing of cloth and the drinking of too much wine. In each of these cases there is a liquid or something like it—the crowds were like a human "wave," a dye and wine are liquids—but the essential idea is actually that of a change. Jerusalem was wrecked. The dyed cloth changes color. The drinker becomes different; he misbehaves.

The clearest example I know that shows this meaning of baptizō is a text from the Greek poet and physician Nicander, who lived about 200 B.C. It is a recipe for making pickles, and it is helpful because it uses both words. Nicander says that to make a pickle, the vegetable should first be "dipped" (baptō) into boiling water and then "baptized" (baptizō) in the vinegar solution. Both verbs concern immersing the vegetable in a solution, but the first is temporary. The second, the act of "baptizing" the vegetable, produces a permanent change.

To get this distinction in mind is of enormous help in understanding the New Testament verses that refer to baptism, including our text in Romans, for which thoughts of a literal immersion in water would be nonsense.

Take 1 Corinthians 10:1-2, as an example. "For I do not want you to be ignorant of the fact, brothers, that our forefathers were all under the cloud and that they all passed through the sea. They were all baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea." That cannot be referring to a water baptism, because the only people who were immersed in water were the Egyptian soldiers, and they were drowned in it. The Israelites did not even get their feet wet. What do the verses mean? Obviously, they refer to a permanent identification of the people with Moses as a result of the Red Sea crossing. Before this they were still in Egypt and could have renounced Moses' leadership, retaining their allegiance to Pharaoh. But once they crossed the Red Sea they were joined to Moses for the duration of their desert wandering. They were not able to go back.

By now you are probably beginning to see why this discussion of baptism is important and why Paul used the words baptized and baptism in verses 3 and 4. But let me offer a few more texts that are clarified by understanding baptism as change rather than mere immersion in water.

Galatians 3:27. "For all of you who were baptized into Christ have clothed yourselves with Christ." This is not referring to water baptism, because if it were, the illustration of being clothed with Christ would be inappropriate. Rather, it refers to our being identified with Christ, like a child identifies with her mother when she dresses in her mother's clothes or a soldier identifies with the armed forces of his country when he dons a uniform.

Mark 16:16 is well known. Jesus says here: "Whoever believes and is baptized will be saved...."
Scores of people have wrongly concluded from that verse that unless a person first believes in Christ and then is also immersed in water, he or she cannot be saved. But even the poorest Bible student knows that this is not true. A person is saved by grace through faith in Jesus Christ alone. If baptism in water is necessary for salvation, then the believing thief who was crucified with Christ is lost.

Once we get away from the mistaken idea that baptism always refers to water baptism, the verse becomes clear. For what Jesus is saying in Mark 16:16 is that a person needs to be identified with him to be saved. He was saying that mere intellectual assent to the doctrines of Christianity is not enough. It is necessary, to use another of his teachings, that "If anyone would come after me, he must deny himself and take up his cross daily and follow me" (Luke 9:23). This last verse is an exact parallel to what the apostle is teaching in Romans 6:3-4, for it means that a true follower of Christ has died to his past life—like a man on his way to execution. Only, in Romans 6, the man has already died and been buried.

Buried Through Baptism

With this lengthy excursion into the meaning of the word baptism in mind, I return to our text to show how these ideas come together. What was the chief idea in Romans 5:12-21? It was the idea of our union with Christ, wasn't it? Before, we were in Adam; now, we are in Christ. And what is Paul's answer to "Shall we go on sinning so that grace may increase?" (Rom. 6:1). It is that we have died to sin: "We died to sin; how can we live in it any longer?" Union with Christ! And death to sin!

But notice: That is exactly what baptism signifies, and in that order. The most important idea is that we have been taken out of one state and put into another. We have had an experience similar to that of the Jews after they had been brought through the Red Sea. They were joined to Moses; we are joined to Christ. Or, to put it in the words of Galatians 3:27, we have been clothed with Christ. We are in Christ's uniform. And what that means, if we look backward, is that we have died to whatever has gone before. We died to the old life when Christ transferred us to the new one.

As soon as we see how these ideas go together, we see why Paul's thoughts turned to the word baptism as a way of unfolding what he had in mind when he said: "How can we live in [sin] any longer?"

I want you to notice something else, too. When theologians write about our being "baptized into Christ" and how this is the equivalent of our being united to him by the Holy Spirit, they stress that we are identified with Christ in all respects. That is, we are identified with him in (or baptized into) his death, burial, and resurrection. One commentator got into this theme so deeply that he worked out parallels to our identification with Christ in his election, virgin birth, circumcision, physical growth, baptism by John the Baptist, suffering, crucifixion, burial, resurrection, and ascension into heaven. Much of this is very true, of course. If we have been identified with Christ, as we have been, we are identified with him in many respects, particularly in his death and resurrection.

But what I want to point out is that Paul does not say here that we have been identified with Christ by baptism in these other respects. He does not, for example, even say that we have been baptized into Christ's resurrection, though he goes on to say that "just as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father, we too may live a new life" (v. 4) and later that we have been "united with him like this in his resurrection" (v. 5). In verse 3 he speaks of our baptism into Christ in one respect only: "into his death." And in the next phrase he shows that what he has particularly in mind is Christ's burial: "We were therefore buried with him through baptism into death."

This flow of thought is so strong that F. Godet rightly says, "According to these words, it is not to death, it is to the internment of the dead, that Paul compares baptism."

This is striking, and quite puzzling, too. I notice, for example, that when theologians work out the parallels of our identification with Christ, they have little trouble showing how we have been crucified with him, raised with him or even made to ascend into heaven with him. But they have trouble with the burial. "How can we be said to be buried with Christ?" they ask. "And what does this add that is not already covered by our death to sin?" Yet burial is the thing Paul emphasizes.

How do we account for this? And how do we account for the difficult way Paul puts it: "buried with him through baptism into death." More than one commentator has struggled with the awkwardness of that phrase, suggesting in some cases that it is even backward, since no one is buried into death (that is, buried to die) but rather is buried because he died.

I suggest that if this is approached as I have been suggesting, the problem is not difficult at all. The reason burial is an important step even beyond death is that burial puts the deceased person out of this world permanently. A corpse is dead to life. But there is a sense in which it can still be said to be in life, as long as it is around. When it is buried, when it is placed in the ground and covered with earth, it is removed from the sphere of this life permanently. It is gone. That is why Paul, who wanted to emphasize the finality of our being removed from the rule of sin and death to the rule of Christ, emphasizes it. He is repeating but also intensifying what he has already said about our death to sin. "You have not only died to it," he says. "You have been buried to it." To go back to sin once you have been joined to Christ is like digging up a dead body.

The Public Profession

I have been saying throughout this study that when Paul refers to our being baptized into Christ, he is not thinking chiefly of the sacrament of baptism but rather of our having been joined to Christ by the Holy Spirit. I do not want to go back on that. The very next verses prove this view, for in them Paul speaks explicitly of our being "united with him in his death [and] resurrection." This is something the Holy Spirit does.

But, while emphasizing this, I do not want to miss the significance of the sacrament of baptism as a Christian's public renunciation of his past life and a profession of his new identification with Christ.

This is not so obvious to us today perhaps, since baptism is something that generally takes place in an exclusively Christian environment and for many people means very little. But it was not so in Paul's day. And it is not so in many places in the world even today. In the ancient world, to be identified with Christ in baptism was a bold and risky declaration.

It often put the believer's life in jeopardy. There was nothing wrong with listening to Christian preaching or propaganda. But when a Christian was baptized, he was saying to the state as well as to his fellow believers that he was now a follower of Jesus Christ and that he was going to be loyal to him regardless of the outcome. It meant "Christ before Caesar."

Baptism was as nearly an irreversible step as a believer in Jesus Christ could take. Therefore, even though Paul is not thinking primarily about water baptism in Romans 6—water baptism is something we do; the baptism Paul is talking about is something that has been done to us—the sacrament of baptism is nevertheless a fit public testimony to what baptism into Christ by the Holy Spirit means: that we have been united to Christ and that the old life is done for us forever. That is what you have professed if you have been baptized, particularly if you have been baptized as an adult. You have told the world that you are not going back, that you are going forward with Jesus.

But I come to the questions that I know are in many people's minds, the same questions I touched on at the end of the last study: "But what if I do go back? What if I do sin?" Here are three points to remember:

1. It won't work. Do you remember my illustration of an adult trying to return to childhood. Can he do it? Well, he can act childlike, though it would be a dishonor to him and an embarrassment to everyone else. But to become a child again? It can't be done. An adult can behave in an infantile manner. But an adult cannot be a child. In the same way, if you are a true Christian, you cannot return to sin in the same way you were in it previously. You can sin. We do sin. But it is not the same. If nothing else, you cannot enjoy sin as you did before. And you will not even be able to do it convincingly. You will be like Peter trying to swear that he did not know Jesus, after having spent three years in Jesus' school. People will look at you and say, "But surely you are one of his disciples."
2. God will stop you. God will not stop you from sinning, but he will stop you from continuing in it. And he will do it in one of two ways. Either he will make your life so miserable that you will curse the day you got into sin and beg God to get you out of it, or God will put an end to your life. Paul told the Corinthians that because they had dishonored the Lord's Supper, God had actually taken some of them home to heaven (1 Cor. 11:30). If God did it to them for that offense, he will do it to you for persistence in more sinful things.

3. If you do return to the life you lived before coming to Christ and if you are able to continue in it, you are not saved. In fact, it is even worse than that. If you are able to go back once you have come to Christ, it means, not only that you are not saved, but that you even have been inoculated against Christianity.

I am sure that is why the author of Hebrews wrote, "It is impossible for those who have once been enlightened, who have tasted the heavenly gift, who have shared in the Holy Spirit, who have tasted the goodness of the word of God and the powers of the coming age, if they fall away, to be brought back to repentance..." (Heb. 6:4-6). Those verses are not referring to a true believer in Christ being lost—How could they in view of Paul's teaching in Romans 5 and 8?—but rather of one who was close enough to have tasted the reality of Christ and who nevertheless turned back. It teaches that the closer you are to Christ, if you do go back, the harder it will be to come to Christ again. In some cases, as in the case described here, it will be impossible.

So don't go back!

I say it again: Don't go back!

If you have been saved by Jesus, you have been saved forever. There is nothing before you but to go on growing in righteousness!

Chapter 80.
Living with Jesus Now

Romans 6:5-10

It is a sad fact that many people perceive Christianity as being negative. It is viewed as a series of don'ts: "Don't drink; don't play cards; don't fool around; don't laugh too loud." In fact, "Don't have fun at all," because, if you do, God will be looking down from heaven to see it and say,

"Now you cut that out!"

It is possible that some reader has taken our first studies of Romans 6 negatively, because the emphasis has been on the fact that once a person has been joined to Jesus Christ he or she can no longer go on sinning. "Shall we go on sinning so that grace may increase?" Paul asked. "By no means!" he has answered. "We died to sin; how can we live in it any longer?" (vv. 1-2). That does indeed sound negative, particularly to the non-Christian. Death! And dying! If you do not know Christianity better than that, it sounds almost like "no more anything."

But that is not what real Christianity is, of course. In fact, it is just the opposite. It is sin that is negative. So to be freed from sin is to be freed to a brand new life, which is positive. Leon Morris, one of the newer and best commentators on Romans, says, "The Christian way is not negative. There is a death to an old way, it is true, but as the believer identifies with Christ in his death he enters into newness of life." The Christian way of speaking about this is to say that, for the Christian, death is followed by a resurrection.

And not just at the end of time! True Christianity is living out a new, joyful, abundant, resurrected life with Jesus Christ now.

A New, Rich Section

We have already had more than one hint that this has been coming. Paul ended the fifth chapter of Romans by saying that the reign of grace has replaced the reign of sin and death, and in chapter 6 he has concluded that we were "buried with him [Christ] through baptism into death in order that, just as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father, we too may live a new life" (v. 4). Nevertheless, it is in the section to which we turn now (verses 5-10) that this new and abundant life is unfolded fully for the first time.

This is a long section compared to the several smaller units we have been studying in the previous chapters. In fact, it would be too long for one study if it were not that we have already dealt with most of the key terms. Most important, we have studied how we can be said to have died to sin. Jesus died to sin (not "for sin," though that is also true) by ending the phase of his life in which he was in sin's realm, and by returning to heaven. In the same way, our old relationships to sin have also ended. God fixed our future when we were taken out of Adam and joined to Christ. We cannot go back to the old life. As I have said several times, there is no place for us to go but forward.

The outline of these verses is a simple one. In verse 5, Paul states a thesis, which verses 6-10 develop. It has two parts: "If we have been united with him like this in his death..." (that is the first part; it is what he has already been talking about extensively) and "... we will certainly also be united with him in his resurrection" (that is the second part; it is the new idea to be developed). Paul unfolds the meaning of the first part in verses 6 and 7; he explains the second part in verses 8-10.

The Body of Sin

A few lines back I wrote that the first part of verse 5 (We have been united with Christ in his death) has already been dealt with extensively, and that is true. But when Paul unfolds the meaning of this sentence in verses 6 and 7, he is not just repeating himself. This is the point at which he is starting to talk about the Christian life, particularly the Christian's sure victory over sin. Now when he mentions our union with Christ in his death, it is to show how this frees us from sin's tyranny.

The best way to show what Paul is doing in these verses is by focusing on the two key phrases.

1. Our old self. The first phrase is "our old self which, he says, "was crucified with" Christ. Our earlier studies have already indicated how this should be taken. "Old self refers to our old life, that is, to what we were in Adam before God saved us. That old life is done for. We have died to it. That is why Paul says it "was (or 'has been') crucified."

Many commentators go astray at this point, because they confuse the "old self with the Christian's "old (or 'sinful') nature," a phrase Paul uses later. Because the old nature remains with us, these teachers are always urging believers to crucify or kill the old self. They explain the persistence of sin in the believer by observing that crucifixion is a "long drawn out" process. Now it is true that the Christian life is a long-drawn-out battle with sin. That is what Romans 7 is about, as I will show when we get to it. But the secret to victory over sin is not the crucifixion or killing of the old self, for the simple reason that the old self has already died. That is why the Bible never tells us to crucify the old man. How can we if he has already been put to death?

I make this point strongly because, although the Christian life is indeed a struggle, to equate killing our old self with that struggle (when the old self has already been crucified with Christ) is to miss the truth that has been given to us by God for our victory.

2. The body of sin. The second key phrase is "the body of sin." It occurs in the clause "so that the body of sin might be rendered powerless [done away with]." This is the first time we have seen this phrase, though it or some variation will occur a number of times more as we proceed. What does it refer to?

Our first inclination is to think of the body of sin as being the same thing as our old self, which has just been mentioned. This is probably because the old self is said to have been crucified; a body is crucified and, if the body of sin is crucified, it is therefore obviously rendered powerless, which is what the text states. But that is not the idea. I think D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones is exactly right at this point when he says that by the term "body of sin" Paul is talking about the old nature, and that to some extent he means the word body (that is, our physical body) literally. Paul was not talking about this earlier. The old self (or old man) is not the old nature. The old self is the "old me," who has died.

But here, in talking about "the body of sin," Paul is talking about the old nature, mentioning—for the first time in Romans—the Christian's actual inclination to sin, which must be dealt with.

That makes sense of verse 6, of course. For what Paul says in verse 6 is that God has taken us out of Adam and placed us in Christ, thereby causing us to die to the old life, in order that (1) our present inclinations to sin might be robbed of their power, and (2) we should be delivered from sin's slavery.

I want to give a personal reaction to the phrase "body of sin" at this point. If Paul were with us today and I had an opportunity to speak to him, I think I might say that I wished he had spoken of our sinful nature in some other fashion. This is because to locate the Christian's continuing inclination to sin in the "body," as this phrase does, seems to suggest two admittedly wrong ideas. First, it suggests: "I am not a sinner; it is only my body." We do not want to say that. John tells us that "if we claim to be without sin, we deceive ourselves" (1 John 1:8). And second, it suggests that the body is somehow intrinsically evil, and we know that this is a Greek or Hindu idea, rather than a Judeo-Christian one. "Couldn't you have thought of another phrase?" I would have asked the apostle.

Yet I confess that I cannot think of a better one. And the phrase is helpful as long as I realize that, although I am not ultimately my body, I am nevertheless so much formed by it that I cannot escape its influences. The wording teaches us that in our present physical state, prior to glorification, sin is in possession of our bodies and must be dealt with at that level.

Sin in the Body

Here are some examples of how sin operates in our bodies.

We sit down to eat, and our hostess sets a beautiful spread before us. There is nothing intrinsically wrong (sinful) in either her preparations or our eating. The body is from God; it needs to eat because God made it that way. But we become so enthralled by the food's appearance and taste that we take this natural bodily function and push it beyond where it was intended to go. We overeat. We indulge, we stuff ourselves. The overindulgence is sin, and it leads to even greater sin if it becomes a pattern. This pattern of eating harms the body and in time makes us insensitive to the needs of others—others who are hungry, for example—and to God, who has given us the food. We become ungrateful, fail to thank him, and even complain if for some reason we are unable at some future point to indulge ourselves as freely.

Take sleeping as another example. The body needs rest. We cannot do without it. Sleep or relaxation refreshes us so that we feel good. But the body can draw us into the sins of sloth and apathy and then lead us to the even more sinful conviction that others should work for us so we can be at ease. We may even think ourselves superior to these other persons since they, in our view, exist chiefly to see that we are made comfortable.

Our glands and the hormones they produce are also parts of the body. They, too, are good, since they have been given to us by God. They feed our emotions. Danger causes our adrenaline to flow so that we can react quickly to escape a life-threatening situation. Sexual hormones awaken us to the qualities of the opposite sex and lead to love, marriage, and procreation. But these same glands also react wrongly and more strongly than they should. Adrenaline will flow just because someone has offended us, and we will fight back when we should show a spirit of meekness. Our sexual glands, particularly when they are stimulated by the world's culture, lead to lust, infidelity, promiscuity, and other vices. Indeed, they turn us against God when we are told that his law forbids such inclinations.

A person may say, with reason, that it is not the body that is at fault but our minds. Sin begins in the mind or spirit. But although I realize that the source of sin is in the mind or spirit and that the spirit is not the body, it is nevertheless impossible to separate the mind from the body. We are as we think, and the thinking process (so far as anyone can determine) is physiological. So even at this level it is clearly "the body of sin" from which we need to be delivered.

Posse Non Peccare

This is what our having died to sin by our union to Christ in his death is intended to accomplish. Paul says that our union with Christ in his death has been to render the body of sin powerless, so that we might "no longer be slaves to sin."

"Rendered powerless" (or "done away with"), as in the New International Version, is a better translation than the older word "destroyed" (KJV, RSV). But even this can mislead some people. The Greek word is katargeō, and it occurs twenty-seven times in the New Testament, including three prior instances in Romans. It occurs in Romans 3:3 and 31, where it is rendered "nullify" ("Will their lack of faith nullify God's faithfulness?" and "Do we, then, nullify the law by this faith?"). It also occurs in Romans 4:14, where it is rendered "has no value" ("For if those who live by law are heirs, faith has no value"). Two more instances in Romans are in chapter 7, where it is translated "released" ("If her husband dies, she is released from the law of marriage" [v. 2] and "We have been released from the law so that we serve in the new way of the Spirit" [v. 6]).

None of these instances mean "destroyed," and they do not mean "rendered powerless" in the sense that the thing involved can be said no longer to exert an influence. They mean rather: "no longer to exert a controlling force or power" or "to be made ineffective."

In other words, the reason God has removed us from our union with Adam and has joined us to Christ (so that we have died to our past) is so the inclinations to sin that operate so strongly in our bodies might no longer exercise effective power or control us. They are still there, but from this point on they will not dominate us. Before this, we were "slaves to sin" (v. 6), but having died to sin, we are now "freed" from it (v. 7).

Will we sin? Yes! But we do not need to, and we will do so less and less as we go on in the Christian life. You may remember how Saint Augustine put it when he was comparing Adam's state before the fall, Adam's state after the fall, the state of those who have been saved by God through the work of Christ, and our final state in glory as Christians.

Augustine said that before he fell Adam was posse peccare ("able to sin"). He had not sinned yet, but he was able to.

After his fall, according to Augustine, Adam became non posse non peccare ("not able not to sin"). By himself he was unable to break free from it.

The state of believers, those who have been saved by Christ, is now one of posse non peccare ("able not to sin"). That is the state Paul is writing about in Romans 6. For them, the tyranny of sin has been broken.

The glorified state, for which we yearn, is non posse peccare ("not able to sin"). In our glorified state we will not be tempted by sin or be able to fall into it again.

A Present Resurrection

The second half of Paul's topical sentence in verse 5 ("we will certainly also be united with him in his resurrection") is explained in verses 8-10, where Paul speaks of a present resurrection: "Now if we died with Christ, we believe that we will also live with him. For we know that since Christ was raised from the dead, he cannot die again; death no longer has mastery over him. The death he died, he died to sin once for all; but the life he lives, he lives to God."

I have quoted those verses in full, because unless we take them together we will perceive the words "we will also live with him" as referring to our future resurrection, when actually they refer to an experience of resurrection life here and how.

Don't misunderstand. There is a future resurrection, and the same union of the believer with Christ that we have been talking about is a guarantee of it. But that is not what these verses are about. We have already seen what they mean in the case of Christ. They refer to his passage from the sphere where death reigned to the sphere of the resurrection, from where he was to where he is now. In the same way, they refer to our passage—from the reign of death to the reign of grace, to a present resurrection. This is what Paul says of himself in Philippians when he writes: "I want to know Christ and the power of his resurrection..." (Phil. 3:10). He means that he wants to be victorious over sin.

I have been reading Stephen W. Hawking's stimulating book on modern physics, entitled A Brief History of Time. Hawking is the distinguished English physicist who has Lou Gehrig's disease and is confined to a wheelchair, but has done pioneer work in the analysis of what are commonly called "black holes" or "singularities." A black hole is a collapsed star of such density and gravity that nothing can escape from it, not even light, which is why it appears as a dark spot in the panorama of the heavens. Objects rushing toward it approach the speed of light as well as approach infinite mass; as a result, the normal laws of physics tend to lose meaning at the center. No one knows what happens when an object reaches the center, but some have speculated that for reasons beyond most people's ability to grasp, an object might shoot through the "hole" and pass into another time period or existence.

I understand a great deal less about black holes than scientists do, so I have no idea whether such speculations are true. But it occurs to me that passing through a black hole is an apt illustration of a Christian's having died to sin and having been raised to new life in Christ—if for no other reason than that he or she cannot come back. Anything that has gone through a black hole has passed through it forever. Similarly, anyone who has been united to Christ has died to sin, is on the way to God, and can never return to his or her former sphere of existence.

And there is this, too: For most of us, to pass through a black hole in space would be, in physical terms, the most important, monumental, irreversible, and life-changing experience we can imagine. But great as that might be, it would not be so great as the change that has already taken place in those who have been lifted out of the realm of sin and joined to Jesus Christ.

When all is said and done, passing through a black hole would still mean being limited to some kind of physical universe. But being joined to Christ means being joined to the One who made the universe itself and who will still be there when heaven and earth—including black holes, quasars, neutron stars, and all the rest—have passed away.

But I do not want to leave you there. This last point is a flight of fancy, so far as I know. But what I started to talk about is the positive Christian experience of being delivered from the power of sin by the realities of Christ's life. I return to the key questions.

First: "Shall we go on sinning so that grace may increase?" The answer: "By no means! We died to sin; how can we live in it any longer?"

Second, the question of this study: "How can we triumph over sin?" The answer: "By knowing what God has done for us when he joined us to Christ." We are going to look at the meaning of that even more in the next study, when we consider verse 11. But I hope you have noticed, as we studied verses 5-10, that the important word know, which I have called the key to this entire matter of sanctification, is here again and not only once but twice. We saw it first in verse 2: "Or don't you know that all of us who were baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death?" Here it appears in verse 6: "For we know that our old self was crucified with him," and in verse 9: "For we know that since Christ was raised from the dead, he cannot die again; death no longer has mastery over him."

What is true of Jesus is true of us. His relationship to sin, while he was in this life, has passed forever. It is true of us as well, since we are joined to him. The key to holiness is to know this and to press on.

Chapter 81.
You Can Count On It

Romans 6:11

I want to start this study with a brief quiz on the early chapters of Romans, and the question I want to ask is this: How many times in the letter up to this point has the apostle Paul urged his readers to do something? That is, how many exhortations have there been?

More than ten? Thirty? Less than five?

How many imperative statements occurred in chapter 1? Were there more exhortations in chapter 5 than in chapter 4?

What do you think? How many exhortations has Paul made so far?

The answer to this question is that there have been none at all! And the reason I emphasize this is to call attention to the most significant thing to be noted about Romans 6:11. This verse is an exhortation, and it is the first in the epistle. This is the first time in five and a half chapters that the apostle has urged his readers to do anything.

What are they to do? The text says: "In the same way, count yourselves dead to sin but alive to God in Christ Jesus."

This is an important enough statement in itself, but it becomes even more so when we realize that Romans 6:11 is also a turning point in the letter. I mean by this that, having gotten the first olive out of the bottle, so to speak, the other exhortative olives now tumble out naturally. The next verses are full of them: "Do not let sin reign in your mortal body.... Do not offer the parts of your body to sin... but rather offer yourselves to God... and offer the parts of your body to him..." (vv. 12-14, emphasis added).

What God Has Done

Most modern Americans are activists. So we are inclined to think, as we come to this verse, that we are at last getting to what matters. But, at the risk of prolonging our discussion of the earlier chapters beyond the limits of most people's tolerance, I need to say that the point I am making— that this is the first exhortation in the letter—is of great practical importance.

Let me approach it this way. We live in an age of self-help books and seminars, in Christian circles as well as in the world at large, and these small books (they are usually small) and short (perhaps weekend-length) courses promise the consumer great things. The Christian versions offer formulas by which we are supposed to be able to move ahead quickly in our Christian lives. They teach us how to become great prayer warriors, perhaps even "change the world" through prayer. They show us how to relate to others successfully. They promise quick and effective methods of Bible study.

I do not want to suggest that these "quick fix" offerings are useless, of course. They are not useless. They are helpful to many, and I am sure they have their place, particularly in our fastpaced, solution-oriented culture. Still, if you have read any of these books or attended these seminars, isn't it the case that you have generally been disappointed at some level, perhaps even deeply frustrated? Perhaps you have even been frustrated enough to write off completely these methods for growing strong in the Christian faith. You have said, "I am sure they must work for other people, but not for me. They help, but not enough. Probably nothing will help me. I am probably called to be just a normal [read 'second-class'] Christian."

What is wrong here? I suggest that because of our characteristic North American impatience with matters of basic substance or with anything requiring hard and prolonged work, we have jumped ahead too quickly to the "exhortation" parts of Christianity and have not taken sufficient time to understand and appropriate the fundamental teachings. If this is so, then Paul's procedure in Romans should be of great help to us. Was Paul not interested in the spiritual growth of the Roman Christians? Of course, he was. But he knew that there was no use rushing ahead to tell them how to live the Christian life until he had first fully instructed them on what God had done for them in Jesus Christ. This is because the work of God in Christ is foundational to everything else about Christianity.

What Paul principally wanted his readers to understand here is what theologians call the mystical union of believers with Jesus Christ. Paul's way of talking about this is to say that Christians are "in Christ," "in Jesus Christ" or "in him." Those who count such things tell us that those phrases occur 164 times in Paul's writings. One of them is in our text, and it is the first time this exact phrase has occurred in Romans. Yet it is what Paul has really been talking about for several chapters. Romans 5 dealt with it directly, contrasting our former state of being in Adam with our present state of being in Christ. In Romans 6 this has already been presented indirectly in terms of our having died to sin and having been united to Jesus in his resurrection.

This has been done for us by God. It has been his work, not ours. We have no more joined ourselves to Jesus in his resurrection than we have died for our own sins. If we are Christians, everything that is necessary has been done for us by God.

A Bookkeeping Term

What we learn in a general way, by reflecting on the amount of teaching Paul has given in chapters 1-5 of Romans, is reinforced by the verb he uses in Romans 6:11. It is the word count (or "reckon," as some of the other versions have it). The Greek word is logizomai, and it is related to the more common term logos, meaning "word," "deed," or "fact." In classical Greek, logizomai had two main uses:

1. It was used in commercial dealings in the sense of evaluating an object's worth or reckoning up a project's gain or losses. In other words, it was a bookkeeping term. We have preserved a bit of this in our English words log, logistics, and logarithm. A log refers to the numerical record of a ship's or airplane's progress. Logistics is a military term dealing with the numbers and movement of troops or supplies. A logarithm is the exponent to which a base number is raised to produce a given number.

2. Logizomai was also used in philosophy in the sense of objective or nonemotional reasoning. We have preserved this meaning in our English words "logic" and "logical."

The common ground in these two uses of the word is that logizomai has to do with reality, with things as they truly are. In other words, it has nothing to do with wishful thinking. Nor is it an activity that makes something come to pass or happen. It is an acknowledgment of or an acting upon something that is already true or has already happened. In bookkeeping, for example, it means posting in a ledger an amount corresponding to what actually exists. If I "reckon" in my passbook that I have $100, I must really have $100. If not, "reckoning" is the wrong word for me to be using. "Deceiving myself (or others) would be more like it.

It will also help us in our understanding of Romans 6:11 to recognize that logizomai has already been used several times in Romans and that in every case it has referred to recognizing something that is factual. In fact, logizomai has appeared fourteen times before now, and it will occur again (in Romans 8 and 9). The chief use has been in chapter 4 (eleven occurrences), where Paul employed it to show how our sins have been reckoned to Christ and punished there, and how his righteousness has been reckoned ("credited") to us. These two "reckonings" are the two parallel sides of justification, and when we studied them (in volume 1) we saw that their strength comes from knowing that they concern realities. They are not just imaginary transactions. Jesus really did die for our sin; he suffered for our transgressions. Similarly, his righteousness really has been transferred to our account, so that God accounts us righteous in him.

This has bearing on Paul's exhortation to us in Romans 6:11. For although he is proceeding in this chapter to the area of what we are to do and actions we are to take, his starting point is nevertheless our counting as true what God has himself already done for us.

This is so critical that I want to ask pointedly: Do you and I really understand this? We cannot go on until we do.

Can I possibly say it more clearly?

Try this: The first step in our growth in holiness is counting as true what is, in fact, true.

And this: The key to living the Christian life lies in first knowing that God has taken us out of Adam and has joined us to Jesus Christ, that we are no longer subject to the reign of sin and death but have been transferred to the kingdom of God's abounding grace.

And this: The secret to a holy life is believing God.

The First Reality: Dead to Sin

In our text Paul says there are two things God has done that we are to count on. First, that we are dead to sin if we are Christians. We have already seen how this is to be taken. It does not mean that we are immune to sin or temptation. It does not mean that we will not sin. It means that we are dead to the old life and cannot go back to it.

That is the reality Paul first stated explicitly at the beginning of Romans 6, in verse 2. "We died to sin," he said. In verses 3 and 4, he restated it: We were "baptized into his death" and "buried with him through baptism into death." It was also said in verse 5: "We have been united with him in his death." Verse 6 said it, too: "Our old self was crucified with him." Verse 7 again made the point that we "died" with Christ. All those statements have been factual. They describe something that has happened.

On the basis of this truth, Paul now tells us to "count" ourselves as having died to sin in Christ Jesus. D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones renders it: "Consider, and keep constantly before you, this truth about yourself." In other words, learn to think of yourself as one who has been delivered from sin's realm.

This is such a pivotal text that it is worth adding a number of things that this statement does not mean. Lloyd-Jones lists six of them:

1. It does not mean that it is my duty as a Christian to die to sin. The text has nothing to do with duty. It is concerned with fact.
2. It is not a command for me to die to sin. How can I be told to do what has already been done to me?
3. It does not mean that I am to reckon that sin as a force in me is dead. That would not be true. Sin is a force in me, though it is a force whose effective power over me has been broken (v. 6).
4. It does not mean that sin in me has been eradicated.
5. It does not mean that I am dead to sin as long as I am in the process of gaining mastery over it. That would make the statement refer to something experimental, and it does not do that. It refers to a past event.
6. It does not mean that reckoning myself dead to sin makes me dead to sin. That is backwards. What Paul is saying is that, because we have died to sin, we are to count on it.

The Second Reality: Alive to God

The second reality Paul says we are to count on is that we are now "alive to God in Christ Jesus." This statement completes the parallel to verse 5, in which Paul said, "If we have been united with him like this in his death, we will certainly also be united with him in his resurrection." It explains how the earlier verse is to be taken. You may remember that when we were discussing verse 5 in the previous study, I stressed that the resurrection referred to there is not the future resurrection of believers at the end of time but rather a present experience of Christ's resurrection life now. That is exactly where verse 11 has brought us. It tells us that just as we have died to sin (and must count on it), so also have we been made alive to God in Jesus Christ (and must count on that also).

This is the positive side of the matter, the side we were beginning to open up in the earlier study. But we only touched on it there. Here we can ask: "Just what does being made alive to God in Jesus Christ mean? What changes have taken place?" Let me suggest a few of them.

1. We have been reconciled to God. In the earlier chapters of Romans there has been a grim sequence of terms: sin, wrath, judgment, death. But God has lifted us out of that downwardspiraling sequence by a set of opposing realities: grace, obedience, righteousness, eternal life.

This means that we were subject to the wrath of God but that now, being in Christ, we are in a favorable position before him. Before, we were God's enemies. Now, we are his friends and, what is more important, he is a friend to us. There is a new relationship.

2. We have become new creatures in Christ. Not only is there a new relationship between ourselves and God, which is wonderful in itself, but we have also become something we were not before. In 2 Corinthians, Paul puts it like this: "Therefore, if anyone is in Christ, he is a new creation; the old has gone, the new has come! All this is from God, who reconciled us to himself through Christ..." (2 Cor. 5:17-18).

Another way of putting this is to speak of regeneration, or of being born again, which was Jesus' term for it. He told Nicodemus, "You must be born again" (John 3:7). This was a deliberate backward reference to the way in which God breathed life into our first parent Adam, so that he became "a living being" (Gen. 2:7). Before that, Adam was utterly inert, a lifeless form. But when God breathed some of his breath into him Adam became alive to God and all things. Likewise, this is what happens when God breathes new spiritual life into us in the work known as regeneration. We become something we were not before. We have a new life. That life is responsive to the one who gave it.

Before this, the Bible meant nothing to us when we read it or it was read in our hearing. Now the Bible is intensely alive and interesting. We hear the voice of God in it.

Before this, we had no interest in God's people. Christians acted in ways that were foreign to us.
Their priorities were different from our own. Now they are our very best friends and co-workers. We love their company and cannot seem to get enough of it.

Before this, coming to church was boring. Now we are alive to God's presence in the service. Our worship times are the very best times of our week.

Before this, service to others and witnessing to the lost seemed strange and senseless, even repulsive. Now they are our chief delight.

What has made the difference? The difference is ourselves. God has changed us. We have become alive to him. We are new creatures.

3. We are freed from sin's bondage. Before we died to sin and were made alive to God, we were slaves of our sinful natures. Sin was ruining us. But even when we could see that clearly and acknowledge it, which was not very often, we were still unable to do anything about it. We said, "I've got to stop drinking; it's killing me." Or, "I am going to ruin my reputation if I don't stop these sexual indulgences." Or, "I've got to get control of my temper, or curb my spending [or whatever]." But we were unable to do it. And even if we did get some control of one important area of our lives, perhaps with the help of a good therapist or friends or a supportive family, the general downward and destructive drift was unchanged. We really were non posse non peccare ("not able not to sin"), as Saint Augustine described it.

But, being made alive to God, we discover that we are now freed from that destructive bondage. We still sin, but not always and not as often. And we know that we do not have to. We are now posse non peccare ("able not to sin"). We can achieve a real victory.

4. We are pressing forward to a sure destiny and new goals. Before, we were not. We were trapped by the world and by its time-bound, evil horizons. Being saved, we know that we are now destined for an eternity of fellowship and bliss with God. We have not reached it yet. We are not perfect. But we echo within what Paul said in describing his new life in Christ to the Philippians: "Not that I have already obtained all this, or have already been made perfect, but I press on to take hold of that for which Christ Jesus took hold of me. Brothers, I do not consider myself yet to have taken hold of it. But one thing I do: Forgetting what is behind and straining toward what is ahead, I press on toward the goal to win the prize for which God has called me heavenward in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 3:12-14).

5. We can no longer be satisfied with this world and its offerings. To be sure, the world never did really satisfy us. The world, which is finite, can never adequately fill beings who are made with an infinite capacity for fellowship with and enjoyment of God. But we thought the world and its values were satisfying. We expected to be filled.

Now we know that it will never work and that all we see about us, though it sometimes has value in a limited, earthly sense, is nevertheless passing away and will one day be completely forgotten. Our houses will be gone; our televisions will be gone; our beautiful furniture and cars and bank accounts (even our IRAs and Keoghs) will have passed away. So these tangible things no longer have any real hold on us. We have died to them, and in their place we have been made alive to God, who is intangible, invisible, and eternal, and of greater reality and substance than anything else we can imagine.

Therefore, we know ourselves to be only pilgrims here. We are passing through. Like Abraham, we are "looking forward to the city with foundations, whose architect and builder is God" (Heb. 11:10).

"A Man Like Me"

Count yourselves dead to sin but alive to God in Christ Jesus. I think of Nehemiah as an illustration of what this means and of what our attitude should be. Nehemiah had determined to rebuild the wall of the ruined and abandoned city of Jerusalem, and he was being opposed by the rulers of the rival city-states around him. Two of his opponents were Sanballat of Samaria and Geshem the Arab. They invited him to a conference to be held about a day's journey from Jerusalem on the plain of Ono. This was a ploy to slow down Nehemiah's project and perhaps even to kidnap or murder him. Nehemiah refused to stop the work and go to the meeting. His words were classic: "I am carrying on a great project and cannot go down. Why should the work stop while I leave it and go down to you?" (Neh. 6:3).

Later when the same people tried to frighten him with rumors of a plot on his life, Nehemiah replied, "Should a man like me run away? Or should one like me go into the temple to save his life? I will not go!" (v. 11).

It is that courageous, self-aware attitude to life that I commend to you. "Shall I go on sinning so that grace may increase?" You should be able to answer, "How can such a one as I do it—I who have died to sin and been made alive to God in Christ Jesus?" For that is what has happened to you, if you are a Christian. You have been removed from your former state to another. Your job is to reckon it so, to count on it. You must say, "A person like me has better things to do than to keep sinning."

Chapter 82.
God's Instruments

Romans 6:12-14

During my college years I majored in English literature, concentrating on the period from Edmund Spencer to William Wordsworth, and the instruction was so good that even now, in strange moments, parts of what I learned then come back to me. This happened as I began my study of Romans 6:12-14. The words that came to mind were from The Prelude. In the sixth book of that fourteen-book poem, William Wordsworth is telling of a walking tour he and a friend took from Switzerland up over the Simplon Pass into Italy. They did not know the route, got lost, descended into a ravine, and there inquired of a peasant where they could find the road to Italy. Wordsworth then wrote:

> Every word that from the peasant's lips > Came in reply, translated by > our feelings, Ended in this—> that we had crossed the Alps.

Those words came to mind as I began this study because, in a sense, that is what has happened to us. For more than five and a half chapters we have been laboring up the majestic mountain of doctrine concerning what God has done for us in salvation. Now, for the very first time, we have passed over the highest ridge to verses that tell what we are to do in response to God's action.

To put it in other words, after many detailed studies, our tour has at last enabled us to cross from the high doctrine of justification-by-grace-through-faith to the doctrine of sanctification.

We were already easing into it in our last study, for in Romans 6:11 we encountered Paul's first exhortation to his readers in this epistle. He told them to "count" upon everything he had previously told them, to "reckon" those things so. Now he comes to four specific exhortations, prefaced by the important connecting word therefore. Because of what he has said, believers are to do the following: "Therefore do not let sin reign in your mortal body so that you obey its evil desires. Do not offer the parts of your body to sin, as instruments of wickedness, but rather offer yourselves to God, as those who have been brought from death to life; and offer the parts of your body to him as instruments of righteousness. For sin shall not be your master, because you are not under law, but under grace" (emphases added).

Principles of Sanctification

Since this is the first direct teaching about sanctification in Romans, it is important that we understand what is being said. To do that, we need to look at this passage as a whole to see what principles about sanctification are taught here. Then we need to apply those teachings in the most practical terms possible.

We start with the principles. What are they?

1. Sin is not dead in Christians, even in the most mature and pious Christians, but rather is something always to be struggled against. I have already said this in a variety of ways in our previous studies, but it needs to be repeated here for two reasons. First, this principle is clear from the passage. There is no point in telling us not to offer the parts of our bodies to sin, as "instruments of wickedness," but rather to offer them to God, "as instruments of righteousness," unless we have a tendency to do the former. The reason we have to fight against sin is that we are sinners.

Second, there are some people who tend toward a kind of perfectionism in which they can claim either that sin is not in them or that the sin that is in them can in time somehow be eradicated. This doctrine is not only wrong (the whole of Scripture stands against it), but it is also a source of frustration for those who have come to believe in their own perfection but who nevertheless constantly find themselves fighting against sin.

2. Sin's hold on us is in or through our bodies. This is something we have not explored earlier

(except in reference to Rom. 6:6). But it is very important, and we need to examine it carefully. When I say that sin's hold on us is in or through our bodies, I do not mean that sin is in our bodies as opposed to being in us, as if by saying that it is in our bodies we are claiming that we are not sinners or that sin is only external to us. Of course, we are sinners, and sin is not merely external to us but rather is within. But here is the point: So far as that new man about whom Paul has been writing is concerned—that new creature I have become by being taken out of Adam by God and by being joined to Christ—that new man is dead to sin, so that sin's hold is no longer actually on me but on my body.

Certainly we cannot miss noticing how directly, literally, and strongly Paul emphasizes our actual physical bodies in these verses. In verse 12 he refers to our "mortal body," that is, the body of our flesh that is dying. In verse 13 he twice refers to "the parts of our bodies, that is, to our hands, feet, eyes, tongues and so forth. It is through these physical parts of our bodies that sin operates and through which it maintains its strong hold on us.

3. 5m can reign in or dominate our bodies. It cannot dominate or destroy that new person that I have become in Christ. That new "me" will always abhor sin and yearn for righteousness—and it will have it, because God is determined to produce the holy character of Christ in his people. But sin can certainly dominate my body. I can become a slave to its cravings. If this were not so, it would be pointless for Paul to say "Do not let sin reign in your mortal body so that you obey its evil desires," as he does.

4. Although sin can reign in or dominate our bodies, it does not need to. In other words, although it is possible for us to "offer the parts of [our] body to sin, as instruments of wickedness," we do not need to do this. On the contrary, being now joined to Jesus Christ, we have his new life within and his power available to us. Having been non posse non peccare ("not able not to sin"), to use Saint Augustine's phrase, we have now become posse non peccare ("able not to sin"). We often do sin; that is why Paul is urging us not to yield our bodies to it. But we no longer need to. We have an alternative.

5. This leads to the last and positive truth: As Christians, we can now offer the parts of our bodies to God as instruments of righteousness. This is the thrust of the passage. It is what Paul is urging on us.

The Parts of Our Bodies

There are many ways one can approach the subject of sanctification. Paul himself does it in several ways. But I do not know a more practical, balanced, or down-to-earth way of speaking about how to live a holy life or grow in righteousness than the way in which Paul does it here. He has given us one easy-to-grasp principle in verse 11: "Count yourselves dead to sin but alive to God in Christ Jesus." Now he tells us how to give practical expression to that great principle. It is by what we do with our bodies. What does that mean? The answers come by considering the body's parts and their potential for doing both good and evil.

The Mind

We begin with the mind because, although we like to think that who we are is largely defined by our minds, and thus separate our minds from our bodies, our minds are actually parts of our bodies, so the victory we need to achieve must begin here. I take you to Romans 12:1-2, where Paul is writing much as he does in Romans 6. "Therefore, I urge you, brothers, in view of God's mercy, to offer your bodies as living sacrifices, holy and pleasing to God—this is your spiritual act of worship. Do not conform any longer to the pattern of this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind. Then you will be able to test and approve what God's will is—his good, pleasing and perfect will" (emphasis added).

That text begins in nearly the same way as Romans 6:12-14 ("Therefore... offer the parts of your body to him..."). But when Paul begins to spell this out, strikingly the very first body part he mentions is the mind.

Have you ever carefully thought through that what you do with your mind will determine a great deal of what you will become as a Christian? If you fill your mind with the products of our secular culture, you will remain secular and sinful. If you fill your head with trashy "pop" novels, you will begin to live like the trashy heroes and heroines whose illicit romances you read about. If you do nothing but watch television, you will begin to think like the scoundrels on "Dallas" or "Falcon Crest" or the weekday soap operas. And you will act like them, too. On the other hand, if you feed your mind on the Bible and Christian publications, train it by godly conversation, and discipline it to critique what you see and hear elsewhere by applying biblical truths to those ideas, you will grow in godliness and become increasingly useful to God. Your mind will become an instrument for righteousness.

Some years ago, John R. W. Stott wrote a book entitled Your Mind Matters in which he bemoaned the growth of "mindless Christianity" and showed how a proper use of our minds is necessary for growth in all areas of our Christian experience. He related it to worship, faith, the quest for holiness, guidance, presenting the gospel to others, and exercising spiritual gifts.

He asks at one point, "Has God spoken to us, and shall we not listen to his words? Has God renewed our mind through Christ, and shall we not think with it? Is God going to judge us by his Word, and shall we not be wise and build our house upon this rock?"

And there is something else: If Christians would offer their minds to God to be renewed by him, they would begin to think and express themselves as Christians and would begin to recover something of what Harry Blamires calls "a Christian mind." Blamires writes:

There is no longer a Christian mind. There is still, of course, a Christian ethic, a Christian practice, and a Christian spirituality. As a moral being, the modern Christian subscribes to a code other than that of the non-Christian. As a member of the Church, he undertakes obligations and observances ignored by the non-Christian. As a spiritual being, in prayer and meditation, he strives to cultivate a dimension of life unexplored by the non-Christian. But as a thinking being, the modern Christian has succumbed to secularization.... Except over a very narrow field of thinking, chiefly touching questions of strictly personal conduct, we Christians in the modern world accept, for the purpose of mental activity, a frame of reference constructed by the secular mind and a set of criteria reflecting secular evaluations.

If the use of the mind is important in sanctification, as I maintain it is, and if we lack "a Christian mind" in our day, as Blamires claims, is it any wonder that so many Christians today are for the most part indistinguishable from the non-Christians around them? Obviously, if we are going to grow in holiness, either as individuals or as a church, we must start here.

Here is a simple goal for you in this area. For every secular book you read, make it your goal also to read one good Christian book, a book that can stretch your mind spiritually.

Our Eyes and Ears

The mind is not the only part of our bodies through which we receive ideas and impressions and which must therefore be offered to God as an instrument of righteousness. We also receive impressions through our eyes and ears. These, too, must be surrendered to God.

Do you remember Achan? He was the Israelite soldier who participated in the battle of Jericho under Joshua but who disobeyed God's command not to take any of the spoils but rather to dedicate them to God. As Achan afterward confessed, "When I saw in the plunder a beautiful robe from Babylonia, two hundred shekels of silver and a wedge of gold weighing fifty shekels, I coveted them and took them. They are hidden in the ground inside my tent with the silver underneath" (Josh. 7:21). Achan was stoned for his sin. But what caused it? The "lust of his eyes" (1 John 2:16). Achan's eyes became instruments of wickedness instead of instruments for his growth in holiness.

It is no different today. Sociologists tell us that by the age of twenty-one the average young person has been bombarded by 300,000 commercial messages, all arguing from the identical basic assumption: personal gratification is the dominant goal in life. Television and other modern means of communication put the acquisition of material things before godliness; in fact, they never mention godliness at all. How, then, are you going to grow in godliness if you are constantly watching television or reading printed ads or listening to secular radio?

Do not get me wrong. I am not advocating an evangelical monasticism in which we retreat from the culture, though it is far better to retreat from it than perish in it. But somehow the secular input must be overbalanced by the spiritual.

One simple goal might be for you to spend as many hours studying your Bible, praying, and going to church as watching television.

Our Tongues

The tongue is also part of the body, and what we do with it is important. James, the Lord's brother, must have thought about this a great deal, because he says more about the tongue and its power for either good or evil than any other writer of Scripture. He wrote, "... the tongue is a small part of the body, but it makes great boasts. Consider what a great forest is set on fire by a small spark. The tongue also is a fire, a world of evil among the parts of the body. It corrupts the whole person, sets the whole course of his life on fire, and is itself set on fire by hell" (James 3:5-6).

If your tongue is not given to God as an instrument of righteousness in his hands, what James writes will be true of you. You do not need to be a Hitler and plunge the world into armed conflict to do evil with your tongue. A little bit of gossip will do. A casual lie or slander will suffice.

What you need to do is use your tongue to praise and serve God. For one thing, you should learn how to recite Scripture with it. You probably can repeat many popular song lyrics. Can you not also use your tongue to speak God's words? How about worship? You should use your tongue to praise God by means of hymns and other Christian songs. Above all, you should use your tongue to witness to others about the person and work of Christ. That is the task Jesus gave you when he said, "You will be my witnesses" (Acts 1:8).

Here is another goal for you if you want to grow in godliness: Use your tongue as much to tell others about Jesus as for idle conversation.

Our Hands and Feet

Our hands and feet determine what we do and where we go. So when we are considering how we might offer the parts of our body to God as instruments of righteousness, let us not forget them.

I think of several important passages in this regard. In 1 Thessalonians 4:11-12, Paul writes of using our hands profitably so we might be self-supporting and not dependent on anybody: "Make it your ambition to lead a quiet life, to mind your own business and to work with your hands, just as we told you, so that your daily life may win the respect of outsiders and so that you will not be dependent on anybody." Similarly, in Ephesians 4:28, Paul writes of working so that we will have something to give to others who are needy: "He who has been stealing must steal no longer, but must work, doing something useful with his own hands, that he may have something to share with those in need."

And what of our feet? A few chapters further on in Romans, Paul writes of the need that others have for the gospel: "How, then, can they call on the one they have not believed in? And how can they believe in the one of whom they have not heard? And how can they hear without someone preaching to them? And how can they preach unless they are sent? As it is written, 'How beautiful are the feet of those who bring good news!'" (Rom. 10:14-15).

Where do your feet take you?

Do you allow them to take you to where Christ is denied or blasphemed? Do they take you to places where sin is openly practiced? Are you spending most of your time soaking up the world's entertainment or loitering in bars or the "hot" singles clubs? You will not grow in godliness there. On the contrary, you will fall from righteous conduct. Instead, let your feet carry you into the company of those who love and serve the Lord. Or, when you go into the world, let it be for the purpose of serving the world and witnessing to its people in Christ's name.

Here is another goal: For every special secular function you attend, determine to attend a Christian function also. And when you go to a secular function, do so as a witness by word and action for the Lord Jesus Christ.

A Warfare and a Race

What we are actually engaged in is spiritual warfare, an ongoing battle against sin, for our own growth in grace and for the good of others. And, like all soldiers who are facing some great conflict, we are to train ourselves physically and steel our wills for the enterprise.

Paul thought in these terms, sometimes speaking of a warfare in which the followers of Christ are to clothe themselves with God's armor (cf. Eph. 6:10-18), sometimes speaking of a race. "Fight the good fight of the faith..." he says in 1 Timothy 6:12. "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith," he says in 2 Timothy 4:7.

I like the way Paul puts it in 1 Corinthians: "Do you not know that in a race all the runners run, but only one gets the prize? Run in such a way as to get the prize. Everyone who competes in the games goes into strict training. They do it to get a crown that will not last; but we do it to get a crown that will last forever. Therefore I do not run like a man running aimlessly; I do not fight like a man beating the air. No, I beat my body and make it my slave so that after I have preached to others, I myself will not be disqualified for the prize" (1 Cor. 9:24-27).

Perhaps you have seen the recent television advertisement for a certain brand of athletic shoe in which six or seven very energetic young people are going through their workouts. The scenes shift quickly and the tempo increases rapidly throughout the commercial until it all suddenly comes to an abrupt halt and three words appear on the screen in bold black letters: "Just do it."

That is what I recommend to you. You have been waiting through five and a half chapters of Romans for something to do. Now you have that something. You know what it is. So do it. Just do it. "Do not offer the parts of your body to sin, as instruments of righteousness, but rather offer yourselves to God, as those who have been brought from death to life; and offer the parts of your body to him as instruments of righteousness."

Why should you do this? Why should you submit to such rigorous training? It is not because you are driven to do it. It is because you have been liberated from sin by the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ and want to do it. You want to live for him. This is why Paul ends by saying, "For sin shall not be your master, because you are not under law, but under grace" (v. 14).

Chapter 83.
Whose Slave Are You?

Romans 6:15-18

The point of this next study is difficult for most people to accept, so I want to state it simply at the beginning and allow the rest of the chapter to expound and defend it. The point is this: There is no such thing as absolute freedom for anyone. No human is free to do everything he or she may want to do. There is one being in the universe who is totally free, of course. That is God. But all others are limited by or enslaved by someone or something. As a result, the only meaningful question in this area is: Who or what are you serving?

Ray C. Stedman, pastor of the Peninsula Bible Church in Palo Alto, California, tells of walking down the street in Los Angeles one day and seeing a man coming toward him with a sign hung over his shoulders. The sign read: "I am a slave for Christ." After the man had passed him, Stedman turned around to look after this rather eccentric individual and saw that on his back there was another sign that said: "Whose slave are you?"

That is exactly the point of this passage. Since you and I are human beings and not God, we can never be autonomous. We must either be slaves to sin or slaves of Jesus Christ.

But here is the wonderful and very striking thing: To be a slave of Jesus Christ is true freedom.

The Chapter's Second Half

All this flows from our study of Romans 6, but we need to back up a bit to find our place in Paul's argument.

The verses we are considering here are verses 15-18, the start of a longer section that extends to the end of the chapter. A glance at this section shows that it is parallel to the first half of the chapter, that is, to verses 1-14. Each section deals with a nearly identical question. The first verse of section one asks, "What shall we say, then? Shall we go on sinning so that grace may increase?" The first verse of section two raises the same issue: "What then? Shall we sin because we are not under law but under grace?" (v. 15).

These questions are followed by identical responses: "By no means!" (vv. 2, 15). From this point on, the two sections follow parallel tracks as Paul explains why it is impossible for the believer in Christ to continue in sin and why, by contrast, Christians must yield the parts of their bodies to God as instruments of righteousness. These arguments are so close to one another that it is possible to lift terms from one section and transfer them to the other without any real change in meaning.

Yet the two halves of Romans 6 are not identical. They have the same objective—to show that the believer in Christ cannot go on sinning. But they make this important point in different, though complementary, ways.

The first section comes out of the discussion in chapter 5, in which Paul argued that the Christian is not under law but is under grace and that grace will triumph. He shows that grace does not lead to sin, the reason being that we have been joined to Christ. If we have been joined to Christ, the past is behind and there is no place for us to go in life but forward in righteous conduct. The second section comes out of the discussion in Romans 6:1-14, particularly verse 14, in which Paul rejects law as a vehicle of righteousness. He argues that freedom from law does not lead to sin either. The reason he gives is that we have been freed from law, not to become autonomous creatures (which we cannot be on any account), but to be slaves of God. We must be slaves to righteousness.

Two Errors

Paul was answering objections to the doctrine of salvation by grace that were coming from two sides, just as they come to us today.

On one side were Jewish traditionalists with a commitment to the law of Moses. They argued that if law is rejected as a way of salvation, which Paul obviously was doing, immorality and all other vices inevitably follow. Paul shows that it does not work that way. In fact, he shows the opposite. He shows:

1. The law does not lead to righteousness, for the simple reason that it is unable to produce righteousness in anyone. The law can only condemn.
2. Paradoxically, it is only by being delivered from the law and its condemnation, through union with Jesus Christ, that we are empowered to do what the law requires.

The other objection came not from Jewish legalists, but from people we call Antinomians, those who reject the law not only as a way of salvation but even as an expression of proper conduct. Antinomianism says, "Since we are free from law, we can do anything we please. We are free to go on sinning. In fact, we can wallow in it."

Paul answers both of these errors in this chapter of Romans.

Five Sound Reasons

"Shall we sin because we are not under law but under grace?" The answer, as we already know by now, is: "By no means!" "Why not?" we ask. In this section Paul gives five sound reasons.

1. Sin is slavery. The first reason Christians must not sin, even though they are not under law but under grace, is that sin is actually slavery, and it would be folly to be delivered from slavery only to return to it again. The difficulty here is that sin is rarely seen by us in this way, that is, in its true colors. Instead of being presented as slavery, it is usually described as the very essence of freedom. This was what the devil told Eve in the Garden of Eden when he argued, "Don't be bound by God's word. Be free. Eat of the tree and become as God, knowing good and evil."

Years ago, before the current thaw in Sino-American relations, some Christians in Hong Kong had an interview with an eighty-two-year-old woman who had come out of China just a short while before. She was a believer in Christ, but her vocabulary was filled with the terminology of communism, which was all she had been hearing for decades. One of her favorite expressions was "the liberation."

The interviewers asked her, "When you were back in China, were you free to gather together with other Christians to worship?"

"Oh, no," she answered. "Since the liberation, no one is permitted to gather together for Christian services."

"But surely you were able to get together in small groups to discuss the Christian faith," they continued.

"No," she said. "We were not. Since the liberation, all such meetings are forbidden."

"Were you free to read your Bible?"

"Since the liberation, no one is free to read the Bible."

The conversation shows that "freedom" is not in the word but in the reality. Remember that, the next time someone suggests that you have to sin to be free. Merely attaching the word freedom to sin does not make sin a way of liberation. The truth is that sin is bondage. It enslaves us so that we are unable to escape its grasp later, even if we want to. If you give way to sensual passions, you will become a slave to those passions. If you give way to greed, you will become a slave to greed. So also for every other vice and wrongdoing.

2. Sin leads to death. The second reason we must not sin, even though we are not under law but under grace, is that sin leads to death. Paul says this several times in these verses: "sin, which leads to death" (v. 16), "Those things result in death!" (v. 21), and "For the wages of sin is death" (v. 23).

Again, this is not what we are usually told. It is not what the devil told Eve either. God had said, "You must not eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, for when you eat of it you will surely die" (Gen. 2:17). The devil countered, "You will not surely die.... For God knows that when you eat of it your eyes will be opened, and you will be like God, knowing good and evil" (Gen. 3:4-5).

Here was a true crisis for the woman. God said, "You will die." The devil said, "You will not surely die." Who was right? Who was she to believe?

The woman decided to resolve the dilemma for herself. She examined the tree and saw that it was "good for food and pleasing to the eye, and also desirable for gaining wisdom" (Gen. 3:6). She concluded, "How can it be wrong when it feels so right?" So she took some of the fruit, ate it, and then gave some to Adam, who also ate of it.

What happened? They died! They died in their spirits instantly, for the fellowship they had enjoyed with God up to this point was broken, which they showed by hiding from God when he came to them later in the garden. Their personalities began to decay, for they started to lie and shift the blame to one another. At last their bodies also died, as God said: "... dust you are and to dust you will return" (Gen. 3:19).

The only bright spot was that God also graciously promised a Redeemer who would save them from their sin.

Do not listen to those who tell you that sin is harmless. Above all, do not trust your own judgment in these matters. You are not able to judge in such situations. You must trust God, who tells you that to sin is to die. In fact, being a sinner, you are already dying. Your moral life is decaying. Your body is inclining to the grave. One day you will experience the second death, which is to be separated from God in hell forever—unless God saves you first. The only sensible reaction to sin is to turn from it and seek salvation in the Lord Jesus Christ.

3. Christians have been delivered from sin's slavery. The third reason Christians are not to continue in sin, even though they are not under law but under grace, is that they have been delivered by Jesus from sin's tyranny if they truly are Christians. This is so wonderful that Paul actually breaks into a doxology or "praise to God" at this point, saying, "But thanks be to God that, though you used to be slaves to sin... you have been set free from sin and have become slaves to righteousness" (vv. 17-18).

This is the meaning of what former Princeton Seminary professor B. B. Warfield called the most "precious" terms in the Christian's vocabulary: "Redeemer" and "redemption." Redemption means to buy out of slavery to sin. This was accomplished for us by Jesus, who is our Redeemer. We were slaves to sin, that cruel taskmaster. But Jesus paid the price of our redemption by his death. He purchased us with his blood: "For you know that it was not with perishable things such as silver or gold that you were redeemed from the empty way of life handed down to you from your forefathers, but with the precious blood of Christ, a lamb without blemish or defect" (1 Peter 1:18-19).

This is the very purpose of the atonement. How, then, can those who have been redeemed return to sinful living? To do so would be to repudiate Christ, to turn from everything he stands for. It would be apostasy. No true Christian can do it.

4. The same work that has delivered Christians from sin's slavery has also made them slaves of God, which is true freedom. The fourth of Paul's arguments for why Christians cannot continue in sin, even though they are not under law but under grace, is that the same act of Christ that has delivered us from sin has also made us "slaves of God" (v. 22). By his act of redemption, Jesus has purchased men and women for himself, that is, to serve him.

"Ah," says someone. "What gain is that? What advantage is it to be freed from one master if all it means is that we become slaves of another?"

Well, it would be a significant gain even if we were slaves in a physical sense and were set free from a cruel master to become a slave to one who was kind and had our best interests at heart. That would be a welcome change, and it is part of the picture, for God is as good, kind, and loving a master as sin is cruel and harmful. But there is more to it than that. The Bible teaches that this "slavery" actually brings freedom.

What is this freedom? It is not autonomy, a license to do absolutely anything at all. True freedom is "the ability to fulfill one's destiny, to function in terms of one's ultimate goal." Real freedom means doing what is right.

Do you remember the conversation the Lord Jesus Christ had with the Jewish religious leaders of his day, as recorded in John's Gospel? Jesus had been speaking about the source of his teachings, and some of the Jews had believed on him in a rudimentary way. So he encouraged them to remain with him and continue to learn from him, saying, "If you hold to my teaching [that is, continue in it], you are really my disciples. Then you will know the truth, and the truth will set you free" (John 8:31-32).

This infuriated some of his listeners, presumably those who were not true believers, because they did not like the suggestion that they were not free—just as many resent any similar suggestion today. They replied, "We are Abraham's descendants and have never been slaves of anyone. How can you say that we shall be set free?" (v. 33). This was a ridiculous answer, of course. The Jews had been slaves to the Egyptians for many years prior to the exodus. During the period of the judges there were at least seven occasions when the nation came under the rule of foreigners. There was also the seventy-year-long Babylonian captivity. In fact, even while they were talking to Jesus they were being watched over by occupying Roman soldiers, and they were carrying coins in their pockets that testified to Rome's domination of their economy. It was this latter fact that probably made them so sensitive to the suggestion that they were not truly free.

But instead of reminding them of these obvious facts, Jesus answered on a spiritual level, saying, "I tell you the truth, everyone who sins is a slave to sin.... So if the Son sets you free, you will be free indeed" (vv. 34, 36).

What kind of freedom was Jesus talking about? True freedom, of course, the only real freedom there is. It is not liberty to do just anything at all. If we choose sin, the result is bondage. True freedom comes through knowing the gospel and being committed to the Lord Jesus Christ in his service.

Can I put this sharply? The only real freedom you are ever going to know, either in this life or in the life to come, is the freedom of serving Jesus Christ. And this means a life of righteousness. Anything else is really slavery, regardless of what the world may promise you through its lies and false teaching.

5. The end of this second, desirable slavery is righteousness. This leads to Paul's last point, the fifth reason why Christians must not continue in sin, even though they have been freed from law and are under grace. It is that the end of this second, desirable slavery to God and Jesus Christ is righteousness. True Christianity can never lead to license, the accusation refuted by Paul in this passage. Since it is liberation from sin in order to become a servant of God and of Jesus Christ, Christianity must inevitably lead to what God desires, which is righteousness.

The Obedience of Faith

I close this study by asking you to look at one more word: obedience. It occurs in verse 16 in the phrase "slaves... to obedience," and it is amplified by the verb obey, which occurs three times more in these verses (once in verse 16, and twice in verse 17). This is an important idea.

It is puzzling, too, at least at first glance.

Why? Because in verse 16 it occurs as the opposite of sin ("slaves to sin... or to obedience"), which does not seem exactly right to us. Instead of "obedience" we would expect the word righteousness. Then, in verse 17, it occurs where we would normally expect the idea of "faith" ("you wholeheartedly obeyed the form of teaching to which you were entrusted"). We would more naturally say, "You wholeheartedly believed the gospel."

One reason why Paul uses the word obedience is that it carries through the image he has been developing, namely that of being a slave either to sin or of Jesus Christ. It is the function of a slave to obey his or her master. But the use of the term goes beyond this, since obedience is an essential requirement of all who would follow Christ. And not just afterward, as if we are called first to believe and then to obey. Obedience is the very essence of believing. It is what belief is all about.

When I am teaching about faith I usually say that faith has three elements: (1) an intellectual element (we must believe in something; this is the gospel); (2) an emotional element (the content of that gospel must touch us personally); and (3) commitment (we must give ourselves to Jesus in personal and often costly discipleship). It is in this last area that obedience is so critical. For, if obedience is not present, we have not committed ourselves to Christ, even though we may believe in him in some sense. And without that commitment we are not saved; we are not true Christians.

Have you ever considered how important obedience is in the Bible's treatment of its chief characters? I will cite two examples.

The first is Joshua. Obedience was the chief characteristic of this very great man's life, for at the beginning of his story he was challenged to obey God in all things—"Be careful to obey all the law my servant Moses gave you; do not turn from it to the right or to the left, that you may be successful wherever you go" (Josh. 1:7b)—and this is precisely what he did, to the very end. His whole life was marked by obedience.

The other example is Abraham, who was such a giant of faith that he is praised for his faith four times in Hebrews 11. His faith was so great that when God promised him a son in his old age, though he was past the age of engendering a child and his wife Sarah was past the age of conceiving one, Abraham "did not waver through unbelief regarding the promise of God, but was strengthened in his faith and gave glory to God, being fully persuaded that God had power to do what he had promised" (Rom. 4:20-21).

But even this was not the highest achievement of Abraham's faith. It is not the act for which he is chiefly praised in Hebrews.

The high point of Abraham's long life of faith was reached when God told him to sacrifice his son Isaac on Mount Moriah. Abraham showed an incredible faith here, believing that if God told him to sacrifice his son and if his son had not yet had the children God had promised he would have, then God would have to raise Isaac from the dead in order to fulfill his promise (cf. Heb. 11:19). But, in Genesis, where the story is told, the quality for which Abraham is praised by God is not faith but obedience: "Because you have done this and have not withheld your son, your only son, I will surely bless you and make your descendants as numerous as the stars in the sky and as the sand on the seashore. Your descendants will take possession of the cities of their enemies, and through your offspring all nations on earth will be blessed, because you have obeyed me" (Gen. 22:15-18, emphasis added).

There is no escaping it! Either we obey sin, which leads to death, and are enslaved by it, or we have been freed from sin to serve God. If we have been freed from sin, we will serve God. There is just no other option.

Chapter 84.
The Bottom Line

Romans 6:19-22

We are coming to the end of Romans 6 and therefore to the end of a very important Bible chapter dealing with the Christian life. Strangely, the chapter is something of a parenthesis, as I pointed out when we began to study it—just as the following chapter, Romans 7, is also a parenthesis.

Paul had been talking about the permanent nature of salvation. This was his theme in chapter 5, and it is the dominant note of the magnificent eighth chapter that is still to come. Between these two chapters he has been exploring the errors of people who would say, on the one hand, "If salvation by the grace of God in Jesus Christ is a sure thing—if it cannot be lost—why should we not go on living a life of sin? We will be saved anyway" and, on the other hand, "If we are saved by the grace of God apart from the Old Testament law, why shouldn't we be lawless?" In the verses immediately preceding the ones we will study here, the apostle has answered the first question by showing that being a Christian means being delivered from a slavery to sin so that we might become willing slaves of God, which is true freedom. We cannot go on serving the old master.

This means that "being a Christian" and "not being a Christian" are two mutually exclusive categories. Therefore, once we have passed from our former unbelieving state and become a Christian, we have no choice but to go forward in the Christian life, which means serving God in holiness.

John R. W. Stott puts it like this:

Here then are two completely different lives, lives totally opposed to one another—the life of the old self, and the life of the new. They are what Jesus termed the broad road that leads to destruction, and the narrow road that leads to life. Paul calls them two slaveries. By birth we are slaves of sin; by grace and faith we have become slaves of God. The slavery of sin yields no return, except a steady, moral deterioration and finally death. The slavery of God yields the precious return of sanctification and finally eternal life. The argument of this section, then, is that our conversion—this act of yielding or surrender to God—leads to a status of slavery, and slavery involves obedience.

Whom Will You Serve?

Paul has been using the analogy of slavery to make his point, a fact he alludes to in verse 19, saying, "I put this in human terms because you are weak in your natural selves." And the point has been that in life we must serve either of two masters. Either we must serve sin, or we must serve God. There is no neutral ground.

This is Paul's main point. But do we really believe this? If we understood it and really believed it, would we sin as frequently or as easily as we sometimes do? Would we take sin lightly and be as casual in the pursuit of righteousness as we often are?

The Doctrine of the Two Ways

What Paul has been describing in these verses is the doctrine of the two ways, which is found throughout the Bible.

The best-known statement of it is in the words of Jesus recorded in the Sermon on the Mount.
The last section of that sermon lists a series of contrasts among which choices must be made: two gates and two roads, two trees and their two types of fruit, two houses and two foundations. The part regarding the two ways says, "Enter through the narrow gate. For wide is the gate and broad is the road that leads to destruction, and many enter through it.

But small is the gate and narrow the road that leads to life, and only a few find it" (Matt. 7:13-14). The point is that a person can be on only one of these two roads, because the roads are entirely different and lead in opposite directions.

The classic statement of the doctrine is in Psalm 1, which contains the very points Paul makes in Romans 6. It describes two different categories of people: "the wicked" and "the righteous."

The psalm shows the progression within each of these two categories. On the one hand, there is progression in wickedness. Those in the first category begin by "walk[ing] in the counsel of the wicked," then "stand in the way of sinners" and finally "sit in the seat of mockers" (v. 1). In other words, they become increasingly settled in ungodliness by their practice of it. Moreover, their lives bear no fruit. They are barren plants, "like chaff that the wind blows away" (v. 4). On the other hand, there is progression in godliness. The righteous man's "delight is in the law of the LORD," and he produces lasting fruit; he is like a "tree planted by streams of water, which yields its fruit in season and whose leaf does not wither. Whatever he does prospers" (vv. 2-3).

Finally, the psalm gives the ends of the two types of people: "Therefore the wicked will not stand in the judgment, nor sinners in the assembly of the righteous" (v. 5), that is, the company of the righteous in heaven. "For the LORD watches over the way of the righteous, but the way of the wicked will perish" (v. 6). The end of the righteous is eternal life. The end of the wicked is judgment.

It should be evident that this is exactly what Paul is saying in these verses, though his slavery analogy does not speak of scoundrels collecting by the gates of the city or the scattering of useless chaff at harvest time. Nor does he refer to the "slaves to God" as fruitful trees. But he does describe two different pathways.

The first path starts with slavery to sin. It is the condition into which each of us is born, for none of us is born righteous. Sin is our cruel master; it drives us along. By ourselves we are unable to escape this harsh tyranny.

This leads to "impurity and to ever-increasing wickedness" (v. 19). Impurity refers to sin as it affects the individual. It means personal defilement, particularly by sins that are opposed to chastity. Wickedness refers to violation of the divine or human laws. Robert Haldane says that the former "refers principally to the pollution, the other to the guilt of sin." Moreover, this wickedness is progressive! The Greek text is particularly suggestive at this point, for it literally reads "you have yielded your members slaves... to wickedness unto wickedness." In other words, sin is a downhill path, as Paul has already shown in Romans 1. Those who begin by walking in the counsel of the wicked soon find themselves standing in the way of sinners and eventually sitting in the seat of mockers.

The end of this destructive path is death, which Paul mentions three times in this section (vv. 16, 21, 23). This does not mean physical death, since the righteous as well as the wicked experience physical death. It means the full penalty of sin, which is eternal punishment.

The second path starts with slavery to God, which God accomplishes in us and which is actually freedom. This path leads to "righteousness," and righteousness leads to "holiness" (v. 19). These words parallel the principle that "impurity" leads to "ever-increasing wickedness" and describe the contrary experience of one who has been claimed by God. "Righteousness" in this context means primarily righteous acts. "Holiness" is an inner state characterized by conformity to the will and character of God. The phrase "righteousness leading to holiness" teaches that the practice of outward godliness leads to inward godliness; that is, doing right things actually brings a person along the pathway of spiritual growth.

The end of this healthy, developing path is eternal life (v. 22). In this context "eternal life" refers to the fruit, or end result, of a godly life, not the life itself or its reward. It refers to eternal fellowship with God, who is its source.

Just Do It!

The point of Paul's analysis is to exhort Christians to live holy lives, though the application is made at the beginning of the paragraph rather than at the end: "Just as you used to offer the parts of your body in slavery to impurity and to ever-increasing wickedness, so now offer the parts of your body in slavery to righteousness leading to holiness" (v. 19b).

What more can be said about this application?

The first thing we notice is that it is an almost identical exhortation to the one found in verse 13 in the first half of the chapter. At that point Paul had already shown that the one who has become a Christian has died to sin and been made alive to God in Christ. His argument was that, because this is so, it is for us to recognize this change and act on it: "Count yourselves dead to sin but alive to God in Christ." How are we to do that? What does it mean to count ourselves dead to sin but alive in Christ? The answer was: "Do not offer the parts of your body to sin, as instruments of wickedness, but rather offer yourselves to God, as those who have been brought from death to life; and offer the parts of your body to him as instruments of righteousness" (v. 13).

Notice that this is precisely what Paul says all over again in verse 19. He refers to the parts of our bodies and contrasts our former offering of them to sin with our present offering of them to righteousness. The only noticeable difference is that in verse 19 he speaks about slavery to sin versus slavery to righteousness, which fits in with the new analogy he is unfolding.

Why does Paul repeat himself like this? Obviously to make the point that there is just no other way for us to grow in righteousness. There is no secret formula for holiness, no magic recipe.

The only means is to realize what God has done for us and then discipline the parts of our bodies—our minds, eyes, ears, tongues, hands, and feet—to act accordingly.

I cannot emphasize this point enough, because we live in a day in which Christian people are shirking hard work and are searching (if they even bother to search) for some easy solution or quick fix. We look for quick solutions in our physical and emotional lives on a regular basis. If we are depressed, we take in a movie, go shopping, or pop a pill. If we are having trouble with a personal relationship, we go to a weekend seminar to pick up pointers—or to a singles bar to pick up some new person.

We Christians find it easy to carry this outlook into our spiritual lives. Some who do this look for a special "victory" formula ("let go and let God," "take it by faith," or some other handy slogan). Some search for a powerful emotional experience. Still others pray for miracles.

But these are not God's answers. God is not withholding something from us, some secret we need to seek or for which we should pray. God has already done everything necessary for our salvation and given us everything we need to live a consistent Christian life. So, if we fail to do it, it is either because we have not been taught what God has done and therefore do not know how to conduct ourselves as Christians, or we are just too sinful or lazy.

D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones wrote, "You have already received 'all things that pertain unto a life of godliness.' You do not need another experience. You do not need some new gift. You have been given everything in Christ; you are 'in him' from the beginning of your Christian life. You are just a slacker and a cad, just lazy and indolent, indeed 'a liar,' if you are not living this life." He says that this is the New Testament way of preaching holiness and sanctification, and he is right.

Our Reasonable Service

What is the bottom line? Lloyd-Jones spells it out in the six propositions.

1. The teaching about sanctification in verse 19, like the teaching in verses 11-13, is an exhortation. In fact, it is a command. Before our conversion we were under the control of sin, and sin commanded us to give the parts of our body to it for wicked acts. We obeyed sin in those days; we had to. Now we have passed under the command of God, and God commands us to offer our bodies to him for acts of righteousness.

2. Being an exhortation, the command to offer our bodies to God for his purposes is something we must do. Indeed, it is something we can do. If this command had been laid upon us prior to our conversion, we would not have been able to do it. We would have been non posse non peccare ("not able not to sin"), as Augustine said. But being freed from bondage to sin and having been made willing slaves of God by the new birth, we are now posse non pecare ("able not to sin"). To put it in positive terms, we are now able to obey God, do good works, and live righteous lives.

3. The command to yield the parts of our bodies as instruments of righteousness is based on something that has already happened to us. That is, something that has already happened, not something that may happen or will yet happen to us.

Here is an exercise for you. Go through Romans 6 and underline the verbs that tell, in a past tense, what has happened to those of us who are Christians. You will find that you are underlining nearly every significant verb: "we died to sin" (v. 2); "all of us... were baptized into Christ Jesus... into his death" (v. 3); "we were therefore buried with him" (v. 4); "we have been united with him like this in his death" (v. 5); "our old self was crucified with him" (v. 6); "we died with Christ" (v. 8); "you wholeheartedly obeyed the form of teaching to which you were entrusted" (v. 17); "you have been set free from sin and have become slaves to righteousness" (v. 18); "you have been set free from sin and have become slaves to God" (v. 22). These verbs describe the experience of all who are truly Christians. It is because their experience can be described in these terms, because of what has already happened, that a life of holiness through the power of God is possible for them.

4. The New Testament approach to sanctification is therefore to get us to realize our position and act accordingly. The New Testament does not tell us to be what we will become. Rather, it tells us to be what we are. Lloyd-Jones says, "I cannot find anywhere in the New Testament, teaching which says, 'Christ has been crucified for you; what remains now is that you should be crucified with Christ.' That has been popular teaching; but it is not in the New Testament. Every man who is a Christian has already been crucified with Christ.... It is because that has already happened, it is because that is true of us, that this command... is addressed to us."

5. This demand is utterly reasonable. In fact, anything contrary to it is unreasonable. Before we were saved, we served sin; that was consistent and reasonable. But now that we are converted, it is equally reasonable that we should serve God.

Do you understand that Paul is reasoning with us here? A moment ago I said to look at Romans 6 for verbs that tell what has happened to us in our salvation. Now go back and look at it again, noting the deductions Paul draws from those actions: "We died to sin, how can we live in it any longer?" (v. 2); "If we have been united with him like this in his death, we will certainly also be united with him in his resurrection" (v. 5); "Therefore do not let sin reign in your mortal body so that you obey its evil desires" (v. 12); "For sin shall not be your master, because you are not under law, but under grace" (v. 14); "What then? Shall we sin because we are not under law but under grace? By no means!" (v. 15); "Just as you used to offer the parts of your body in slavery to impurity and to ever-increasing wickedness, so now offer them in slavery to righteousness..." (v. 19b).

The Bible says that if you are living a sinful life, your conduct is inconsistent with any Christian profession you might have made. If you claim to be a Christian, you must therefore straighten your life out, or you dare not long assume you are a true believer. That would be presumptuous! God forbid that any of us should continue sinning, thinking that grace will abound.

6. The failures we have in trying to live a holy life are due almost entirely to our failure to realize these truths or to our laziness or sin in failing to apply them to our conduct. Do you remember Jesus' words about sanctification? He said in his prayer for his disciples: "Sanctify them by the truth; your word is truth" (John 17:17). This is identical doctrine to what we have in Paul's writings. It is truth for today.

Not long ago I was rereading an essay by C. S. Lewis called "The Weight of Glory." As he ends this essay, Lewis urges us to think of people as eternal creatures who are daily becoming either more and more like God or more and more like the devil. He writes:

It is a serious thing to live in a society of possible gods and goddesses, to remember that the dullest and most uninteresting person you can talk to may one day be a creature which, if you saw it now, you would be strongly tempted to worship, or else a horror and a corruption such as you now meet, if at all, only in a nightmare.... There are no ordinary people. You have never talked to a mere mortal. Nations, cultures, arts, civilizations—these are mortal, and their life is to ours as the life of a gnat. But it is immortals whom we joke with, work with, marry, snub, and exploit—immortal horrors or everlasting splendors.

Lewis says that we would treat others better if we would learn to think of them in those terms. But if that is true of others, it is also obviously true of ourselves. What we do now has bearing on what we will one day be. And it works the other way, too. What we will be must determine what we do now. If we have been saved by Jesus and are going to be like Jesus, we must start living like him and for him, day by day.

Chapter 85.
Sin's Wages and God's Gift

Romans 6:23

Scattered throughout the Bible are verses that even the most casual reader at once perceives to be extraordinarily important. It is not that the other verses are unimportant, for "All Scripture is God-breathed and is useful..." (2 Tim. 3:16). But certain texts stand out above others as striking summaries of very important doctrines, particularly those that lie at the very heart of the gospel.

Romans 6:23 is one such verse. It says, "For the wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord."

This is one of the most familiar verses in the Bible. For one thing, it appears in Romans, a particularly well-known book. But it is also short and easy to memorize. There are only twenty words here (nineteen in Greek); only three of these have more than one syllable, and they are certainly not difficult: "wages," "eternal," and "Jesus." Romans 6:23 has been taught to millions of Sunday school children and has been incorporated into gospel presentations in scores of tracts, booklets, and studies. In many of these presentations the text comes immediately after Romans 3:23 ("for all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God") and before the best-known verse of all: John 3:16 ("For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life").

Charles Haddon Spurgeon called Romans 6:23 "a Christian proverb, a golden sentence, a divine statement of truth worthy to be written across the sky." He wrote, "As Jesus said of the woman who anointed him for his burial, 'Wherever this gospel shall be preached in the whole world, there shall also this, that this woman hath done, be told for a memorial of her'; so I may say, 'Wherever the gospel is preached, there shall this golden sentence, which the apostle has let fall, be repeated as proof of his clearness in the faith.' Here you have both the essence of the gospel and a statement of that misery from which the gospel delivers all who believe."

Paul seems to have loved using short, expressive statements, no doubt because they were so useful in his front-line missionary teaching.

The Two Ways

The appeal of this verse is in its summary of the doctrine of the two ways, which we were officially introduced to in the last study but have been studying in one way or another throughout this entire chapter and even in Romans 5. This doctrine has been presented repeatedly, though in different formats.

In Romans 5 it was expressed as the distinction between being in Adam and being in Christ. The two ways were traced from the contrary actions of the two federal heads of mankind. Adam, we were told, disobeyed God; his disobedience brought condemnation and death to his posterity. Jesus obeyed God; his obedience resulted in justification and life for those who are joined to him. Toward the end of the chapter the contrast was described as being between the law and grace. Law worked sin, and the result of sin was death. Grace results in righteousness and eternal life.

In Romans 6 the case is similar, only here the two ways have been described as outworkings of two slaveries. On the one hand, there is a slavery to sin. Each of us is born into this slavery, which leads to "impurity and to ever-increasing wickedness" (v. 19). The end is death (v. 21). On the other hand, there is a slavery to God, which leads to "righteousness leading to holiness" (v. 19) and ends in life (v. 22).

This is what is summarized in our text. It is what Paul means when he says that "the wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord."

The Way of Death

When the apostle contrasts "death" with "eternal life," as he does in this text, we immediately think of the state of souls beyond the grave. That is, we think of eternal life as the life of God's children in heaven and of eternal death (in Revelation it is called a "second death") as the death, accompanied by punishment, of those who die apart from Jesus Christ. That is part of the picture, of course, an important part. But we need to remember that, in Romans 6, Paul is writing about the present life of the believer and stressing that, having been freed from slavery to sin, a Christian must thereafter live to serve God.

Although these are eternal ends—death and life—we must not overlook that there is also a present death and a present life to be considered.

I would go even further than this to say that in this verse Paul is particularly concerned with the effects of sin and righteousness in this life and not with the life to come. My reason for thinking this is that he uses the word opsōnia ("wages") to describe sin's effects. This word was used of the daily food ration (literally, "fish ration") given to a Roman soldier for his service. In other words, it does not refer to a large payment dispensed at the end of the soldier's period of service but rather to something that was measured out to him day by day. It is the individual's present state, then, not his future state, that is in view.

In other words, we have a parallel in this verse to what we have already seen in Romans 1 regarding the "wrath" of God. To our minds, "wrath" also suggests something occurring at the end of time: God's final judgment on sin to be meted out at the last day. That is certainly one aspect of it. But what Paul is actually talking about in Romans 1 is the present outworking of God's wrath against men and women, as seen in the downward life-path of those who have rejected him.

This is extremely relevant.

Not long ago I was reading the classic study of sin, originally published in 1973 by Karl Menninger of the famous Menninger Clinic of Topeka, Kansas. It is called Whatever Became of Sin? Menninger is a psychiatrist, and what had disturbed him and caused him to write this book was an awareness, based on his careful observation and counseling, that as a concept "sin" has all but disappeared from our national consciousness—with disastrous results.

What is sin? Menninger defines it in classical language: "Sin is transgression of the law of God; disobedience of the divine will; moral failure. Sin is failure to realize in conduct and character the moral ideal, at least as fully as possible under existing circumstances; failure to do as one ought towards one's fellow man."

What became of sin? Briefly put, "sin" first became "crime" (transgression of the law of man rather than transgression of the law of God), and then "crime" became "symptoms." Symptoms were caused by factors thought to be external to the offender and therefore things for which he or she was clearly not responsible.

Menninger refers to what happened by a satire about psychiatry written and sung by Anna Russell.

> At three I had a feeling of > Ambivalence toward my brothers.
> And so it follows naturally I poisoned all my lovers.
> But now I'm happy; I have learned
> The lesson this has taught:
> That everything I do that's wrong Is someone else's fault.

"Can we have moral health without responsibility?" asks Menninger. "Or mental health without moral health?" He suggests that psychiatrists may actually have compounded the problem by "neglecting the availability of help for some individuals whose sins are greater than their symptoms and whose burdens are greater than they can bear."

But that is not the reason I refer to Menninger, though this background is necessary for understanding why I quote him. The reason I refer to him is that he is convinced from his own experience of dealing with many thousands of patients that sin is a reality, regardless of what we may have done with the idea of it—"There are no substitutes for words like 'sin' and 'grace,'" he argues —and that sin is destructive. In one of the later sections of the book he analyzes what he calls "The Old Seven Deadly Sins (and Some New Ones)" and concludes wisely, "The long-term consequences of hate [the word that best summarizes the many types of sin, in his opinion] are self-destruction. Thus the wages of sin really are death (my emphasis)."

How does this operate? Menninger suggests that self-destruction is observable in each of the old "deadly sins."

Pride (of power, knowledge, or virtue) destroys relationships. It turns us into people who look on others as possessions to be amassed, exploited, or controlled.

Lust (which embraces all sexual sins) destroys one's personality. It weakens loyalty, undercuts trust, and destroys integrity.

Gluttony destroys the body—in whatever form it appears, whether as overindulgence in food, drink, or drugs. "Gluttony... is sinful [because] it represents a... love which is self-destructive."

Anger destroys others, whether by violence or by words only. To wound another's pride or status by words is "to kill him" slowly.

Sloth destroys opportunities and ambitions.

Envy, greed, avarice, and affluence destroy contentment, even a proper sense of freedom and nobility. Menninger tells of a very rich man who had been brought to him by his relatives because he had tried to commit suicide. Life no longer held anything of interest for him. "I haven't the slightest idea what to do with all my money," he said. "I don't need it, but I can't bear to give it away."

"So you decide to kill yourself in order to get away from it," Menninger replied.

"What else can I do?"

"Could you establish a memorial to your beloved father, endowing certain art forms in the smaller cities over the country, all named for him?" the doctor suggested.

The rich man brightened up. "That would be wonderful," he said. "My father would have loved that. Sure, I could do it easily. I would enjoy it.

It would honor him, well, both of us, forever. Let me think about it. I might just do that."

But he didn't. He existed for a few more years, then died, prematurely, "to the satisfaction of his heirs and business associates who were not yet in his predicament, although they suffered from the same 'disease,'" says Menninger.

Waste, cheating, stealing, lying, cruelty, and other vices—all are sins, and they are all destructive.

The wages of sin really is death, as the Bible states and Menninger confirms. And if it is death in this life, as it obviously is, it is surely death in the life to come.

The Way of Life

But enough about the first half of our text. It is time to look at the second half, with its great contrasts. The second half says, "but the gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord." What marvelous contrasts these are:

death versus life
sin versus God
wages versus God's free gift

We have already looked at the first side of these great contrasts. Let us look at side two.

1. Eternal life. This means far more than mere physical life, of course, since the wicked also possess physical life for a time. It also means more than mere existence, for the wicked, too, will exist for eternity. "Eternal life" has to do with knowing God, as Jesus said: "Now this is eternal life: that they may know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom you have sent" (John 17:3). It is to know him in an ever-increasing measure. It means holiness coupled to all joy and blessedness. It means realization of that chief end for which we were created, namely, "to glorify God and to enjoy him forever" (The Westminster Shorter Catechism, Answer 1).

Moreover, eternal life is something that begins now. We have eternal life from the very beginning of our new relationships to Christ, from the moment we believe on him.

2. God. The first of these contrasts, the one between death and life, is what we naturally expect. Say one, and we think naturally of the other: life and death, death and life. This is not so with the second contrast. Sin does not suggest God as its opposite; it suggests the word righteousness. What we would expect the sentence to say is that "the wages of sin is death" and that "the wages of righteousness is eternal life."

There is a sense in which Paul could have said this, of course. The chain of terms he has been developing since chapter five leads to that idea: on the one hand, disobedience, wickedness, condemnation, death; and on the other hand, obedience, justification, righteousness, life. But if Paul had said "the wages of righteousness is life," we would immediately have assumed that we can earn salvation by our good works, and Paul is too wise a teacher to let that happen.
Therefore, at the very point at which we might expect him to say "righteousness," he puts "God," to teach, as the Bible does throughout, that "salvation comes from the Lord" (Jon. 2:9).

In other words, no one but God can get us out of the predicament Karl Menninger describes in Whatever Became of Sin?

Do you know the Latin phrase deus ex machinal It is from classical drama, and it refers to the introduction of God into the action to resolve a problem. Aristotle had a rule for using God in the drama. He said that God must never be introduced as a deus ex machina unless the characters have gotten themselves into such a dilemma that only a god can get them out of it. This is the case here. That is exactly the kind of problem we have gotten ourselves into by our practice of sin. We are trapped in it, like elephants in quicksand or houses in a sinkhole. It takes God to get us out.

3. The gift. The Bible teaches that salvation is the gift of God. The Greek word is charisma, which actually means "a free gift." It means "grace." Wages are something we earn. They are the result of our working or doing. A gift is something that is unearned. It is free. That was the point to which we came at the end of Romans 5, and it is a theme we will uncover again and again throughout this letter. In fact, we discover it in all our dealings with God in this life. We could translate Romans 6:23 to read: "The wages of sin is death, but the grace of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord."

Are You in Jesus?

I want you to notice one final thing about this verse. We have treated the contrasts, which are a sermon in themselves. But I am sure you have noticed that we still have one important phrase left over. It is the phrase "in Christ Jesus our Lord." It is not part of the contrast. "God" is set against "sin," "gift" against "wages," "eternal life" against "death." Why, then, does Paul include it?

Obviously, because it brings out what was all-important to him, indeed the great truth for which the entire Book of Romans has been written. We are now at the end of Romans 6. Paul has summarized the gospel as the free gift of God to his people, something they could never have earned. He is going to talk next about the use and limits of the law. But it is as if Paul stopped here and reflected: "I have said that salvation is the free gift of God. But surely I can't let it go at that. Salvation is the gift of God, yes! But how is it possible for God to be thus gracious to us? How can he have given us the gift of eternal life, we being the sinners that we are?" The answer, of course, is that it is by, in or through Jesus Christ, which is why he adds the phrase "in Christ Jesus our Lord." Paul never forgot that we are saved from sin only because of Jesus' work.

And that raises a final question—a personal one, because religion always is personal; it must be. Are you in Jesus? Is Jesus your Savior, your Lord? There are only two ways you can answer that question, either "Yes" or "No." He either is your Savior or he is not.

If he is, let me ask these follow-up questions: Are you living for Jesus? If you are not, why not? He gave himself for you. He died for you. He even lives for you. Paul's purpose in Romans 6 is to show that if you have been delivered from your bondage to sin by Jesus, it is so that you might thereafter be his, starting in this life. As Paul wrote to the Corinthians, "... You are not your own; you were bought at a price. Therefore honor God with your body" (1 Cor. 6:19b-20). In the midst of a world that is being swept along by the flood torrent of sin, you are to stand out as Jesus' servant. You are to live for and witness to him.

The other way you can answer my question is "No." And if that is the case, I ask why you would willingly keep going on such a self-destructive path, particularly when the way of salvation is known to you. Haven't you been trapped by sin long enough? Don't you long for deliverance?

I like the way Charles Haddon Spurgeon ended his sermon on this text. He referred to the question God asked the prophet Ezekiel when he stood in the Valley of Dry Bones. "Son of man, can these bones live?" (Ezek. 37:3). Ezekiel was too wise to say what we probably would have answered in those circumstances. He said, "O Sovereign LORD, you alone know." (We would have said, "Not likely!") But when he was told to preach to them he did, and those dry bones came together, took on flesh, rose up, and became a great army.

That is what is necessary if you are to be delivered from sin, says Spurgeon. The wages of sin is death, and spiritually speaking you are as dead as those dry bones in the valley. No one but God can bring life out of death. No one but Jesus can make your dead bones live. God can do it. And he will as you come to him. You need to come. You need to come now.

Part Eight. Freedom from Law

Chapter 86.
Freedom from the Law

Romans 7:1-4

The seventh chapter of Romans is one of the best-known chapters in the Word of God. It is an important chapter. But for anyone who sets out to explain and teach it, as I am doing, it is both formidable and frightening. Why? For several reasons.

First, it has been a focal point for much heated controversy. In this chapter, from verse 14 to the end, Paul writes of his own intense struggle against sin. But of what period of his life is he writing? Is Paul writing of himself as he was before his conversion? Or is he describing himself as he was at the time of writing, that is, after his conversion? Is he writing theoretically only? Or is he describing a real struggle? These verses continue to be a focal point of debate, since they bear upon current teaching concerning "the carnal Christian," if there is such a thing, and with what some call "lordship salvation."

The first section of the chapter (vv. 1-6) presents a problem, too. This is the section in which Paul introduces the illustration of marriage law to show how Christians have been freed from law in order to be married to Jesus Christ.

The illustration seems simple on the surface, but it has proven baffling to many. The main difficulty is that the illustration refers to a wife who is bound to her husband as long as he lives but is freed to marry another if he dies. It illustrates how the believer has died to the law in order that he or she might be married to Christ. But in the illustration it is the husband and not the wife who dies, and it is the wife who remarries. Besides, what does the husband represent? Is he the law? If so, what law? Law in general or the Old Testament law in particular? If not the law, what does he represent? Ray Stedman thinks the husband represents Adam. Saint Augustine and some of the Reformers thought he represents our old, or corrupt, nature.

There are even more problems in these verses, as an examination of nearly any commentary will show.

William Barclay said of Romans 7, "Seldom did Paul write so difficult and so complicated a passage." C. H. Dodd is intemperate in his remarks, objecting that "the illustration... is confused from the outset." He advises us "to ignore the illustration, as far as may be, and ask what it is that Paul is really talking about in the realm of fact and experience." That is hardly advice for the serious commentator to dispense.

The Most Difficult Problem: Application

I write as a preacher, however, and from my perspective the greatest problem with Romans 7 is not the interpretation of the chapter (which, in the final analysis, I do not believe is all that difficult) but rather the task of applying it to our own lawless age. Let me explain.

You will remember from our earlier studies that I have described Romans 6 and 7 as a parenthesis in a larger section embracing chapters 5-8. The larger section concerns the assurance and finality of salvation, beginning with the truth that, having been justified by the work of God in Christ, we now have "peace with God," and ending with the triumphal cry (in chapter 8) that nothing will be able to separate us from that relationship. In the course of this section the apostle deals with two questions that arise naturally from his thesis: (1) Doesn't a doctrine like this lead to immoral behavior, since it seems to be saying that we will be saved eventually regardless of what we do? and (2) Doesn't it make the law of no account, or useless? This second problem would be particularly acute for the Jew who had always rightly regarded the law as God's good gift.

Paul answers the first of these questions in chapter 6, showing that the gospel does not lead to immorality but rather to the reverse. This is because, in saving us from sin, God has joined us to Jesus Christ, as a result of which those who have been saved must and will live for him. Paul answers the second question—"But what about the law?"—in chapter 7.

But here is the problem. We live in a day when people have little concern for law, in fact, when most people try as hard as they can or dare to be lawless. So how do you say to people who do not care about law that the law is important? Or, harder yet, how do you tell them that they must be freed from law in order to live for righteousness (which is what Romans 7:1-6 says), when they are already acting as if they are freed from it—but in the wrong way? How do you make what you have to say about the law of God relevant?

A Universal Problem

Most commentators are agreed that "the law" referred to in Romans 7 is law in general and not the Old Testament law specifically, and that the word brothers in verse 1 refers to all Christians and not to believing Jews only. But the "all" includes the parts, and for that reason I begin with the problem that Paul's teaching must have presented to believing Jews. I also begin here because this part is the easiest to understand.

The problem was twofold. First, there was the problem I have already spoken about, namely that Paul's teaching about being justified by God apart from law seemed to make the law worthless or, worse yet, harmful. How could any true Jew accept that? The Jew knew that the law had been given through Moses from Mount Sinai, accompanied by frightening manifestations of God's presence. Nothing could have been more weighty or solemn than God's giving of the law on Sinai. The Jew rightly regarded the law as God's great, good, and beneficial gift to man. How could such an important gift be set aside?

The other problem was this: In a paradoxical manner, although the law was good, it was also an overwhelming burden. It imposed a strict code of legalistic behavior that was back-breaking for those who took it seriously. The Jews had a word for it. They called it a yoke, like those put upon animals to harness them for hard labor. That is what it was like to be a godly Jew. The Jew was proud of his yoke. It was from God; it set him apart from the godless peoples around him. Nevertheless it was still a yoke, and it was a great and overwhelming burden.

Do you remember how Peter spoke of this, in a moment of unusual clarity at the great Council of Jerusalem described in Acts 15? There were people at the council who wanted to impose the Old Testament law on Gentile believers, and Paul, followed by Peter, argued that this was a wrong thing to do. Peter's argument was telling: "Now then, why do you try to test God by putting on the necks of the disciples a yoke that neither we nor our fathers have been able to bear?" he asked (v. 10). His words were a candid admission that trying to live by the law of God had been onerous and impossible.

But is this only a Jewish problem? I said a moment ago that the whole includes the parts; therefore, the Jewish problem is included. But how is it that more than Jews are involved? How does the problem affect the Gentile?

In the following way. You remember perhaps that in the opening section of Mere Christianity the great Cambridge professor and Christian apologist C. S. Lewis argued that all persons recognize and feel bound to live by a certain moral standard. Lewis called it "the law of human nature," and he illustrated it from the way people argue. They say things like, "How'd you like it if anyone did the same to you?" "That's my seat, I was there first," "Leave him alone; he isn't doing you any harm," "Why should you shove in first?", "Give me a bit of your orange; I gave you a bit of mine," or "Come on, you promised." Lewis believed—I am sure he is right—that statements like this show that all people everywhere recognize a standard of behavior to which they and others are supposed to measure up.

They may disagree about certain details of that standard, of course, and they may apply it wrongly. But all nevertheless believe in what used to be called Right and Wrong. And not only do they believe in it, they expect others to believe in it and live by the "right" standard, too. Thus the appeals for right conduct I have quoted.

Lewis also had another main point in his argument, and it is that we have all broken this law of nature. What is more, we feel guilty for breaking it, which is why we usually try to cover up for our bad behavior or make excuses for it.

These facts of human behavior show that in a certain sense the Gentile as well as the Jew is "under law" and knows himself to be condemned by it. Therefore the problem that Paul is dealing with in Romans 7 is a universal human problem.

In his study of Romans, Ray C. Stedman suggests four proofs that all persons are naturally "under law," even without possessing or being subjected to the specific law of the Old Testament. They are worth listing.

1. We are proud of our achievements. At first glance, this seems to prove recognition of a standard to which we have been able to measure up and to which others have perhaps not been able to measure up (at least not so well), not how we feel condemned by those standards. But it actually does show how we feel condemned, because our pointing to some area of moral achievement in our own lives is usually a diversion to keep people from looking at our failures in other areas. For example, the philanthropist may boast of the $100,000 he has given to some charity primarily because he is feeling guilty about how he or she acquired the money in the first place. Perhaps he neglected his family in order "to make his mark" or even cheated someone out of it. "The law reveals failure. Therefore, one of the first marks of a person who is living under the law is that he is always pointing out how well he is doing," says Stedman.

2. We are critical of others. This is another diversionary tactic. It is the "scapegoat" ploy. Get people thinking about how others have failed, and perhaps they will overlook us. And there is this, too: In a strange way, we are usually most critical of others precisely in those areas where we are ourselves most at fault. It is the proud who most hate pride in others. It is cheaters who are most sensitive to being cheated by their associates.

3. We are reluctant to admit our own failures. This is the reverse side of boasting. It is because we instinctively feel the weight of the law over us that we attempt to cover up our failures. If we did not sense ourselves to be "under law" and rightly "under law," would we bother? We would not deny breaking a standard the validity of which we do not recognize.

4. We suffer from depression, discouragement, and defeat. This gets to the real heart of the problem, for it shows how futile it is for people to try to raise moral standards merely by enacting or proclaiming new laws. Social reformers generally think that all that is necessary to raise the moral standard of a community is to inform people of what is right and provide a few incentives for them to choose it. But it does not work that way. All of us are already "under law," and we are already breaking the law we have. What good does it do to have more laws? Or better laws? Or higher laws? All the so-called better laws do is increase our sense of failure and heighten our anxiety. We are defeated enough already.

"What a wretched man I am!" we might cry. "Who will rescue me from this body of death?" The answer, which Paul gives at the very end of Romans 7, where he asks those very questions, is not a new law but "God—though Jesus Christ our Lord!" (v. 25). The rescuer is a person!

From Death to a New Life

Nevertheless, we are "under law." The Jew was (and is) under the law of the Old Testament. The Gentile is under the law of nature. And that is just the problem. The law cannot save us, as Paul proved early on in Romans. The law cannot sanctify us either, as he is showing now. Still we are under it. It is all very good to say that the answer to a holy life is not the law but a person, but that does little good if we are still under bondage to the former.

This is where Romans 7:1-4 comes in, of course. For what Paul tells us in these verses is that the solution is death. We must die to one (law) in order to be free for another (Jesus Christ). The law has an important role to play. Paul will explain that carefully in the next section (vv. 7-13). But his first teaching in reference to law is that we must be freed from it and that the only way we can be freed from it is by death.

This is where the argument gets difficult. But let's try to follow it carefully.

First, Paul states a fact upon which all can agree, namely, "that the law has authority over a man only as long as he lives" (v. 1). That should be self-evident. As long as we are alive we are bound by the laws of the country in which we live. But if we die, we are freed from those laws.

Obviously you cannot require a dead person to do anything, nor punish him or her for failing to do it. Everyone can agree on this point.

Second, Paul gives an illustration from common experience, citing the case of a woman who is married to a certain man. His argument goes: "For example, by law a married woman is bound to her husband as long as he is alive, but if her husband dies, she is released from the law of marriage. So then, if she marries another man while her husband is still alive, she is called an adulteress. But if her husband dies, she is released from that law and is not an adulteress, even though she marries another man" (vv. 2-3). The point of the illustration is simplicity itself: The death of the husband releases the wife from the law that bound her to the marriage.

I am convinced that most errors in interpreting this passage come from trying to get it to teach more than that, more than Paul intended. We should remember that this is not a proof of Paul's point; it is only an illustration. More importantly, it is not an allegory. That is, it is not necessary to assign meanings to each of the illustration's parts. In fact, if we try to do that, we are at once led into difficulty, as I tried to indicate at the beginning when I mentioned the diverse meanings that have been assigned to the husband in the supposed illustration.

But why didn't Paul carry the illustration through in a way that would have avoided these problems? One reason is that it does not work out properly, no matter how you try it. If the husband represents the law, then the law dies in order that we might marry another, who is Christ. But the law does not die. It lives and has value. In verse 12, Paul is going to argue that "the law is holy, and the commandment is holy, righteous and good." Actually, we are the ones who have died—in Christ, as Paul says in Galatians 2:20 ("I have been crucified with Christ and I no longer live...").

Try it that way, then. Make the husband who has died represent us. If we do that, the illustration falls apart because, being dead, we cannot marry another person, which is what Paul wants to suggest.

Why use an illustration at all, then? I think there are several good reasons. In his commentary, D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones gives four of them:

1. A woman who is married to a man is under the authority of that man. This is not so true today, in our feminist age, but it was true of the age in which Paul wrote, just as it has been in most ages of human history and in virtually all places. Husbands had authority over wives, rather than each being equal in authority or wives having authority over husbands. This is what Paul wants to show. The human race is under obligation to the laws of nature and of God, and is bound by them. No one is free to write his or her own moral code or to abandon law entirely. We are responsible.

2. The subjection of a wife to a husband in marriage is a lifelong subjection. Today we think of marriage as being easily broken by divorce, and by "no fault" divorce at that. But this was far from Paul's mind. He was thinking scripturally, as Christians still try to do today in marriage services. We have the parties repeat: "I, Mary, take thee, John [or I, John, take thee, Mary], to be my wedded husband [or wife]; and I do promise and covenant, before God and these witnesses, to be thy loving and faithful wife [or husband], in plenty and in want, in joy and in sorrow, in sickness and in health, as long as we both shall live." The illustration of marriage shows that we are under the authority of God's law for this life.

3. In spite of the permanent nature of this relationship and the resulting authority, there is nevertheless the possibility of entering into another relationship. How? It becomes possible if one of the parties dies.

This is the point Paul is particularly concerned to make, which we can see by the fact that, having made it one way in verse 2, he immediately states it all over again in verse 3, saying, "But if her husband dies, she is released from the law and is not an adulteress...." What is Paul showing in this verse? Let me repeat that he is not working out an allegory in which the husband stands for something and the wife stands for something else. What he is stressing is that the law of marriage is not violated by the new relationship—if the husband has died. Rather, the law is upheld. The woman is freed from the law binding her to the first husband so that she might marry another in a legal manner.

Do you see how this is working out? Paul's opponents were saying, "But what about the law? Doesn't the gospel you have been preaching annul the law or set the law aside?" Paul's answer is that this is far from the case. In the gospel of God's free justification of the sinner, the law is fully honored, satisfied, and upheld. Salvation is a "fulfilling of the law." But at the same time it is liberation from it, which is necessary if you and I are to be able to step forward in Christ to live a morally fruitful life.

This leads to the fourth and most important point.

4. The object of the new relationship is "that we might bear fruit to God" (v. 4). Commentators seem afraid of this last point, no doubt feeling that the thought of bearing offspring to Christ is somehow indelicate. I do not feel this to be the case at all. Paul is concerned for righteousness, which is the fruit of God, and the idea is: How > are we to attain this righteousness so long as we are married to law (or, if you prefer, to Adam or to our old sinful nature)? The old husband is impotent. The law never engendered righteousness in anybody. So how can we be fruitful? The answer is: Death must terminate the old relationship in order that we might enter into a new, fruitful relationship to Jesus Christ.

How does this happen? It happens by our dying to the law in Christ. That is, his death becomes our death. Therefore, when we die in him we die to the law, and when we rise in him we rise to the new relationship. Now God says to us, as he said to our first parents in the Garden of Eden, "Be fruitful and increase in number; fill the earth and subdue it" (Gen. 1:28a). Not with physical offspring, of course, but with righteousness produced by the Holy Spirit.

Chapter 87.
Our Second, Fruitful Union

Romans 7:4

Of all the scriptural illustrations of what it means to belong to the Lord Jesus Christ in salvation, none is more pleasing than the illustration of marriage. It is because love, courtship, and marriage are themselves pleasing and because our relationship to Jesus is a love relationship.

Many times, when I am asked to perform a wedding, either the man or the woman will mention that some of those coming to the service will not be Christians and inquire whether it might be possible for me to make the way of salvation clear as part of my marriage meditation. I always reply that I am glad to speak about the gospel and that it is easy in this context, for nothing so clearly illustrates what it means to be a Christian than the marriage service. In a service like this I will say that the Bible portrays Jesus as the passionate lover, devoted bridegroom, and faithful husband of his bride, the church, and that we are portrayed as that bride. Moreover, I will say that the marriage vows particularly illustrate the relationship.

Jesus took the vows first of all, for he sought us long before we knew him or had responded to him. He said:

I, Jesus, take thee, Sinner [for that is what we are], to be my wedded wife; and I do promise and covenant, before God the heavenly Father, to be thy loving and faithful Savior, in plenty and in want, in joy and in sorrow, in sickness and in health, for this life and for all eternity.

After he had said that, the time came when we looked up into his loving face and repeated with corresponding ardor:

I, Sinner, take thee, Jesus, to be my loving Bridegroom and Savior; and I do promise and covenant, before God the heavenly Father, to be thy loving and faithful wife, in plenty and in want, in joy and in sorrow, in sickness and in health, for this life and for all eternity.

I point out that it is the exchange of vows formally witnessed that makes the marriage, just as it is the fullness of saving faith that binds us to Jesus in salvation. For faith is not mere knowledge about Jesus any more than merely knowing about a man joins a woman to him or a man to a woman. Nor is faith even loving Jesus, important as that is. It is a promise to be his forever.

Joined to Jesus

This is the illustration Paul has been unfolding in the first verses of Romans 7, as we began to see in the previous chapter. He showed that the law is not abrogated by the manner in which God has saved us in Christ, but rather that the law has been both honored and satisfied. He did this by showing that law has a claim on people only as long as they live. Once they die, their relationship to the law is ended.

When we first began to look at this illustration—showing that "a married woman is bound to her husband as long as he is alive, but if her husband dies, she is released from the law of marriage"—I pointed out that confusion follows if we take the illustration as allegory. That is, as soon as we attempt to establish the identity of the husband who has died, we have trouble. He cannot be the law; the law is not dead. Nor can he be ourselves; for Paul's point is that those who are Christians have died to the one in order to be married to the other. (If we are to be identified with any one of the parties, it must be the woman.) When we studied the illustration in the last chapter, I argued that the comparison is not to be taken allegorically but only as an illustration to show that death releases any person from the law.

Yet, in verse 4, the last verse in which Paul uses the illustration, the apostle actually does work this out in terms of our relationship to Christ, showing how death to the law operates and how the result is a new and fruitful relationship. His teaching in verse 4 does not perfectly fit his illustration—no illustration is perfect—but it is the gospel.

What is Paul's point? Simply that the object of God's having freed us from the law, to which we were bound, was that we might be joined to Christ and be fruitful. In fact, it is even stronger than that. In Greek the sentence ends with the words "in order that we might bear fruit to God," which means that in this case it is the fruitfulness of the Christian, rather even than his union with Christ, that is emphasized.

And why not? Paul has been teaching that, having been saved by God, we must live a holy life. Now, by the image of a fruitful marriage, he teaches that this has been God's object in saving us all along.

Why has God saved us? In the context of today's self-centered culture, even as Christians we tend to answer this question in exclusively personal terms by talking about God's love for us. It is not wrong to do this, for Jesus told us that "God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life" (John 3:16). But we might do far better to answer that God loved us and Jesus died for us so that we might be holy.

What was God's object in saving us? Let us state it clearly. According to these first few verses in Romans 7, God saved us so that we, who beforehand were lost in sin and wickedness, might live a holy life.

What I want to pursue in this study is how the union of the believer with Christ, illustrated by the marriage relationship, actually leads to this end. That is, I want to show how this new relationship produces holiness. It does so in several important ways.

Miss Sinner, Mrs. Christian

First, holiness is produced because when we become Christians we take the name of the Lord Jesus Christ as ours, just as a woman traditionally takes a man's name for hers when she marries him. She may have come into the church as Miss Jones, for example. But if the man she is marrying is named Smith, she goes out of the church as Mrs. Smith. This exchange takes place in most Christian marriage ceremonies. In fact, the part in which it does is my favorite part of the service. After the bride and groom have exchanged vows and rings and I have spoken about Christian marriage and prayed for the couple's marital union, I say: "Now, by the authority committed unto me as a minister of the church of Jesus Christ, I declare that John Smith and Mary Jones Smith are now husband and wife, according to the ordinance of God and the law of the state of Pennsylvania."

At that point both the new husband and the new wife generally relax a bit and smile, the bride with a sweet and contented joy that she at last belongs to her new husband and he with an equally wonderful joy that she is his.

That is what happens when you are joined to Jesus in fruitful Christian union. Before this, you were Miss Sinner, for you were under the law of God and rightly condemned by it. You were a sinner by choice and by divine decree. But when you have been set free from that old union by dying to it in Christ and are raised to another union "in him," God gives you Christ's name. So you who before were Miss Sinner are now Mrs. Christian—"Christian" means "Christ one"—and whatever you do from this point on will reflect either favorably or disfavorably upon him.

Does this have bearing on how we Christians now live our lives? It had better. If it does not, it is questionable whether we have actually been joined to him.

Have you noticed how people are often very proud of their names? Some belong to families with ancestors who came to this country on the Mayflower at the very beginning of our country's history. They are proud of that. Some have descended from patriots who fought in the American Revolution—the DAR (Daughters of the American Revolution) is a celebrated organization. Others point to soldiers of the Civil War in their family tree. Some have ancestors who made great fortunes or were known for their important contributions to politics, art, literature, or science. This, too, is a justifiable source of pride in many instances. But it cannot compare with the pride that should be ours as the bride of Jesus Christ. Paul's letter to the Philippians tells us that God has given Jesus "the name that is above every name" (Phil. 2:9b). There is no higher privilege than to bear the name of Jesus Christ, to be known as a Christian. How, then, can we dishonor it? How can we do anything other than strive constantly to live a holy life as Christians?

Daughters of the King

The second way this marriage to Christ leads to holiness is through the new status it gives us.

This is also true in an earthly marriage. A woman may have come from a distinguished family, but if she marries a man who is an alcoholic, thereafter she will be known as the wife of a ne'erdo-well. She is known by his status rather than the exalted qualities of her ancestors. On the other hand, she may have come from a very humble background, but if she marries the heirapparent to a throne, she will be known thereafter as a princess and perhaps eventually as a queen. It is the same with us as Christians. Before we were saved we had the low status described by Paul in his letter to the Ephesians (most of whom were Gentiles). We were "separate from Christ, excluded from citizenship in Israel and foreigners to the covenants of promise, without hope and without God in the world" (Eph. 2:12). Now we are "no longer foreigners and aliens, but fellow citizens with God's people and members of God's household, built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets, with Christ Jesus himself as the chief cornerstone" (vv. 19-20).

By our union with Jesus Christ we have become sons and daughters of the great King of the universe, God the Father. There is no status anywhere that tops that! We should live accordingly.

How can the children of God act like the devil's offspring?

"The Rights and Privileges Thereunto"

This leads to the privileges conveyed by our new, enhanced status. Not long ago I took part in a college graduation ceremony and heard again those words that are often pronounced to new graduates in such a setting. The president of the college welcomed the hundred or so graduates into "the society of learned men and women" and conveyed upon them "all the rights, privileges, and responsibilities pertaining thereunto." Similarly, because of the new status it imparts, marriage brings corresponding rights, privileges, and responsibilities. This is especially true of our marriage to Jesus Christ. As his bride—as Christians—we have many special privileges, all of which produce holiness in us.

1. Access to God in prayer. Earlier, when we were studying the phrase "we have gained access by faith into this grace in which we now stand" (Rom. 5:2), I pointed out that this is not referring to prayer so much as to our having gained the status before God of justified men and women. Now I must add that, although Romans 5:2 is not talking about prayer specifically, the status to which it refers nevertheless guarantees our access to God in prayer. It is because we are God's children that we may come to him.

"Do not be anxious about anything, but in everything, by prayer and petition, with thanksgiving, present your requests to God. And the peace of God, which transcends all understanding, will guard your hearts and minds in Christ Jesus," said Paul (Phil. 4:6-7).

We need no better proof of this than what Jesus told us: "I will do whatever you ask in my name, so that the Son may bring glory to the Father. You may ask me for anything in my name, and I will do it" (John 14:13-14).

2. Provision for all our needs. We live in a need-centered age, which means that most people are constantly thinking about what they want or think they want, and how to get it. It is a negative feature of contemporary life; it is frustrating. As Christians, instead of always thinking about our own needs, we need to be concentrating on the needs of others. However, it is certainly true that we do have needs, and one of the privileges of our new relationship to God the Father through Jesus Christ is that God promises to supply them. He is willing because it is his nature to do good to his creatures. He is able because, being omnipotent, he has an unlimited supply of riches at his disposal. Paul also wrote of this to the Philippians, saying, "And my God will meet all your needs according to his glorious riches in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4:19).

3. Jesus' personal care and protection. What would you think of a wife who was in serious trouble and whose husband refused to help her? You would say, "Well, he's not a very good husband. How could he be so indifferent, so callous toward his own wife?" No one will ever be able to make that complaint against Jesus. He is our faithful helper and constant protector.

Jesus, our Bridegroom, is with us each step of our journey through life. He said, "And surely I am with you always, to the very end of the age" (Matt. 28:20b). As he accompanies us, he also works with us to make us all that he would have us be. In Ephesians, where Paul also speaks of marriage, the apostle writes: "Husbands, love your wives, just as Christ loved the church and gave himself up for her to make her holy, cleansing her by the washing with water through the word, and to present her to himself as a radiant church, without stain or wrinkle or any other blemish, but holy and blameless" (Eph. 5:25-27). Jesus does this for us in full measure.

Again, Jesus is present to deliver us from temptation. Paul assures us that "No temptation has seized you except what is common to man. And God is faithful; he will not let you be tempted beyond what you can bear. But when you are tempted, he will also provide a way out so that you can stand up under it" (1 Cor. 10:13).

4. The Bible. There is a sense in which all the world has the Bible; it is available to be read by anyone. But having the Bible is much more than that if we are Christians. Together with the sacred text, we also have the ministry of the Holy Spirit so that, when we read its pages, the Holy Spirit interprets the Bible to us and we hear the voice of the Lord.

Beyond the sacred page I see thee, Lord;
My spirit pants for thee, O living Word.

It was of such moments of personal Bible study that another hymnwriter wrote so eloquently:

I come to the garden alone
While the dew is still on the roses, And the voice I hear, falling on my ear, The Son of God discloses.
And he walks with me, and he talks with me,
And tells me I am his own;
And the joy we share as we tarry there
None other has ever known.

D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones, who lists many of these privileges in his study of Romans 7:4, says,

If you would know the love of Jesus "what it is," give him opportunities of telling you. He will meet you in the Scriptures, and he will tell you. Give time, give place, give opportunity. Set other things aside, and say to other people, "I cannot do what you ask me to do; I have another appointment, I know he is coming and I am waiting for him." Do you look for him, are you expecting him, do you allow him, do you give him opportunities to speak to you, and to let you know his love for you?

It is through such quiet meetings more than in any other way that we will grow in holiness.

For This Life and for Eternity

The fourth way our new marriage to Jesus Christ produces holiness is by bringing us into a love that will never fade and a relationship that will never end. We died to our unfruitful first marriage to the law when we died in Christ. That marriage ended. But now, having been raised in Christ, who will never die, and having been joined to him, we are assured of a love that will last forever. As I say in my reworking of the marriage vows, it is "in plenty and in want, in joy and in sorrow, in sickness and in health, for this life and for all eternity." "But suppose my love is weak?" you ask.

Don't say "suppose." As a new bride of Christ, your love for him is weak, but it will grow. It will grow here on earth, and it will go on growing throughout eternity.

"Suppose my love should grow cold?" you wonder.

That is a sad thing to imagine since there is no excuse for it, but it is true that this sometimes happens. We get involved in the affairs of this world and forget the Lord for a time. We neglect prayer and Bible study. We do not pause to hear his voice. Like the beloved of Solomon's Song of Songs, we do not come to Jesus when he calls. We say, "I have taken off my robe—must I put it on again?/I have washed my feet—must I soil them again?" (Song of Songs 5:3). Then, when we turn to the Lord at last, he is not there. Ah, but he is still seeking us. He has only used our neglect of him to show us how much his love means and how empty our lives are without it.

"But suppose I betray his love, as Gomer betrayed the love of Hosea?" God forbid that you should ever do that! But even if that should happen, Jesus' love is greater even than your betrayal. He died to deliver you from the condemnation of the law and purchase you for himself. Do you think he will abandon you now? The Bible tells us, "If we are faithless, he will remain faithful, for he cannot disown himself (2 Tim. 2:13).

One day the great God of the universe is going to throw a party. It will be the most magnificent party that has ever been held. The banquet will be spread in heaven. The guests will be numbered in the billions. The angelic legions will be there to serve these honored guests. Jesus, the Bridegroom, will be seated at his Father's right hand. And you will be there, too, for this is the great marriage supper of the Lamb. You will be there. Do you understand that? You will be there. Nothing is going to keep you from that great celebration—if you are really joined to Jesus Christ.

So what are you doing? Are you living a halfhearted life for Jesus Christ now? If you know where you are headed, you will be preparing for that day with every spiritual thought you have and with every deed you do. You will be bearing fruit for God, because on that day of celebration you will be able to lift it up and offer it to him with pure hands and with joy unspeakable.

Chapter 88.
Then and Now

Romans 7:5-6

Our text here is the fifth and sixth verses of Romans 7, and in the very middle of these verses, linking them, as it were, are the marvelous words "But now." They have already occurred once in the previous chapter (v. 22). They point to the tremendous change that has taken place in the life of the one who has come to Christ as Savior, and they are so important that D. Martyn LloydJones was no doubt right in saying, "If the expression 'But now' does not move you, I take leave to query whether you are a Christian."

This is a change Paul has been talking about all along, of course. He has been pointing to the difference in a person's life when one who formerly was apart from Christ becomes a believer.

As far back as Romans 5, Paul contrasted our being in Adam with our being in Christ. The former is what we were before our conversion. The latter is what we have become after it—what we are now. In chapter 6 he contrasted our original slavery to sin with our new and happy slavery to God. In the first verses of chapter 7 he spoke of two marriages and explained how we have died to the former in order to have the latter. Paul is developing the same idea here. It is obvious that he is, because he begins with the word for, thus linking this section with what has gone before.

Paul wants us to know—Can we possibly doubt this after what he has said earlier?—that to be a Christian is to be "a new creation" in Christ (2 Cor. 5:17). To be saved means that we are no longer what we were and that we must live differently.

In the Flesh or in the Spirit

Since the strength of these verses is in the powerful terms Paul uses, we need to spend some time in understanding them. The first important term is "sinful nature" or, more literally, "flesh." "Flesh" (sarx) is the word the Greek text uses.

This term has already occurred several times in Romans. But this is the first time it has occurred with the special theological meaning Paul so often gives it in his writings. In this fuller, theological sense it will appear many times more in the remainder of this chapter and through verse 13 of chapter 8. It is so important and is used so often in these chapters that we must take special pains to understand it. If we fail to understand it, we will err not only in interpreting these two verses but also in interpreting the rest of Romans 7 and Romans 8. Some have made this error, of course, and the result has been at least one (and probably more than one) wrong doctrine.

The problem is that the word flesh is used in different senses, as many English words are. What does the word mind mean in English? It usually means "brain." But it can also mean "determination," as in "having a mind to do something." As a verb it can mean "be careful," as in "mind what you do." In philosophy "mind" can mean the controlling spirit of the universe. It is the same with sarx in the Greek language.

Basically sarx means the soft or fleshly parts of the body, which is how the resurrected Jesus used the word when he told the disciples that "a ghost does not have flesh and bones, as you see I have" (Luke 24:39). Sometimes "flesh" means the whole body, as in Galatians 2:20: "... the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me" (KJV). (The New International Version of that verse translates "in the flesh" as "in the body.") Sometimes sarx refers to the sensual part of our nature. That is why Paul can say in Galatians 5:17a, "For the sinful nature ['flesh'] desires what is contrary to the Spirit, and the Spirit what is contrary to the sinful nature." At still other times "flesh" can refer to the whole of mankind, as in the translation "all flesh" (KJV) in Isaiah 40:6; 1 Peter 1:24; and other passages.

What does "flesh" (sarx) mean in Romans 7:5? In this case it obviously does not mean the whole of mankind, because it is being used as a contrast to those who are "in the Spirit." And it is not referring to the body or even to any parts of the body. In Romans it is a term for the unregenerate, for unbelievers. It is what we were before God saved us.

We see this clearly in Romans 8: "Those who live according to the sinful nature ['flesh'] have their minds set on what that nature desires; but those who live in accordance with the Spirit have their minds set on what the Spirit desires. The mind of sinful man is death, but the mind controlled by the Spirit is life and peace; the sinful mind is hostile to God. It does not submit to God's law, nor can it do so. Those controlled by the sinful nature cannot please God. You, however, are not controlled by the sinful nature but by the Spirit, if the Spirit of God lives in you" (vv. 5-9).

Eduard Schweizer says of this characteristic theological use of the word by Paul, "Where sarx is understood in a full theological sense... it denotes the being of man which is determined, not by his physical substance, but by his relationship to God."

The "Carnal" Christian?

Paul's use of the word flesh ("sinful nature") in Romans 7 and 8 is so clear that it would be unnecessary to elaborate this point were it not for an unfortunate misuse of the term in some areas of contemporary Christianity. This misuse is commonly known as "the doctrine of the carnal Christian"—"carnal" being only another word for "flesh." It leads to a serious misunderstanding of the next section of Romans, as well as other passages.

The idea of the carnal Christian is that human beings fall into three different classes: (1) those that are not saved; (2) Christians who are sinful, immature, or "carnal"; and (3) Christians who are "spiritual." In a study of Romans it is usually said that the "man" portrayed in Romans 7:14 and following is an example of the carnal Christian. He is saved, but he is not living that way. He is defeated. It is most often said that what he needs to do is get out of Romans 7 into Romans 8.

He needs to live "in the Spirit."

Since we are going to deal with this at greater length in subsequent studies, what I have to say here is only preliminary. Still, even in a preliminary way, it is necessary to point out that the doctrine of the "carnal" Christian does not fit this context. It is important to see this, for we will never understand Romans 7 and 8 correctly if we think of them as describing a defeated Christian who somehow becomes a victorious one. Paul is not talking about a carnal Christian versus a spiritual Christian at all, but rather about an unbeliever versus a Christian. The contrast is between what we were before our conversion and what we are now. It is the same contrast seen in being in Adam versus being in Christ, or being in slavery to the law versus being God's servants, which we have already seen in earlier sections of Romans.

That can be made quite clear to most people. Yet many will still ask quite understandably, "But what about 1 Corinthians 3?" In that chapter

Paul writes to the Corinthians, "Brothers, I could not address you as spiritual but as worldly ("fleshly")—mere infants in Christ.... For since there is jealousy and quarreling among you, are you not worldly? Are you not acting like mere men?" (vv. 1, 3).

Those verses are often cited as the best support for the carnal-Christian doctrine in Scripture, but a close examination will show that that teaching does not follow from Paul's statements. They are mistakenly supposed to teach that men and women can become Christians and yet continue in a sinful or carnal state, passing on to a fuller commitment later. But that is precisely what 1 Corinthians 3 does not say. The Christians in Corinth were indeed acting badly, as Christians frequently do. In that area of their lives they were "worldly." That is, they were acting as if they were not Christians, as "mere men," unregenerate. But because they were not unregenerate but were actually Christians, they had to stop that bad behavior. Their sin was inconsistent with what they had become in Christ and was therefore intolerable.

This is precisely what Paul has been saying all along in these middle chapters of Romans. He has been teaching that the Christian is not what he was before he became a Christian and, for that very reason, he must (and will) live differently.

Sin Aroused by the Law

The next thing Paul says, as he develops the contrast between what we were then and what by the grace of God we have become now, is that our relationship to the law has changed profoundly. That is, not only have we been changed; our relationships, beginning with the law, have changed, too.

Here again we have to look at a few terms carefully. The first is "passions," which occurs in the phrase "sinful passions" (pathēmata tōn hamartiōn). By itself the word passions is neutral and even somewhat passive. It is based on the Greek word from which we get our word pathos, and it corresponds to what we usually mean when we speak of our natural appetites, impulses, or emotions. Impulses can be good or bad. That is, they can flow from good or bad desires, and they can be acted upon by good or bad influences. But here Paul links these normally neutral passions to sin, calling them "sinful passions," pointing out that when the law is allowed to work upon them it excites them not to good but to bad behavior.

What does this mean? Does it mean that the law of God, which is "good," as Paul is going to say in verse 12, itself turns morally neutral appetites or impulses into bad appetites or impulses? Not at all! The problem is that in the unregenerate man or woman these impulses, though not necessarily good or bad in themselves, are in fact bad, because they have been corrupted by our sinful natures. When the law tells us that we should not do something, our sinful natures rebel and do evil instead.

The law is good, but we are not good. Hence, before our conversions the law actually increased rather than reduced immorality.

Again, we will be considering this at greater length in future studies, for verses 5 and 6 are a seedbed of important ideas that Paul develops later. Still we need to see even here how profound Paul's statement is. What Paul is saying is that the cause of sinful acts lies in the sinful nature (or corrupted passions) of unregenerate people and not in the absence of good laws. In fact, there is a sense in which, because the problem is in us, good laws, even the good laws of God, merely aggravate or increase the sinful conduct. Because of our perversity, they actually make things worse.

D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones was very perceptive at this point, arguing (I think rightly) that there is a type of secular teaching of morality that does more harm than good, particularly among the young. This has bearing on our current efforts to teach sex education in the public schools. Morality can be taught by example and by a discussion of worthy values. We can talk helpfully about honesty, generosity, fair play, and such things. But trying to teach morality by introducing young people (or anyone else) to behavior they have not yet heard of or know little about— deviant sexual practices, for instance, or the use of drugs —does not prepare them to resist the sin but only instills in them a desire to commit the sin in question.

Here is what Lloyd-Jones says.

To teach morality may be a positive danger, for it tends to inflame the passions; it encourages them.... A minister of religion once told me that the book that had done him the greatest amount of harm in his own personal life was a book entitled The Mastery of Sex. Avoid such books, for they will do more harm than good. The reason is that 'the motions of sins' are actually inflamed even by the Law of God. The very law that prohibits them encourages us to do them, because we are impure. So morality teaching can even be a positive danger. By teaching children about sex, and by warning them against the consequences of certain actions, what you are really doing is to introduce them to the whole subject. Naturally they will greatly enjoy it, their curiosity will be aroused, and they will desire to read further.

But I hear someone ask, "What shall we do, then? Are you telling us that we should never mention matters of morality to our children?" No, that is not it. There is a place for the right kind of moral teaching. But even with right moral teaching, you should know, if you are a Christian, that the important thing is not whether your children know what is right or wrong, though that is important, but whether they are Christians, too. For they are no different from ourselves. And what Paul is saying here is that before our conversion the law served only to arouse our sinful passions. It pushed us to sin. It was only after we had come to Christ that this changed and we found ourselves being drawn in the way of righteousness by God's Spirit.

Let us stop fooling ourselves about our children. The reason many of them are acting so badly is that they are not Christians. And let us also stop fooling ourselves about many of the grown-up churchgoers we know. The reason they do the sinful things they do is that they are not Christians either. Christians can sin, and they do. But they do not continue in it. What they do is what Paul says they do in verse 6: "But now, by dying to what once bound us, we have been released from the law so that we serve in the new way of the Spirit, and not in the old way of the written code."

Serving Him

That brings us to the final contrast in these verses. We have looked at the contrast between what we were and what we are now. We have looked at the contrast between our former and present relationships to the law. The final contrast is between what we did as unbelievers, the "fruit" we bore, and our present fruitfulness as Christians.

"What was the sum total of our work as unbelievers?" asks Paul. "We bore fruit for death" is his answer (v. 5). This is a different way of putting what he said in verse 4, though it amounts to the same thing. In verses 2-4, where he was using the marriage illustration, he was saying that we were fruitless while married to the law, because the law was impotent. He meant that we were unable to do good works. Now, in apparent contradiction, he says that we actually did bear fruit. However, his point is the same, for the fruit we bore then was fruit for death. Hence, we could do nothing to please God, and all we did do displeased him.

Even when we thought we were doing fine! Paul knew this by experience. He says in Philippians that before he met Christ he was so outstanding in his conduct that he could claim to have been "faultless" in respect to legal righteousness (Phil. 3:6). To use the terminology of Romans 7:6, he was indeed serving faultlessly "in the old way of the written code."

But it was not "in the Spirit." So not only was it not acceptable to God, it was actually evil. It was an exercise in self-righteousness, and it led even to the persecution of Christians. It was "fruit" of a sort. But it was fruit unto "death" quite literally.

What a difference when a person comes to Christ! In coming to Christ he or she is freed from a former unfruitful marriage to the law. The word Paul uses here (katērgēthēmen) is the word used in verse 2, where he spoke of a woman being freed from the law of marriage to her former husband by his death. Paul's point is the same. We died to the law in order to be brought into a new and fruitful relationship.

But let me now apply this in a slightly different way than I have done before. Up to this point I have been stressing what Paul himself has been stressing: that if we have been saved by God through the work of Jesus Christ, we must (and will) live differently. I have said that if we are not living differently, if we are simply continuing in sin as before, we are not Christians, regardless of our outward profession. I have often said to fellow Christians that the fruit of conversion must be seen in our lives.

Now I want to say something more. If those about us who are Christians really are Christians, not only is it the case that they must bear fruit to God—serving "in the new way of the Spirit, and not in the old way of the written code"—they actually are doing so, regardless of whether or not they are doing it in precisely the way you and I are doing it. They may be very different from us and may be serving in very different ways. But if they are truly Christians, they are serving God, and we should acknowledge it.

I want to tell you an incident from the life of Donald Grey Barnhouse that illustrates this truth. He was at a luncheon of ministers, and one of them remarked on the frigidity of a certain denomination. He was bothered by how little its ministers seemed to accomplish. Barnhouse replied by probing the thoughts of the others a bit further. He told of a scholar in that denomination who went through theological seminary and was ordained. But he seldom preached. In fact, he never went to a prayer meeting and even absented himself from church for many weeks at a time. He was really a bookworm and spent his days in the library. Even worse, he was intemperate in certain of his personal habits. The man lived this way for more than twenty years.

"What is your opinion of such a minister?" Barnhouse asked.

The others agreed that a man like that was no credit to the ministry.

The conversation took another turn, and Barnhouse asked what study helps these ministers used in sermon preparation, especially what they considered to be the most helpful concordance. They were unanimous in preferring Strong's concordance. ("Strong's for the strong. Young's for the young. Cruden's for the crude," we used to say in seminary.) They seemed to prefer Strong's for its Hebrew and Greek helps and for its comparative word lists. It saved them hours of work each week and was, they agreed, their most valuable tool.

Barnhouse then said, "The man whom you said was no credit to the ministry was James Strong, the author of the concordance you all find so valuable."

The ministers quickly saw the point. God does not give his children identical jobs to do. The ways they are called to serve vary. But all are serving in some way, if they are truly Christians. Barnhouse wrote, "The most forlorn Christian in the most humble surroundings, living in penury on the lowest cultural scale, is serving a purpose in the divine plan. The convert from a savage tribe, the professor in his study, the flighty young girl—all are serving the Lord. We must not be satisfied with the way we are serving him, but we must be satisfied with the place where God has put us. He wants you exactly where you are today."

Let's accept that—for others and for ourselves—and then make sure that we are actually serving him faithfully.

Chapter 89.
Sin's Sad Use of God's Good Law

Romans 7:7-12

A person would have to be extremely dense to have come as far as we have in our study of Romans and still not understand the limits of the law according to Paul's teaching. In the earliest chapters he has shown that law cannot justify a person. In the later chapters he has shown that neither can the law sanctify anyone. Therefore, if we are to be delivered from sin's penalty and power, it must be by the work of God in Jesus Christ and by the Holy Spirit.

But sometimes the very weight of an argument proves too much and appears to collapse because of it. That is what many people—perhaps you are one of them—might think here.

Someone might say: "Paul, you have shown that the law cannot justify or sanctify a person; it cannot declare him to be upright, and it cannot help him to become upright if he is not. If that is so, what is the value of the law? Doesn't that mean that the law actually has no worth and should just be thrown out entirely?" Or again: "You have said that sin is aroused by law so that those who hear the law actually do bad things they would not otherwise do. If that is the case, aren't you making the law of God sinful since it leads to evil?"

Since the law is from God, and God cannot do evil or produce anything that is evil, the gospel Paul teaches seems to collapse by this extension of it. However, these are faulty objections. The verses to which we come now show emphatically why the law is not sinful. In particular they speak of three good things the law does, even though it is powerless either to justify or sanctify a person.

The Law Reveals Sin As Sin

The first thing the law accomplishes, according to verse 7, is to reveal sin as sin. The verse says, "What shall we say, then? Is the law sin? Certainly not! Indeed I would not have known what sin was except through the law. For I would not have known what coveting really was if the law had not said, 'Do not covet.'"

There are two problems here, and it is important to understand both. The first problem is that if left to themselves, people never naturally think they are sinners. Take Genesis 6:5 as an example. It says that prior to the flood "the LORD saw how great man's wickedness on the earth had become, and that every inclination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil all the time." That is a description of sin as God sees it—every inclination of the thoughts of our hearts only evil all the time. But who really believes that? Who believes that his or her every inclination is to do evil? No one believes it apart from a supernatural illumination of his or her mind by the Holy Spirit.

Or take Romans 3:10-12, which we studied earlier: '"There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God. All have turned away, they have together become worthless; there is no one who does good, not even one.'" No one naturally believes that unless God reveals it to the person.

The second problem is this: Even if, by some means, we are able to admit that we have done bad things, we are never able to recognize those things as "sin" unless we can also be shown that they transgress the law of God. If we do things against the law of nature, or disregard standards of fair play or other moral criteria most people acknowledge, we may recognize those acts to be "wrong." We may violate the legal code of the country in which we live and recognize our acts to be "criminal." But we do not call either the morally wrong behavior or the criminal acts "sin" unless we see that these also violate God's law.

So the first good thing the law does is reveal that we are sinners. It does this by showing that the bad things we do are an offense to God. Leon Morris has it right when he says, "People without God's law do not see wrongdoing as it really is.... It takes the law to show wrongdoing to be sin."

In the second half of verse 7, Paul gives an illustration that is apparently from his personal experience, since this is the first place in the chapter where he speaks in the first person. His example has to do with covetousness, which is condemned by the last of the Ten Commandments. Paul seems to be saying that this was the point at which the conviction that he was himself a sinner was activated.

We know what Paul thought of himself before God began to work with him, because he tells about it in the third chapter of Philippians. Did Paul think he was a sinner in those days? When he was going around hating Christians? And killing some? Not at all! On the contrary, he thought that he was a very moral man. He says that as far as "legalistic righteousness" is concerned he considered himself to be "faultless" (Phil. 3:6). He thought he was a model of virtue. It was only as the law began to work on him—starting with the words "Do not covet"— that he saw himself as a sinner.

The Law Provokes Sin

The second good thing the law of God does is provoke sin, thereby drawing forth the realization of how bad sin really is. Here is the way Paul puts it: "But sin, seizing the opportunity afforded by the commandment, produced in me every kind of covetous desire..." (v. 8). This is what I call "sin's sad use of God's good law." We see it in several areas.

1. Sin, seizing the opportunity afforded by the commandment, creates a surge of rebellion in our hearts. The rebellion has been there all along, of course. That is what it means to be a sinner. It means to be a rebel against God. But when the law comes, this dormant rebellion is aroused from its slumber, as it were, and we discover what we are at heart.

Let me give two illustrations.

First, a biblical illustration. In the third chapter of Genesis we are told how Adam and Eve rebelled against God regarding the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. If God had not given them this law, there would have been nothing for them to have rebelled against and they would have continued in innocence. However, as soon as God said, "You must not eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, for when you eat of it you will surely die" (Gen. 2:17), this was the one thing Adam particularly wanted to do. Sin, seizing the opportunity afforded by the commandment, produced in him that covetous desire.

We know that Adam and Eve possessed an original innocence. So it is hard to explain—perhaps impossible to explain—how they could have rebelled against God's law. We cannot explain where sin came from.

Nevertheless, the story of the fall is given to us in the form it is given to show how the law itself brings out our rebellion.

Here is an historical illustration. Saint Augustine in his Confessions tells of a time in his youth when he and a band of his friends went into a neighbor's field at night to steal pears. They shook the neighbor's pear tree, knocking down a large quantity of pears, then carried them off, eating a few but throwing most of them to some pigs. Why did Augustine steal the pears? With characteristic thoroughness, this great medieval theologian analyzes the question for many pages.

Was it the beauty of the pears? They were beautiful, it is true, since they were part of God's creation. But that was not why he stole them. He had others of even greater beauty at home.

Was he hungry and needed something to eat? That was not it.

Did he want to be approved by the others? That was part of the reason, he says. But it does not explain why the others, like himself, should have given approval for such a wrong act. Why should stealing be praiseworthy?

At last Augustine gets to the real reason, saying, "I only picked them so that I might steal.... I loved nothing in it except the thieving." It is a way of saying that the desire to steal was awakened by the prohibition.

2. Sin, seizing the opportunity afforded by the commandment, creates a desire to sin in ways that were not even thought of before. In telling us not to do something, the law actually sets us to thinking about it, and because we are sinful people we soon find ourselves wanting to do that very thing.

Here is a personal illustration. One spring, when I was in the sixth grade, our school principal came into the classroom just before we were to be released to go home for lunch. He said he had heard that some of the students had been bringing firecrackers to school, and he wanted to say that this was definitely not allowed. Firecrackers were dangerous. They were against Pennsylvania state law. If any of his students even brought a firecracker into school, even if he did not set it off, he would be expelled from school immediately. He would never be able to come back.

Well! I did not own any firecrackers. I had not even been thinking about firecrackers. But, you know, when you get to thinking about firecrackers that really is an intriguing subject. And as I thought about them I remembered that one of my friends had some.

On the way home for lunch a friend and I went by this other friend's house, picked up a firecracker, and returned to school with it forty-five minutes later. We went into the cloakroom, invited another boy to come in with us, and said, "You hold the firecracker by the middle of the fuse. Pinch it very tight. Then we will light it. The others will think that it is going to explode. But when it burns down to your fingers it will go out, and everything will be all right."

What we had not counted on was that the lighted fuse would burn our friend's fingers. When it did, our friend dropped the firecracker. It exploded in an immense cloud of blue smoke and tiny bits of white paper, in the midst of which we emerged, a bit shaken, from the closet.

You cannot imagine how loud a firecracker sounds in an old school building with high ceilings, marble floors, and plaster walls! Nor can you imagine how quickly a principal can rush out of his office, down the hall, and into one of the classrooms. The principal was there even before my friends and I had staggered through the cloakroom's open door. He was as stunned as we were, though differently. I remember him saying over and over again, after we had been sent home and had come back to his office with our parents, "I had just made the announcement. I had just told them not to bring any firecrackers into school. I just can't believe it." He couldn't believe it then. But I am sure that our rebellion, as well as countless other acts of rebellion by thousands of children over the years, eventually turned him into a staunch, believing Calvinist—at least so far as the doctrine of total depravity of children is concerned.

That is what the law does. It provokes wickedness. Moreover, in doing so, it shows us not only that sin is sin, a violation of the law of God; it also shows how strong sin is. It must be very powerful if it can use even God's good law for such ends.

The Law Brings Us to the End of Ourselves

The third good thing the law does is bring us to the end of ourselves—to "death." This is what Paul is talking about in the latter half of this section, where he says: "Once I was alive apart from law; but when the commandment came, sin sprang to life and I died. I found that the very commandment that was intended to bring life actually brought death. For sin, seizing the opportunity afforded by the commandment, deceived me, and through the commandment put me to death" (vv. 9-11).

What does this mean? In what sense was Paul once "alive apart from the law"? Was he ever without knowledge of the law? And in what sense was he put to death?

The meaning of the passage seems to be quite clear. There was a time in Paul's life—we were talking about it earlier in regard to his claim to have been faultless as to legalistic righteousness—when Paul thought he was in good standing before God. God had told him what to do, and he had done it. If ever there was anyone who had pleased God, surely it was himself, Paul. As Leon Morris says, "He [was] alive in the sense that he had never been put to death as a result of a confrontation with the law of God." But then the commandment came. That is, it came home to him. He had known it before. If he is still referring to covetousness at this point, as he may be, he had known not to covet from his youth. But now he began to understand the commandment, and with this his self-righteousness and self-confidence began to melt away. The words he uses are: "I died."

What happened to him is what I have been describing. When the law finally began to get through to Paul to do its proper work, he saw (1) that he was guilty of having broken it, and (2) that his nature was such that, instead of wanting to keep it, he actually wanted to break it. Instead of driving sin out, the law awakened sin. He saw how hopeless his sinful condition was.

But that was a good thing, you see! As long as Paul thought he was doing all right, he was on his way to perdition. It was only when he learned he was lost that he was ready to hear God's words about the Savior.

Is the Law Sin? Certainly Not!

Is the law sin, then? That is the question with which Paul started out. Here is his answer: "Certainly not!" (v. 7). Rather, as we have seen, "The law is holy, and the commandment is holy, righteous and good" (v. 12). The law does exactly what God sent it into the world to do, and that purpose, actually a threefold purpose, is good.

This leads to a few important conclusions.

First, the law can never save anyone. It never has saved anyone and it never will. It was not meant to. Therefore, if you have been thinking of yourself as a fairly decent person—who generally measures up to whatever moral standards seem reasonable—and believe that God should be glad to accept your self-assessment, bless you in life, and in the end receive you into heaven, it is not the case that you have been hearing and obeying the law. Rather, you have not really begun even to understand it. The law is condemning you, but you, in your ignorance, are supposing that everything is all right.

What has been happening to you is what Paul describes in verse 11. "Sin, seizing the opportunity afforded by the commandment, deceived" you. How? By making you think that everything is fine, when actually you are perishing.

How subtle sin is! In his commentary on these verses, D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones lists nine ways in which sin commonly deceives us.

1. Sin gets us to misuse the law, convincing us that as long as we have not sinned outwardly and visibly, we are all right, forgetting that with God the thoughts and intentions of the heart are all important.
2. Sometimes sin changes its tactics and tells us that everything is hopeless and we might as well keep on sinning.
3. Sin tells us that it does not matter whether or not we are holy. It says, "Why don't you keep on sinning so that grace may abound?"
4. Sin deceives us by making us angry at the law, feeling that God is against us if he prohibits anything. If he were for us, we think, he would let us do what we want to do and be happy.
5. Sin gets us to believe that the law is unreasonable, impossible, and unjust.
6. Sin makes us think very highly of ourselves. It makes us ask why we should be bound by any law. Why shouldn't we become what Friedrich Nietzsche called a "superman" or a "superwoman" and be a law unto ourselves?
7. Sin tells us that the law is oppressive, keeping us from developing the wonderful gifts and talents we have within us, all of which would emerge if only we did not have to be held back by God's commandments.
8. Sin makes righteousness look drab and unattractive.
9. Sin causes us to discount the consequences of willful disobedience. It whispers what Satan said to Eve, "You will not surely die" (Gen. 3:4). It says that the most preposterous idea in the whole world is hell, forgetting that the Lord Jesus Christ spoke of hell more often than anyone else in the Bible.

If you are expecting to be judged righteous by God on the basis of your own good works, which is a form of law-keeping, sin has tricked you by one or more of these common spiritual deceptions, and you have not even begun to know what the law has been given to us for—let alone know and understand the gospel. Let me say it again: The law was not meant to save anyone. It was given to reveal sin as sin, to provoke sin in sinners, and to make clear our completely hopeless condition apart from Jesus Christ.

The law points us to Christ, whom we need desperately, especially if we are blindly trusting in our ability to keep it for the sake of our salvation.

Second, we need to teach the law to awaken people to their sinfulness and show them their need of a Savior. This is what the Puritans did so brilliantly. They even spoke of it by the terminology Paul uses in Romans. They said it was the preacher's task to "slay" men by the law so that they might be "raised up" by the gospel. We need that kind of preaching today. People need to know the uselessness of their own good works and so-called righteousness. They need to know how utterly hopeless the situation is without a Savior. They need to be convinced in their very bones that Jesus Christ is the only hope they have.

Instead, the majority of our churches provide largely self-help sermons and seminars designed to make people feel that they are doing very well, or at least are able to do very well, all by themselves. These churches do not use the law to bring them to the utter end of their selfconfidence.

And it must be the utter end, which is why the Puritans spoke of "slaying" people with the law. To slay means to kill. It does not mean to wound or make sick. It means to destroy selfrighteousness.

John H. Gerstner, Pittsburgh Theological Seminary's retired Professor of Church History, was preaching on Romans and expounding on the law. He was stripping away the veil on human wickedness. After the service, when he had gone to the back of the church, a woman approached him. She was holding up her hand with her index finger and thumb about a half-inch apart, and she said to Gerstner, "Dr. Gerstner, you make me feel this big."

Gerstner replied, "But, Madam, that's too big. That's much too big. Don't you know that that much self-righteousness will take you to hell?" He was right. The law was given to drive out all self-righteousness so that we might embrace Jesus Christ alone as our Savior.

Chapter 90.
Whatever Became of Sin?

Romans 7:13

As we have seen in our study of Romans 6:19-22, that is the question Dr. Karl Menninger, founder of the world-renowned Menninger Clinic in Topeka, Kansas, asked in the title of his best-selling book of 1973. His answer was simple. In the lifetimes of many of us, Menninger argued, sin has been redefined: first, as crime—that is, as transgression of the law of man rather than transgression of the law of God—and second, as symptoms. Since "symptoms" are caused by things external to the individual, they are seen as effects for which the offender is not responsible. Thus it happened that sin against God has been redefined (and dismissed) as the unfortunate effects of bad circumstances. And no one is to blame.

Yet sin is sin—and we are to blame. Sin, whether we acknowledge it or not, really is "any want of conformity unto or transgression of the law of God" (The Westminster Shorter Catechism, Answer 14).

This is what Paul has been talking about in Romans 7, of course. He has not begun at the point with which I have begun this chapter: with our lack of any true sense of being sinners. Rather, he has been approaching it from the other side, writing about the law and its functions. But the link between these two elements, sin and the law, is a matter of importance and is what Paul has been treating. His argument is that it is only by the law of God that we learn that sin really is sin and discover how evil it is.

Do you remember how Paul made these points in the paragraph containing verses 7-12? He argued that:

1. The law reveals sin to be sin.
2. Sin, seizing the opportunity afforded by the commandments of God, creates a surge of rebellion against those commands in our hearts and creates desires to sin in ways that we had not even thought of before.
3. In this way, the law, operated upon by sin, brings us to the end of ourselves.

And all this is good! Prior to receiving and understanding the law, we all think that we are doing pretty well, that we do not need a Savior or even God. It is only when the law has exposed our true nature to us, showing how bad we are, that we become open to the gospel.

This is now stated again in verse 13. In fact, what Paul says here is almost a direct echo of verse 7. "Did that which is good, then, become death to me? By no means! But in order that sin might be recognized as sin, it produced death in me through what was good, so that through the commandment sin might become utterly sinful."

Following up on that verse, I want to show in this study how the law actually operates. I want to do it by reviewing the Ten Commandments.

The First Commandment

The first commandment begins where we might expect it to begin, namely, in the area of our relationships to God. It says, "I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the land of slavery. You shall have no other gods before me" (Exod. 20:2-3).

This command requires us to worship the true God and to worship him only. John R. W. Stott writes:

It is not necessary to worship the sun, the moon and the stars to break this law. We break it whenever we give to something or someone other than God himself the first place in our thoughts or our affections. It may be some engrossing sport, absorbing hobby, or selfish ambition. Or it may be someone whom we idolize. We may worship a god of gold and silver in the form of safe investments and a healthy bank balance, or a God of wood and stone in the form of property and possessions.... Sin is fundamentally the exaltation of self at the expense of God. What someone wrote of the Englishman is true of everyman: "He is a self-made man who worships his creator."

To keep the first commandment perfectly, which is the only way rightly to keep this or any of the commandments, is, as Jesus taught, to "love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your mind" (Matt. 22:37; cf. Deut. 6:5). It means giving him first place in everything, in all our loves, goals, and actions. It means using all we are and have in his service. No one has ever kept this command perfectly except Jesus.

The Second Commandment

The first commandment dealt with the object of our worship, forbidding the worship of any false deity. The second commandment deals with the nature of our worship, forbidding us to worship even the true God unworthily. It speaks of this at length, saying, "You shall not make for yourself an idol in the form of anything in heaven above or on the earth beneath or in the waters below. You shall not bow down to them or worship them; for I, the LORD your God, am a jealous God, punishing the children for the sin of the fathers to the third and fourth generation of those who hate me, but showing love to a thousand generations of those who love me and keep my commandments" (Exod. 20:4-6).

What does this mean? Is it a condemnation of idol worship only, a text forbidding us to worship by means of gold, silver, wood, or stone objects? Obviously it means more than that. It concerns the worship of God by any and all inadequate means.

One inadequate means, one "idol," is the mental images of God we carry about in our heads. J. B. Phillips wrote an entire book about this, calling it Your God Is Too Small. He spoke of our inadequate images of God by such chapter titles as: Resident Policeman, Parental Hangover, Grand Old Man, Meek-and-Mild, Absolute Perfection, Heavenly Bosom, God-in-a-Box, Managing Director, Perennial Grievance, Pale Galilean, and so forth. We all have these inadequate ideas of God, which we prove by our irritation with God when he refuses to conform to our misunderstanding of him as "small," or when he declines to do precisely what we want him to do on some occasion.

A second way we worship unworthily is by going through the forms of worship without actually engaging our hearts or minds in our devotions. We go to church, but our minds are somewhere else. We pray, but it is only our heads that bow down, not our hearts.

The Third Commandment

The third commandment says, "You shall not misuse the name of the LORD your God, for the LORD will not hold anyone guiltless who misuses his name" (Exod. 20:7). This law is widely flouted in our time, and not only by people who swear ferociously—or even mildly, by using the almost universal exclamation, "Oh, my God!" The commandment is broken when we confess Jesus to be "Lord" but do not follow him as Lord, or when we call God "Father" but do not trust him as the loving parent he is.

The great Puritan pastor and writer Thomas Watson said, "We take God's name in vain:

1. When we speak slightly and irreverently of his name....
2. When we profess God's name, but do not live answerably to it....
3. When we use God's name in idle discourse....
4. When we worship him with our lips, but not with our hearts....
5. When we pray to him, but do not believe in him....

6. When in any way we profane and abuse his word....
7. When we swear by God's name....
8. When we prefix God's name to any wicked action....
9. When we use our tongues any way to the dishonor of God's name....
10. When we make rash and unlawful vows....
11. When we speak evil of God....
12. When we falsify our promise."

Some people may take such ways of dishonoring God's name lightly, thinking them of no great account. But God says that he takes the third commandment very seriously. He says that he "will not hold anyone guiltless" who commits these offenses.

The Fourth Commandment

"Remember the Sabbath day by keeping it holy. Six days you shall labor and do all your work, but the seventh day is a Sabbath to the LORD your God. On it you shall not do any work, neither you, nor your son or daughter, nor your manservant or maidservant, nor your animals, nor the alien within your gates. For in six days the LORD made the heavens and the earth, the sea, and all that is in them, but he rested on the seventh day. Therefore the LORD blessed the Sabbath day and made it holy" (Exod. 20:8-11).

These verses contain the longest elaboration on any one of the Ten Commandments. Yet there are differences among Christians concerning their interpretation. Some insist that they require Christians to worship on Saturday, the Jewish Sabbath. Seventh-day Adventists are an example. Others believe that Christians are to worship on Sunday, the Lord's Day, but want their observance to be according to Judaic tradition, that is, to observe the Sabbath by inactivity, as the ancient Jews did. Still others think of the Lord's Day as a Christian innovation, a new day given to the church by God for worship and joyful service.

I think the New Testament supports the latter view. But I ask whether we really observe either Saturday or Sunday in any special way. Do we use the whole of either day for worship or Christian service? Who among us truly keeps the Sabbath or the Lord's Day "holy"?

The Fifth Commandment

When we pass from the fourth to the fifth commandment, we also pass from the first table of the law, which concerns our relationships to God, to the second table of the law, which concerns our relationships to other people. It begins with family relationships: "Honor your father and your mother, so that you may live long in the land the LORD your God is giving you" (Exod. 20:12).

This chiefly has to do with human authority, for our parents are the first human authority God sets over us. Other authorities, all with different and variously restricted powers, include the state, the leaders of the church, and our employers. To fulfill this command we would have to do what Paul says further on in Romans: "Give everyone what you owe him: If you owe taxes, pay taxes; if revenue, then revenue; if respect, then respect; if honor, then honor" (Rom. 13:7). Yet we all rebel against authority, beginning in the home. At times it seems that the home is where we are particularly rude, unmannerly, disobedient, and ungrateful.

The Sixth Commandment

"You shall not murder" (Exod. 20:13). Jesus explained this command by showing that it concerns more than the taking of another person's life. It also concerns damaging his or her reputation in any way. "I tell you that anyone who is angry with his brother will be subject to judgment," Jesus said (Matt. 5:22).

This commandment searches the depth of our beings, for if we are honest with ourselves we will admit that we are often very angry and say things explicitly intended to hurt the target of our anger. But is there no such thing as righteous anger? Of course. Jesus displayed righteous anger when he drove the money changers from the temple. But our anger is seldom like that. Instead, our anger is generally aroused only by some real or imagined slight against ourselves. Do we commit murder? Yes, we do—by this definition. We murder by neglect, spite, gossip, slander, and many other acts flowing from our own enormous pride or jealousy.

Even preachers! Thomas Watson, himself a preacher, said, "Ministers are murderers [if they]... starve, poison or infect souls."

The Seventh Commandment

The seventh commandment is the one most of us think about most often when we remember God's commandments, if we remember them at all. This is hardly a surprise, because most of us are thinking of sexual matters, even sexual sins, most of the time, and this is one command that speaks directly to this area of our lives. It is in light of our sexuality that we seem to feel most guilty.

"You shall not commit adultery" (Exod. 20:14).

Jesus commented on this commandment also and, as in his interpretation of the prohibition against murder, he showed its true intention: "You have heard that it was said, 'Do not commit adultery.' But I tell you that anyone who looks at a woman lustfully has already committed adultery with her in his heart" (Matt. 5:27-28). John Stott has written of this commandment:

It includes flirting, experimenting, and solitary sexual experience. It also includes all sexual perversions, for although men and women are not responsible for a perverted instinct, they are for its indulgence. It includes selfish demands within wedlock, and many, if not all, divorces. It includes the deliberate reading of pornographic literature, and giving in to impure fantasies.... The commandment... embraces every abuse of a sacred and beautiful gift of God."

The positive side of this command is chastity before marriage and faithfulness afterwards.

The Eighth Commandment

"You shall not steal" (Exod. 20:15). The ban against stealing is almost a universal standard of the human race. It is found in most cultures. But it is only biblical religion that explains why it is wrong to steal, in addition to the obvious fact that theft is socially disruptive and inconvenient. The real reason it is wrong to steal is that what the other person possesses has been given to him or her by God. "Every good and perfect gift is from above, coming down from the Father of the heavenly lights..." (James 1:17). Therefore, to take anything from one to whom it is given is to sin against God.

We do this in many ways. We steal from an employer when we do not give him the best work of which we are capable or when we waste time or leave work early. We steal from our customers if we charge too much for our products or services or if we knowingly sell what is inferior. We steal from others when we borrow from them but do not return what we have borrowed on time, if at all. We steal from ourselves when we squander our talents or time. We steal from God directly when we neglect to give him the worship, honor, thanksgiving, and obedience he deserves.

There is a positive side to this command, too. For Paul, when he was writing to the Ephesians, said to those who had been thieves, "He who has been stealing must steal no longer, but must work, doing something useful with his own hands, that he may have something to share with those in need" (Eph. 4:28). According to Paul, the eighth commandment remained unfulfilled until the offender began to help others who were in need.

The Ninth Commandment

The ninth commandment says, "You shall not give false testimony against your neighbor" (Exod. 20:16). This is a warning against perjury. But again, it is far more than that. Negatively, it condemns all slander, idle talk, gossip, unkind rumors, jokes at another person's expense, lies, and deliberate exaggerations or distortions of the truth. It concerns even listening to such unkind things uncritically. Positively, the commandment concerns our failures to rise to the defense of those we know to be verbally abused in any way.

The Tenth Commandment

The tenth commandment is in some ways the most revealing and devastating of all, for it deals explicitly with the inward and not merely the outward nature of the law. It concerns covetousness, which is an internal attitude that may or may not express itself in an outwardly acquisitive act. The text says, "You shall not covet your neighbor's house. You shall not covet your neighbor's wife, or his manservant or maidservant, his ox or donkey, or anything that belongs to your neighbor" (Exod. 20:17).

Covetousness is a root sin, for, as Watson says, when it is exercised fully it causes a breach of each of the other commandments.

How relevant and modern this is, and how keenly it strikes at our excessively materialistic culture. We live in a grasping and thus very offensive society. One offensive element of materialism is our insensitivity to the needs of others, which it so often breeds, since it is often only at the expense of others that we are able to get ahead. Even more offensive is our unreasonable dissatisfaction with our abundance of wealth and opportunity. Those who have most seem often to be the most unhappy. Unfortunately, this restless desire for more is what the media seem determined to produce in us and fan to white hot flames. There are few who even recognize what is happening, let along resist it substantially.

There is probably no other command that so exposes this characteristic sin of our time and generation.

But where do we go from here? We have used the Ten Commandments to explore ten areas in which God requires certain standards of conduct from us, and we have found ourselves to be sinners by those standards.

And not only have we been exposed as sinners, which is what Paul writes about in the first part of Romans 7:13 ("in order that sin might be recognized as sin"), we have also been shown to be exceedingly sinful, which is what he says in the second half ("so that through the commandment sin might become utterly sinful"). In other words, sin is always much worse than we imagine. In fact, the more we read and understand the law, the greater our sin will seem to be. And that will continue until, like Paul himself, we cry out, "Who will rescue me from this body of death?" and we are able to answer, "God—through Jesus Christ our Lord!" (Rom. 7:24, 25).

God cannot condone sin, however much we may wish it. He tells us that he will by no means clear the guilty. He teaches that "the wages of sin is death" (Rom. 6:23). His judgment will be executed. But at the very time he exposes the sin, he also points us to Jesus, who is sin's remedy.

Return now to Paul's questions about the law in the first half of Romans 7.

First question: "Is the law sin?"

Answer: "Certainly not! Indeed I would not have known what sin was except through the law"
(v. 7).

Second question: "Did that which is good, then, become death to me?"

Answer: "By no means! But in order that sin might be recognized as sin, it produced death in me through what was good, so that through the commandment sin might become utterly sinful" (v. 13).

And the end of that is life! Why? Because only those who know they are dead in trespasses and sins seek a Savior. Only those who know they are spiritually sick seek the Great Physician.

Chapter 91.
Who Is the "Man" of Romans 7?

Romans 7:14-20

There are few passages in the Bible over which competent Bible students have divided more radically than the last half of Romans 7, beginning with verse 14. This is a section of the letter in which Paul is speaking of himself, describing a fierce internal struggle with sin. And the question is: Of what stage in his life is he speaking? Is he speaking of the present, that is, of the time of his writing the letter—when he was a mature Christian, indeed an apostle? Or is he speaking of himself as he was in the past, before his conversion? Or is the true answer somewhere in between?

Who is the "man" of Romans 7? This question has divided Bible students from the earliest days of the church and continues to divide them today.

It is a serious question, too. Some problems of Bible interpretation may be of limited importance, the specifics of prophecy, for instance. But this is a section of Romans in which Paul is discussing the Christian life. He seems to be answering two related questions: How can I live a triumphant Christian life? How can I achieve victory over sin? Any true Christian wants the answer to those questions. So, unlike differing opinions concerning other, less practical parts of Scripture, we all instinctively take seriously the discussion of any diverse interpretations of this passage.

How should we proceed? In this study I want to present four main interpretations of these verses and evaluate each one.

The "Man" of Romans 7 Is Unsaved

The first view is that the "man" of Romans 7 is the apostle Paul as he was while unregenerate, that is, when he was not yet a Christian. This seems to have been the dominant view in the early church. In fact, the great Saint Augustine held it at first, though later, as a result of his maturing study of the Bible, he came to believe that what is said here is true of the regenerate person, too.

According to this view, Paul could not say the things he says here if he were truly a Christian.

What things?

Well, that he is "a slave to sin," for example (v. 14). This claim is particularly troublesome because Paul has previously said, "But thanks be to God that, though you used to be slaves to sin, you wholeheartedly obeyed the form of teaching to which you were entrusted. You have been set free from sin and have become slaves to righteousness" (Rom. 6:17-18). If Paul is speaking as a Christian, how can he say that Christians have been freed from sin's slavery in chapter 6 and then say that he is himself "a slave to sin" in chapter 7?

Paul also says, "Nothing good lives in me" (v. 18). True, he qualifies that at once by adding, "that is, in my sinful nature." But even so, can a believer really speak in these terms, knowing that God dwells within him and is working "to will and to act according to his good purpose" (Phil. 2:13)?

A bit further on Paul cries, "What a wretched man I am! Who will rescue me from this body of death?" (v. 24). Doesn't he know that he has been rescued by Christ? How can any true Christian make that statement?

In spite of the appeal of this interpretation, which is considerable, the view has several major flaws which in our day have caused most commentators to abandon it. Let me suggest a few.

1. What Paul says of himself in Romans 7:14-24 is not what Paul says of his pre-Christian state in other passages. Paul is distressed over his inability to fulfill the law's just demands. He is wretched as a result of his failure. He is calling out for deliverance by someone outside himself. But what unbeliever ever thinks like that? What Paul thought of himself before his conversion is summarized in Philippians 3, where he claims to have been "faultless" as far as "legalistic righteousness" is concerned (v. 6). The unbeliever is not distressed by his failure to keep God's law.

On the contrary, he is satisfied with his performance. He is self-righteous and self-confident. He does not even know he needs to be saved.

Here is the problem in a nutshell: In Romans 7:18, Paul says, "I have the desire to do what is good, but I cannot carry it out." But when he was an unbeliever he would have said, "I have the desire to do what is good, and I am doing it."

2. Paul's delight in God's law, expressed in this passage, cannot be found in unbelievers. What he says in Romans 7 is that "the law is good" and that "in my inner being I delight in God's law" (vv. 16, 22). Is that the attitude of the unbeliever? Not according to Paul's teaching elsewhere in Romans. Just before these verses, Paul has spoken of the effects of the law on sinners, saying that it exposes sin and provokes all kinds of evil desires, that is, rebellion against its demands. In the following section, in Romans 8, Paul argues that "the sinful mind is hostile to God. It does not submit to God's law, nor can it do so" (v. 7).

The "man" of Romans 7 is one who has moved beyond the hostility to God's law exercised by the unregenerate person.

3. The present tense is used throughout the second half of Romans 7, and this is an apparently meaningful contrast with the past tense employed earlier. In verses 7-13, the verbs are in the aorist tense: "Once I was alive apart from law; but when the commandment came, sin sprang to life and I died" (v. 9); "sin... put me to death" (v. 11); "sin... produced death in me through what was good" (v. 13). Those sentences (to which I have added italics) are written of a past experience. In verses 14-24, the present tense is used: "I am unspiritual" (v. 14); "I do not understand what I do" (v. 15); "I agree that the law is good" (v. 16), and so on. It is hard to deny that this is speaking of Paul's present, and therefore a truly Christian, experience.

As J. I. Packer says, "Paul's shift from the past tense to the present in verse 14 has no natural explanation save that he now moves on from talking about his experience with God's law in his pre-Christian days to talking about his experience as it was at the time of writing."

The "Man" of Romans 7 Is a "Carnal Christian"

The second view is a very popular one today. It is best known by the phrase "the carnal
Christian." It holds that Paul is indeed speaking of himself as a Christian (for some of the reasons outlined above) but that he is speaking of himself (or of himself theoretically) as being in an immature or unsurrendered state. Defenders of this view observe that the "man" of Romans 7 is defeated and that this should not be true of the mature Christian. They observe how strongly the focus is on the self —the word "I" occurs twenty-six times in verses 14-24, and the words "me," "my" or "myself twelve times more. The Holy Spirit, the secret to victory in the Christian life, is not mentioned in this chapter at all.

This view sees an enormous contrast between Romans 7, which is thought of as a chapter of defeat, and Romans 8, which is thought of as a chapter of victory through the Holy Spirit's power. Sometimes a Christian is told that the secret to victory is to get "self off the throne of one's life and allow the Spirit to take control—to stop living in Romans 7 and get on to Romans
8.

Is this view valid? Is this what these verses are all about?

This is not my understanding, as I pointed out in a previous study. But let me begin by saying something positive. The truths in "the carnal Christian" theology are that Christians do indeed have a sinful nature and that they are not able to have victory in their lives apart from the Holy Spirit. This is the evident movement from chapter 7 to chapter 8.

The victory that we are to have is not our doing. It is "through Jesus Christ our Lord" (v. 25) and by the Holy Spirit (Rom. 8).

Nevertheless, the weaknesses of this view (and I must add also the errors and dangers) far outweigh the truths. The chief weakness is the doctrine of "the carnal Christian" itself. This view postulates a two-stage Christian experience in which, in stage one, a person accepts Jesus as Savior only, without accepting him as Lord of his or her life, and then later, in stage two, goes on to receive him as Lord. This is just not biblical. Above all, it is not what Paul is saying or has been saying in Romans.

One rule of interpretation is that the meaning of any word or phrase must be determined by its context, and if this is applied to Paul's use of the word carnal, or fleshly (NIV translates "sinful nature"), in these chapters, the result is something quite different from "the carnal Christian" theology. If we look at Romans 8:5-8, we see that these verses contrast an individual controlled by the carnal, or sinful, nature with one controlled by the Spirit. But the contrast is not between worldly Christians and those who have "progressed" to the point of taking Jesus Christ as Lord. The contrast is between those who are Christians and those who are not Christians at all. Paul declares that "the mind of sinful man is death, but the mind controlled by the Spirit is life and peace; the sinful mind is hostile to God. It does not submit to God's law, nor can it do so" (vv. 67).

Does this mean, then, that when Paul uses the word carnal (or fleshly) of himself in Romans 7, he is speaking of himself as an unbeliever, the first of the views discussed? No, we have already seen reasons why that is not correct. What does it mean then? It means that the struggle Paul is describing is between himself as a new creature in Christ, the new man, and that old, sinful, unChristian nature that he nevertheless retains in some measure. The struggle is part of what it means to be a Christian in an as-yet unperfected state. It does not mean that there is a first or early stage in the Christian life that may be described as "carnal."

We must remember that the flow of Romans 5 through 8 is from justification by faith to glorification and that chapters 6 and 7 are parentheses, inserted between chapters 5 and 8 in order to deal with Antinomianism (chap. 6) and the purpose and limits of the law (chap. 7). There is no two-stage doctrine of Christianity here at all.

The "Man" of Romans 7 Is under Conviction

A third view has been advanced by D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones, following, it would seem, a suggestion made a century ago, though briefly, by Frederick Godet. This approach takes everything that has been said thus far with full seriousness, drawing the apparently paradoxical conclusion that what Paul says here can be said of neither the unregenerate nor the regenerate man. The unsaved person cannot speak of the law as Paul does. He does not understand its good and spiritual character. He is in rebellion against it. On the other hand, the saved person cannot speak in such a defeated manner. He cannot cry out for deliverance, because he knows he has already been delivered from the power of sin through the work of Christ. The "man" of Romans 7 is therefore one who does not yet know who can deliver him.

But where does that leave us? If Paul is not speaking of a regenerate or an unregenerate person, of whom is he speaking? Lloyd-Jones answers that he is speaking of one who has been awakened to his personal lawlessness and spiritual inability by the Holy Spirit but who has not yet been made a participator in the new life of Jesus Christ. He is one who, in the language of the American revivals of the eighteenth century, may be said to have been "awakened" to the truth of his condition but who is not yet "revived." The work has been started, but it has not yet come to fruition.

Here is how Godet put it: "The apostle is speaking here neither of the natural man in his state of voluntary ignorance and sin, nor of the child of God, born anew, set free by grace, and animated by the spirit of Christ; but of the man whose conscience, awakened by the law, has entered sincerely, with fear and trembling, but still in his own strength, into the desperate struggle against evil."

What shall we say of this interpretation? It sounds reasonable, certainly. It is an attempt to take the data seriously, and it is advanced by sound scholars, particularly Martyn Lloyd-Jones, who examines each phrase carefully. Still, it has problems.

1. It does not account for the change from the past tense of the verbs in verses 1-13 to the present tense, beginning with verse 14. According to this view, what Paul says in verses 14-24 is of the past. It concerns the time of his own spiritual awakening, perhaps associated with his role in the martyrdom of Stephen when he began to "kick against the goads" (Acts 26:14). There would be no reason for the present tense at all. The only way Lloyd-Jones can deal with this is to say that the change is of no real importance.

2. It is not true that the "man" of Romans 7 does not yet know who can deliver him. Paul is writing of a struggle we all feel at times, wanting to do what is right while being unable in himself to do it. But as soon as he cries out, "What a wretched man I am! Who will deliver me from this body of death?" he has the answer: "Thanks be to God—through Jesus Christ our Lord!" (vv. 24, 25). There is no reason to separate the problem from the answer temporally, as if Paul somehow passes from a state of conviction to a state of grace between the last two verses of the chapter.

The "Man" of Romans 7 Is a Mature Christian

The final view, which is that of most Reformed commentators from the time of the later Augustine forward, including Luther, Calvin, and the Puritans, is that Paul is writing of himself as a mature Christian, describing the Christian's continuing conflict with sin, which we all experience, and teaching that there is no victory in such struggles apart from the Holy Spirit. To put it in other words, since Romans 7 is discussing the function and limits of the law, Paul is saying that just as the law of God is unable to justify a person (justification is made possible by the work of Christ), so also is the law unable to sanctify a person. Sanctification must be accomplished in us by the Holy Spirit.

Here is how Packer summarizes these verses:

Alive in Christ, his heart delights in the law, and he wants to do what is good and right and thus keep it perfectly.... But he finds that he cannot achieve the total compliance at which he aims. Whenever he measures what he has done, he finds that he has fallen short (v. 23). From this he perceives that the anti-God urge called sin, though dethroned in his heart, still dwells in his own flawed nature.... Thus the Christian's moral experience (for Paul would not be telling his own experience to make theological points, did he not think it typical) is that his reach persistently exceeds his grasp and that his desire for perfection is frustrated by the discomposing and distracting energies of indwelling sin.

Stating this sad fact about himself, renews Paul's distress at it, and in the cry of verses 24, 25 he voices his grief at not being able to glorify God more: "Wretched man that I am! Who will deliver me from this body of death?" Then at once he answers his own question: "Thanks be to God through Jesus Christ our Lord!..." The question was asked in the future tense, so the verb to be supplied in the answer should be in the future tense too: "Thank God! He will deliver me through Jesus Christ!"

Paul here proclaims that his present involuntary imperfection, summed up in the latter part of verse 25, will one day be made a thing of the past through the redemption of the body referred to in chapter 8:23.... For that future redemption we must long and wait, maintaining always the twoworld, homeward-traveling, hoping-for-glory perspective that pervades the whole New Testament.

This is the point at which, in the next study, we are going to pick up the story of the continuing struggle of the Christian against indwelling sin. But even here we must make a few observations.

First, when Paul writes of "this body of death" in verse 24, which bemoans his wretched state, he is saying exactly what he said in Romans 6. (Notice the words I have italicized.) Paul spoke of our being crucified with Christ so that "the body of sin might be rendered powerless [done away with], that we should no longer be slaves of sin" (v. 6); several verses later, he wrote, "Therefore do not let sin reign in your mortal body so that you obey its evil desires. Do not offer the parts of your body to sin, as instruments of wickedness, but rather offer yourselves to God..." (vv. 12-13). In Romans 6, Paul discussed the deliverance that is ours through our having been crucified and raised with Christ. But he also acknowledged the continuing presence of sin in us through our bodies and reminded us that we must struggle against it. It is the same in Romans 7, though here Paul is emphasizing the futility of the struggle if it is in our own strength.

Second, although stated in extreme terms in Romans 7, an honest acknowledgment of the hopelessly sinful nature of man apart from the Holy Spirit (which is what we find here), even after a person has become a Christian, is the first step to true holiness. In other words, to say, "I have passed out of Romans 7 into Romans 8," is not the mark of a mature Christian but of an immature one. The mature Christian knows that he is always in Romans 7 apart from the Holy Spirit. Moreover, he knows that dependence on the Holy Spirit is not something that is attained once for all but is the result of a daily struggle and a constantly renewed commitment.

What is sanctification? Is it an awareness of how good we are becoming? Or is it a growing sense of how sinful we really are, so we will constandy turn to and depend upon Jesus Christ? If we are mature in Christ, we know it is the latter.

Chapter 92.
The War Within

Romans 7:21-24

At the beginning of the last study I said that there are few passages in the Bible over which good Bible students have divided more radically than the last half of Romans 7, beginning with verse 14. Now, having finished that study, you can probably see why. In it I carefully worked through the four main interpretations of these verses, asking the important question "Who is the 'Man' of Romans 7?" We saw that the options are:

1. An unsaved person,
2. A "carnal Christian,"
3. A person who has come under conviction as a result of the Holy Spirit's work in his or her life, but who is not yet born again, and
4. A mature Christian.

In some ways, the last seems hardest to accept. But I tried to show reasons why the fourth of these possibilities is the right one and why it is necessary for us to know it, if we are to move ahead realistically in the Christian life. If we are Christians, we will never get anywhere by assuming that the seventh chapter of Romans is written about someone other than ourselves— someone who is not yet saved or not yet "mature" in the faith, as we are. Paul is writing about himself as a mature Christian and therefore about all who are true believers.

I ended our discussion in the last study by stating that sanctification is the process of coming increasingly to see how sinful we are so that we will depend constantly on Jesus Christ. And that is not easy! The Christian life is a warfare, a warfare within against our inherently sinful natures, as well as a warfare without against external forces. It is extremely important that we see this.

The Passage As a Whole

I think that Paul must have been concerned that we see this and that he recognized that it is difficult. I say this because in these verses Paul goes to considerable lengths to teach these truths to us.

Notice that in verses 14-24 Paul says almost exactly the same thing three distinct times. The first time is in verses 14-17. The second is in verses 18-20. The third is in verses 21-24. Each of these begins with a statement of the problem: "I am unspiritual, sold as a slave to sin" (v. 14); "nothing good lives in me, that is, in my sinful nature" (v. 18); and "when I want to do good, evil is right there with me" (v. 21). Each section then provides a description of the conflict: "what I want to do I do not do, but what I hate I do" (v. 15); "I have the desire to do what is good, but I cannot carry it out. For what I do is not the good I want to do; no, the evil I do not want to do—this I keep on doing" (vv. 18-19); and "in my inner being I delight in God's law; but I see another law at work in the members of my body, waging war against the law of my mind and making me a prisoner of the law of sin at work within my members" (vv. 22-23). Each section ends with a brief statement of why the problem exists: "it is sin living in me" (v. 17); "it is sin living in me" (v. 20); and "this body of death" (v. 24).

What distinguishes these three sections is that in the first Paul states the matter generally, in the second he states it in terms of his doing what he does not want to do, and in the third he says that he finds it impossible to do what he does want to do: "when I want to do good, evil is right there with me" (v. 21).

I repeat again that this describes the conflict of a mature Christian man, in fact, the conflict of an apostle of Jesus Christ in his later years. So the struggle Paul speaks of is a struggle we all face and will continue to face—if we are Christians. And the defeat he speaks of is the experience of all—even when we are well along in the Christian life—apart from the Holy Spirit.

"The American Way"

However, Paul is not writing these words to excuse our defeat, still less to encourage it. He is thinking of the victory that can and will be ours (see v. 25 and chap. 8). He wants us to achieve victory in the struggle against sin by the Holy Spirit. But the point here is that the victory we want comes only through this struggle and not by some secret formula for success or by some easy way of avoiding it.

I believe that at this point we Americans particularly need to hear what Paul is saying, for we hate conflict and are usually trying to avoid it by any means possible. Let me suggest three ways that American Christians try to avoid the struggle against sin, which (according to the teaching of Romans 7) will always be part of our lives.

1. A formula. The first way we try to avoid struggle in the Christian life is by hunting for some easy formula that will bring victory. This takes various forms: discovering a Christian book that will tell us what to do, following a three-step or four-step recipe for growth in the Christian life, ceasing to do some easy things (like going to movies), or starting to do more difficult things (like attending seminars). You know what I mean:

"Get out of Romans 7 and into Romans 8."
"Let go and let God."
"Get 'self off the throne of your life and put Christ there."
"Just let Jesus take control."

The underlying motivation for these attempts is our lazy optimism—the expectation that life is meant to be easy, not hard. So, if we do find the Christian life hard, we assume that we are merely missing the right formula. Someone should be able to tell us what the formula is. If we do not find it—and we never will if ease is what we are seeking—we tend to get angry with our instructors or even with God.

2. A new experience. The second way we try to avoid struggle in the Christian life is by hunting for some new spiritual experience. This can be a charismatic-type experience—speaking in tongues, perhaps. It can be what used to be called "a second work of grace" in which we pass forever out of a defeated Christian state into a victorious one. Or it can be something as straightforward as an emotional experience in worship. In speaking of emotion in worship I do not mean to suggest that this is bad. It is not. We have hearts as well as heads, and we are undoubtedly to worship with both. But emotion, even in worship, is bad if it is thought of as a substitute for or an escape from the fight against sin, which is an inescapable part of the lifelong process of sanctification.

To come home from a church service saying, "Didn't we have a worshipful experience?" means nothing unless we have acquired the biblical knowledge with which we can fight against sin and a renewed commitment to do so.

3. Avoidance. The third way we try to escape struggle in the Christian life is typically "American": avoidance. That is, when we are defeated, rather than girding up our loins and turning to attack the problem again, we turn away from it and try to fill our minds with something else. Often this "something else" is television or other entertainment. Sometimes it is empty busyness—even in Christian activities. Just as with unbelievers, avoidance may be through alcohol or drugs for some.

Spiritual Realism

What I want to commend to you as we face the fact of the war within us is what J. I. Packer calls "spiritual realism." He talks about it toward the end of his study of the various Christian views of holiness, Keep in Step with the Spirit. As Packer defines it, "Realism has to do with our willingness or lack of willingness to face unpalatable truths about ourselves and to start making necessary changes. In light of Romans 7:14-24, I want to suggest four statements with which this spiritual realism should start.

1. When God called us to be Christian people he called us to lifetime struggles against sin.

This should be evident from everything Paul says in this passage. But we seem to take extraordinary measures to avoid this truth. One way of avoiding it is by a kind of unrealistic romanticism in which we kid ourselves into thinking that everything is well with us spiritually or is at least well enough for us to get by with for now. This is particularly easy if we are affluent and do not need to worry about having enough to eat or paying the mortgage and if we can always battle occasional bouts of depression by going out for dinner or by taking a vacation. "No pain, no gain," we say, yet we labor rigorously to avoid spiritual growth pains.

We also avoid this truth by shifting the blame, as Packer suggests in his discussion. It is what Adam and Eve did when God confronted them with their sin in the Garden of Eden.

Adam blamed Eve, saying, "The woman you put here with me—she gave me some fruit from the tree, and I ate it" (Gen. 3:12). But since he pointed out that it was God who gave him the woman, Adam was really blaming God for his trouble.

Eve blamed the devil: "The serpent deceived me, and I ate" (v. 13). But since God had apparently allowed the serpent to come into the garden, this was only a slightly gentler way of also blaming God.

Packer says, "We are assiduous blamers of others for whatever goes wrong in our marriages, families, churches, careers, and so on.... Romantic complacency and resourcefulness in acting the injured innocent are among the most Spirit-quenching traits imaginable, since both become excuses for doing nothing in situations where realism requires that we do something and do it as a matter of urgency. Both states stifle conviction of sin in the unconverted and keep Christians in a thoroughly bad state of spiritual health."

The starting place for achieving spiritual realism is to recognize that we are called to a constant spiritual warfare in this life and that this warfare is not easy, since it is against the sin that resides in us even as converted men and women. Realism calls for rigorous preparation, constant alertness, dogged determinism, and moment-by-moment trust in him who alone can give us victory. Here is the essence of the matter in the words of a great hymn by Johann B. Freystein (translated by Catherine Winkworth):

Rise, my soul, to watch and pray. From thy sleep awaken;

Be not by the evil day Unawares o'ertaken.

For the foe, well we know, Oft the harvest reapeth
While the Christian sleepeth.

Watch against thyself, my soul, Less with grace thou trifle;
Let not self thy thoughts control, Nor God's mercy stifle.
Pride and sin lurk within
All thy hopes to scatter; heed not when they flatter.

I do not know any hymn that describes the battle within us better or in more realistic language.

2. Although we are called to a lifetime struggle against sin, we are nevertheless never going to achieve victory by ourselves.

This is another point that Americans in particular need to grasp. For while we are as a people very susceptible to either simple, quick-fix solutions or avoidance, we are also very confident of our ability to handle even the most difficult challenges. Like putting a man on the moon, we figure that, however tough the problem may be, with enough energy, skill, resourcefulness, and determination we can solve it. Live a victorious Christian life? Of course we can do it—if we really want to. So we say, "When the going gets tough, the tough gets going!" or, "You can if you believe you can."

In this we are perhaps more like the apostle Peter than anyone else in the Bible. Do you remember Peter's boast that, whatever might be true of the other disciples, he at least would never betray Jesus? "Lord, I am ready to go with you to prison and to death," said Peter (Luke 22:33). And he meant it! Peter loved Jesus, and he believed that the sheer intensity of his love would enable him to stand firm even in the midst of the greatest spiritual struggles.

But Jesus knew Peter, just as he knows us, and he replied, "I tell you, Peter, before the rooster crows today, you will deny three times that you know me" (v. 34).

In himself, Peter was unable to stand against Satan's temptation even for a moment. When the temptation came he fell. But fortunately this was not all Jesus said to Peter. Although Peter was boastful and self-confident and was wrong in both, Jesus had also told him, "Simon, Simon, Satan has asked to sift you as wheat. But I have prayed for you, Simon, that your faith may not fail. And when you have turned back, strengthen your brothers" (vv. 31-32).

If we could rephrase those words to express what Peter would probably say to us if he were writing this chapter, it would go like this: "When Jesus told me that he had prayed for me so that my faith would not fail, he meant that apart from him I could not stand against Satan even for a moment. I could not go it alone. However strong my devotion or determination, when the chips were down I would deny him. I did! And so will you—this is what I am to tell you—unless you are depending on Jesus every moment. Moreover, in the great battles of life it is certain that you will fall away and be lost unless he prays for you, which is what he has promised to do. 'Apart from me you can do nothing' is what he told us. I proved the truth of his words by my denial, and you will, too, unless you are depending on him constantly."

3. Even when we triumph over sin by the power of the Holy Spirit, which should be often, we are still unprofitable servants.

Why is this so? It is because our victories, even when we achieve them, are all nevertheless by the power and grace of God and are not of ourselves. If they were, we would be able to take some personal glory for our triumphs, and when we die we would bring our boasting into heaven. But our victories are not of ourselves. They are of God. And since they are not of ourselves, we will not boast either on earth or in heaven but will instead give God all the glory.

Consider that great scene in Revelation in which the elders who represent the saints lay their crowns before the throne of God, saying, "You are worthy, our Lord and God, to receive glory and honor and power..." (Rev. 4:11). Why do you suppose they do that? And what does the scene mean? Clearly, the fact that the crowns are the elders' crowns mean that they represent the elders' own victories over sin and God's enemies. But, by taking them off and laying them before the throne of God, the elders indicate that their victories were achieved, not by themselves, but by the power of the Spirit of God that worked within them. In other words, in the final analysis the triumphs are God's alone.

4. And yet, we are to go on fighting and struggling against sin, and we are to do so with the tools made available to us, chiefly prayer, Bible study, Christian fellowship, service to others, and the sacraments.

We are never to quit in this great battle against sin. We are to fight it with every ounce of energy in our bodies and with our final breath. Only then, when we have finished the race, having kept the course, may we rest from warfare. Isn't that what the Bible tells us everywhere?

Ephesians 6:10-12: "Finally, be strong in the Lord and in his mighty power. Put on the full armor of God so that you can take your stand against the devil's schemes. For our struggle is not against flesh and blood, but against the rulers, against the authorities, against the powers of this dark world and against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms."

Philippians 3:12-14: "... I press on to take hold of that for which Christ Jesus took hold of me. Brothers, I do not consider myself yet to have taken hold of it. But one thing I do: Forgetting what is behind and straining toward what is ahead, I press on toward the goal to win the prize for which God has called me heavenward in Christ Jesus."

Hebrews 12:1-4: "Therefore, since we are surrounded by such a great cloud of witnesses, let us throw off everything that hinders and the sin that so easily entangles, and let us run with perseverance the race marked out for us. Let us fix our eyes on Jesus, the author and perfecter of our faith, who for the joy set before him endured the cross, scorning its shame, and sat down at the right hand of the throne of God. Consider him who endured such opposition from sinful men, so that you will not grow weary and lose heart. In your struggle against sin, you have not yet resisted to the point of shedding your blood."

A Supernatural Gospel

I close this study by suggesting that a gospel in which we must do everything possible to attain a victory over sin—but in which, in spite of all we do or can ever do, the victory when it comes is by God alone and not by us or for our glory—a gospel like that must be from God; it could never have been invented by man. The very nature of our gospel is proof of its divine origin.

Left to ourselves, what do we do? We do one of two things. Either we create a gospel of works, so that our salvation depends upon our own righteousness and our sanctification likewise depends upon our own ability to defeat sin and choose righteousness. Or else we retreat into passivity and say, "Since the battle is God's and there is nothing I can do to achieve victory, I might as well just sit back and let God work." To our way of thinking it seems that it must be either of those two choices. But the Bible, through Paul, says something quite different: "Therefore, my dear friends, as you have always obeyed—not only in my presence, but now much more in my absence—continue to work out your salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God who works in you to will and to act according to his good purpose" (Phil. 2:12-13, emphasis added).

The Christian life is not easy. No responsible person ever said it was. It is a battle all the way.
But it is a battle that will be won. And when it is won, we who have triumphed will cast our crowns at the feet of the Lord Jesus Christ who worked in us to accomplish the victory, and we will praise him forever.

Chapter 93.
Victory! Through Jesus Christ Our Lord!

Romans 7:25

In the first chapter of 2 Corinthians the apostle is describing a time in his life with which you may be able to identify, particularly if you have been struggling against sin. Paul is not writing there of a struggle against sin—he is thinking of physical deprivation and danger—but he writes helpfully: "We do not want you to be uninformed, brothers, about the hardships we suffered in the province of Asia. We were under great pressure, far beyond our ability to endure, so that we despaired even of life" (v. 8).

You have probably felt like that when you have been struggling against some sin, almost in despair. In fact, I am sure you have, if you are really a Christian. The reason I say this is that, if our interpretation of Romans 7:14-25 is correct—if it is a description of the apostle Paul as a mature Christian and not as an unbeliever or a "carnal" Christian—then this almost-despairing struggle against sin is the experience of us all, at least at times. All Christians find themselves wanting to do what is right (because of the life of Christ within) but of not being able to do what they would like to do (because of the continuing presence of indwelling sin). In fact, it is even worse than that. For, as we mature in the Christian life, growing closer to Jesus Christ and thus wanting to be more like him and please him more, the struggle actually grows stronger rather than weaker. Those who struggle most vigorously against sin are not immature Christians but mature ones. The hardest battles are waged by God's saints.

In the midst of our struggles we are sometimes brought to the very edge of despair, to use Paul's word in 2 Corinthians. But if you are close to that point and are thinking negatively, as most of us do at times, I want to say this: Although the struggle is a real one and difficult, the outcome is not bleak or uncertain but glorious—because of God.

That is what Paul comes to at the very end of Romans 7. After he has reached the absolute low point, asking, "Who will rescue me from this body of death?" he answers with what Charles Hodge calls "a strong and sudden emotion of gratitude" : "Thanks be to God—through Jesus Christ our Lord!" (v. 25). That is, although the apostle was not able to find even the smallest ground for a hope of victory within himself, even at his weakest point the end is not grim because as a Christian he knows that God is for him. God has assured every believer victory through the work of Christ.

Interestingly enough, this is almost exactly what Paul says in 2 Corinthians where, as I said, he is speaking not of struggles against sin but of physical dangers and troubles. Immediately following his cry of despair ("in our hearts we felt the sentence of death"), he adds, "But this happened that we might not rely on ourselves but on God, who raises the dead. He has delivered us from such a deadly peril, and he will deliver us..." (vv. 9-10).

If you are struggling against sin—as I know you are, if you are a true Christian—that is what I want to leave with you as a result of this final study of Romans 7. The reason for your struggle is to teach you to rely not on yourself but on God, who raises the dead. And what I want you to be assured of is that he has already delivered you from "deadly peril," and that he will deliver you again.

Deliverance from Sin's Penalty

The deliverance from sin provided for us by God through Jesus Christ is in three stages, and the first is deliverance from sin's penalty, that is, from the judgment and wrath of God due us as the result of our being sinners. This is not the deliverance spoken of in Romans 7:25, but it is foundational, and Paul discussed it carefully in the opening chapters of the letter. It is upon this foundation that all further deliverance is built.

In a book of sermon illustrations H. A. Ironside tells of a young man who was the son of a friend of Czar Nicholas the First of Russia. He had been given the job of exchequer of a border fortress of the Russian Army, a responsible position in which he was to manage the czar's money and dispense wages to the troops. But the young man fell into gambling and began to cover his losses by borrowing little by little from the army treasury. One day he received notice that a government auditor was arriving to examine the books, so he sat down and added up what he had taken. It was a huge amount. He emptied out his own meager resources, subtracted that from what should have been in the government account and noted the great discrepancy. He then wrote under the amount due: "A great debt; who can pay?"

The young man knew it was impossible for him to make up the amount, and he did not know anyone who could be counted on to help him. So, rather than await arrest, trial, and disgrace, he drew his revolver and determined that he would kill himself upon the stroke of midnight. As he waited for the clock to strike, reflecting on how he had wasted his great opportunity, he became drowsy and drifted off to sleep.

It so happened that on that very night Czar Nicholas, dressed like a common soldier, entered the fortress to make an inspection of the battlements. According to regulations, every light should have been out. But when he passed the office of the exchequer, where the son of his friend was dozing, he noticed that the light was on and went in. There were the sleeping young man, the revolver, the open books, the total that was missing, and the cryptic note. It was all quite clear. The young officer had betrayed his trust. He had been stealing systematically for months.

At first the czar thought to awaken him and place him under arrest. But he felt sorry for the young man, and he remembered the father, his friend, and how brokenhearted he would be if his son were to be arrested. So, instead of proceeding harshly, he stooped over and wrote something below the young man's pathetic summation and went out.

The soldier slept for hours when suddenly, awakened by some noise, he sprang to his feet. It was long past midnight. He grabbed the revolver, pointed it to his head, and was about to pull the trigger when his eyes glanced down at the papers before him and he saw what had been written. Beneath his question, "A great debt; who can pay?" there was a single word: "Nicholas." Could it be? Had the czar been present? He sprang to some files where there were documents containing the czar's signature and made a careful comparison. The signature was authentic. "The czar has been here," he said to himself. "He has seen the papers; he knows what I have done; he knows my guilt, but he has undertaken to pay the debt himself." So instead of taking his life the young soldier waited for morning when, as he anticipated, a sack of gold coins arrived from Nicholas. The young man placed it in the safe, and when the inspector arrived for the audit the sack was found to contain exactly the amount needed.

If you are a Christian, that is how Jesus Christ has delivered you from the penalty of your sin.
You are guilty of transgressing the law of God and of trampling God's honor. You deserve to die. But Jesus has made payment for your transgressions. Only in your case the payment he made was not merely a sack of gold coins to balance out a finite monetary account but rather his very life, given in exchange for yours. Jesus died so that you might be delivered from sin's penalty.

Who can pay? Jesus! And he has!

Deliverance from Sin's Power

The second deliverance from sin provided for the believer by God through the work of Christ is from sin's power, that is, from constant defeat by sin in our struggles against it day by day. In my opinion, neither is this what Romans 7:25 is talking about primarily. The deliverance spoken of in our text is a future deliverance, not a present one. But present deliverance has bearing in this context, since Paul has been speaking of his present struggles against sin in chapter 7 and is going to talk about a present (as well as future) deliverance in chapter 8.

How does this present deliverance work out? To answer that, let me go back over some of the things we have already seen about the Christian life in Romans 5 through 7.

1. We are sinners and will continue to be sinners throughout our Christian lives. It follows from this that the Christian life will always be a struggle. That is not what we want to hear, of course. We want things to be easy. Nevertheless, if we study the Bible, we find that this is taught from beginning to end.

We find it by example, as when we think of an outstanding character like Job, who had God's own testimony that he was a righteous man. When Satan appeared before God, God called attention to Job, saying, "Have you considered my servant Job? There is no one on earth like him; he is blameless and upright, a man who fears God and shuns evil" (Job 1:8). Yet this is not what Job thought of himself. Job did not say, "Look at what a righteous man I am," even though he knew there could be no direct correspondence between his sins and the enormity of the tragedies he suffered. Instead, when he stood before God he said, "I am unworthy—how can I reply to you? I put my hand over my mouth.... My ears had heard of you but now my eyes have seen you. Therefore I despise myself and repent in dust and ashes" (Job 40:4; 42:5-6).

David is another example, and not just in the period following his sin with Bathsheba. In the psalms he speaks often of his sins.

Isaiah, too, is an example. Isaiah was the greatest of the prophets. Yet when he had his great vision of God, recorded in Isaiah 6, he said, "Woe to me! I am ruined! For I am a man of unclean lips, and I live among a people of unclean lips, and my eyes have seen the King, the LORD Almighty" (Isa. 6:5).

It is always that way. It is the Bible's exceptional people who are most conscious of their transgressions.

Again, we learn that the Christian life is a constant struggle against sin from the Bible's explicit teaching in Romans and elsewhere. In Romans Paul will say, "Therefore, I urge you, brothers, in view of God's mercy, to offer your bodies as living sacrifices, holy and pleasing to God—which is your spiritual act of worship. Do not conform any longer to the pattern of this world..." (Rom. 12:1-2), and "The night is nearly over; the day is almost here. So let us put aside the deeds of darkness and put on the armor of light" (Rom. 13:12).

Ephesians 6:13 says, "Therefore put on the full armor of God, so that when the day of evil comes, you may be able to stand your ground, and after you have done everything, to stand."

In 1 Corinthians 9:24-27 we read: "Do you not know that in a race all the runners run, but only one gets the prize? Run in such a way as to get the prize. Everyone who competes in the games goes into strict training. They do it to get a crown that will not last; but we do it to get a crown that will last forever. Therefore I do not run like a man running aimlessly; I do not fight like a man beating the air. No, I beat my body and make it my slave so that after I have preached to others, I myself will not be disqualified for the prize."

These verses teach that the Christian life will be a struggle to the end and that the reason for this is that we carry the very root of the problem, which is sin, within our hearts.

Philip Doddridge, the famous eighteenth-century, nonconformist minister, said as he was dying, "The best prayer I ever offered up in my life deserves damnation." And Augustus Toplady, the author of the hymn "Rock of Ages" who reported those words of Doddridge, said, "Oh that ever such a wretch as I should be tempted to think highly of himself." These are not the words of mentally unbalanced eccentrics but of mature believers infused with the same Holy Spirit who filled Paul.

2. In spite of our being sinners, Jesus died to save sinners, and this is what he is doing. The point I have just made—that we will have to struggle against sin throughout our lives—is something we learned largely from Romans 7. But here we go back a chapter, to Romans 6, to the teaching that when Jesus died we died in him and that when he rose from the dead we rose in him. In other words, as a result of Christ's work on our behalf we are not what we once were. We have died to the past. We have been given a new and happy future. Therefore there is no other direction for us to go in this life but forward. Do you remember how I put it when we were studying these themes in Romans 6? I said, "There is no going back. That possibility has been forever eliminated. There is no direction for us to go but forward."

Paul puts it like this, "In the same way, count yourselves dead to sin but alive to God in Christ Jesus. Therefore do not let sin reign in your mortal body so that you obey its evil desires. Do not offer the parts of your body to sin, as instruments of wickedness, but rather offer yourselves to God, as those who have been brought from death to life; and offer the parts of your body to him as instruments of righteousness. For sin shall not be your master, because you are not under law, but under grace" (Rom. 6:11-14).

It is because Jesus has saved us from sin's penalty and is saving us from sin's power that we struggle against it. Yet it is because he is saving us that we can be assured of final victory.

3. We have the assurance of victory, also expressed as the inevitable triumph of God's grace. The third element in our present deliverance from sin's power is what we were looking at in chapter 5, to go back still another chapter, and what we are coming to again in chapter 8. That leads to the last of the three stages of deliverance from sin provided for us by God through Jesus Christ.

Deliverance from Sin's Presence

When we were considering our deliverance from sin's penalty and our deliverance from sin's power, I said that Romans 7:25, our text here, is not really about either of those two deliverances, though, in the first case, deliverance from sin's penalty is foundational and, in the second case, there is a measure of overlapping. However, when we talk about deliverance from sin's presence, that is, about a future deliverance, we are right on.

We remember that the apostle has been describing his present struggle against sin, emphasizing that we can never hope to be entirely free from struggling against sin in this life. Moreover, he had come to the end of himself, so that he cried out, "What a wretched man I am! Who will rescue me from this body of death?" He then gives the answer, "Thanks be to God—through Jesus Christ our Lord!" The question—"Who will rescue me from this body of death?"—is in the future tense. Therefore, since the question is in the future tense, we must conclude that the answer should likewise be understood in the future tense, that is, not

"Thanks be to God, who has rescued me through Jesus Christ," but rather, "Thanks be to God who will rescue me through Jesus Christ."

In other words, the deliverance Paul is looking for here is specifically a final deliverance from the very presence of sin, which has its hold on him now only through "this body of death," or "this dying body." Paul's final deliverance was to be through death and resurrection.

Let me add, before trying to wrap this up, that only this interpretation makes sense of the final sentence of the chapter. In that sentence, after having spoken of the victory that is ours in Christ, Paul returns to what he had been saying earlier, concluding, "So then, I myself in my mind am a slave to God's law, but in the sinful nature a slave to the law of sin."

If the deliverance of the first part of verse 25 were in the past (or even in the present), it would be a strange regression to conclude the chapter with a reiteration of the struggle Paul is describing.
He should have gotten beyond that by the victory that is ours "though Jesus Christ our Lord." However, if the first part of that verse is referring to the future, as I have suggested, the summation makes sense. For Paul is saying that, although he is assured of a final victory over sin, he nevertheless knows that he must continue to fight a vigorous battle against sin daily until he dies.

He has been saved from sin. He is being saved from sin. He will yet be saved from sin. But until the day of final deliverance it is his continuing responsibility to fight on.

The Winning Side

I conclude by pointing out that, although much of what Paul has written in Romans 7 sounds discouraging, it is not really discouraging at all. In fact, by contrast, there is enormous ground for genuine encouragement in what he says.

First, we are encouraged because the outcome of the battle against sin is certain. Our wrap-up of these themes has taken us back from chapter 7 through chapter 6 to chapter 5. But when we reach chapter 5, we return to verses that speak of the triumph of God's grace: "The law was added so that the trespass might increase. But where sin increased, grace increased all the more, so that, just as sin reigned in death, so also grace might reign through righteousness to bring eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. 5:20-21).

"Through Jesus Christ our Lord." That is exactly the place to which we have come at the end of chapter 7, and the point is the same. Victory is ours. The triumph of grace is assured, regardless of how badly we may think we are doing now or how near despair we may be due to the intensity or duration of the struggle. It is the very knowledge of a final victory that will enable us to fight on.

When the armies of Oliver Cromwell were winning battle after battle in the English Civil War, it was said of them that they could not lose because they knew, even before they started to fight, that God had given them the victory. I do not know how true that was of Cromwell's army. There were Christians on both sides of that conflict, and Cromwell's cause was not entirely free of base motives. But whatever the case with Cromwell's soldiers in those very human battles, the principle does hold true for us, the soldiers of Jesus Christ who are engaged in fierce spiritual warfare against sin.

Apart from Jesus, not one of us can prevail for a moment. But united to him, we not only can prevail. We will. The Bible promises that "he who began a good work in [us] will carry it on to completion until the day of Christ" (Phil. 1:6).

And there is this, too: Although your struggles may be prolonged and difficult, they are not essentially different from those of the many believers who have preceded you, including Paul and the other great personalities of Scripture. They triumphed, and so will you. Remember the text: "No temptation has seized you except what is common to man. And God is faithful; he will not let you be tempted beyond what you can bear. But when you are tempted, he will also provide a way out so that you can stand up under it" (1 Cor. 10:13).

Part Nine. Life in the Spirit

Chapter 94.
The Greatest Chapter in the Bible

Romans 8:1-39

With the words above, Paul opens what I consider the greatest chapter in Scripture. It is precarious and probably a foolish act to call any one chapter of the Bible "the greatest," if for no other reason than one is likely to get caught in a contradiction. This happened to me as soon as I had announced this subject. A friend pointed out that in my first volume on The Minor Prophets (1983), I have already called the third chapter of Hosea "the greatest chapter in the Bible," and obviously Hosea 3 and Roman 8 cannot both have that identical distinction.

Besides, a person is likely to change his mind over time. What appears as the greatest portion of the Word of God one year may appear less important later, and another book or chapter may take its place. I remember that D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones said on one occasion that for a preacher the greatest book of the Bible should be the one he is expounding at that moment.

All that aside, there is a sense in which the eighth chapter of Romans truly is great, even superlatively great, and it would be wrong to begin our careful studies of this chapter without acknowledging that and then presenting a general outline. F. Godet, the Swiss commentator, called these thirty-nine verses great because they begin with "no condemnation" and end with "no separation," to which another writer, C. A. Fox, added that in between there is also "no defeat."

Charles G. Trumbull, editor of the now deceased Sunday School Times, picked up on those earlier observations when he wrote:

The eighth of Romans has become peculiarly precious to me, beginning with "no condemnation," ending with "no separation," and in between, "no defeat." This wondrous chapter sets forth the gospel and plan of salvation; the life of freedom and victory; the hopelessness of the natural man and the righteousness of the born again; the indwelling of Christ and the Holy Spirit; the resurrection of the body and blessed hope of Christ's return; the working together of all things for our good; every tense of the Christian life, past, present, and future; and the glorious, climactic song of triumph, no separation in time or eternity "from the love of God which is in Jesus Christ our Lord."

An old German commentator named Spener said that if the Bible was a ring and the Book of Romans its precious stone, chapter 8 would be "the sparkling point of the jewel." Many others have agreed.

How Many Sections?

It is not easy to outline Romans 8. The argument of the chapter is so carefully interwoven, with one thought following closely upon another, that dividing it into sections seems inevitably to be more or less "arbitrary," as Charles Hodge maintained. This probably explains the surprising variety of outlines scholars give. Hodge himself divided the chapter into six sections, as Leon Morris also does. Godet found four sections. D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones has seven (or eight) sections. John R. W. Stott has two main parts, the first divided into four subsections and the second into two, plus an opening, which he feels actually belongs with Romans 7, thus also making seven parts in all. The New International Version of the Bible has three sections and a total of nine paragraphs, which is a way of saying that the chapter could be treated in nine parts. Most commentators simply expound it as it comes.

Since we are going to be studying this chapter verse by verse, the way in which the verses are grouped is of little importance for us. Still, in order to give an overview of what the chapter is about, I want to suggest six divisions. These divisions follow Hodge and Lloyd-Jones most closely.

No Condemnation from the Law

We begin with verse 1. There is a sense in which this verse says everything the chapter really wishes to declare, for the sentence "therefore, there is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus" means that there is no condemnation now, nor will there ever be condemnation for those who are in Jesus. It is a statement of the believer's perfect and eternal security in Christ. But if that is so, then everything that follows in chapter 8 really follows. Above all, it follows that nothing "will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (v. 39).

Verse 1 is the theme of the chapter, and the words "therefore, there is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus" are the triumphant cry growing out of the book's first half.

But why is there "no condemnation"? The first answer is that "through Christ Jesus the law of the Spirit of life set me free from the law of sin and death" (v. 2).

Very few of us have a proper sense of what it is to be under the law's condemnation, but we can get a glimpse of what is involved through watching others' trials. One day Jim Bakker is riding high as leader of a national television ministry and extensive business empire. But the funding appeals are dishonest, gifts are wrongfully used, and suddenly Bakker is on trial for fraud and is declared "Guilty." The condemned man now faces a maximum of 120 years in prison and $5 million in fines.

One day Ivan Boesky is a wealthy New York stockbroker. But suddenly he is convicted of insider trading and is condemned by the courts.

For months we follow the story of southern California's "Night Stalker" with its horrifying revelation of murders, rapes, and burglaries. Then Richard Ramirez is identified as the killer, convicted of thirteen counts of murder and thirty felonies by a jury of his peers. And he is sentenced to death for his atrocities.

"Guilty" was our status, too, as Paul has explained in the opening chapters of Romans. We were condemned sinners, subject to the outpoured wrath of God. But suddenly Jesus entered this world and died for us, bearing the wrath of God in our place, and there is now "no condemnation." The law tried to save us but could not. We had broken the law. The law could only condemn. But what the law could not do, God did through Jesus. Instead of condemning us, God condemned sin so that "the righteous commandments of the law might be fully met in us, who do not live according to the sinful nature but according to the Spirit." This is the argument of verses 1-4.

Deliverance from Our Sinful Natures

But we have not only received deliverance from the law's condemnation as a result of God's saving favor to us through Jesus Christ. We have also been delivered from ourselves, that is, from our sinful natures. The first deliverance (vv. 1-4) is from sin's penalty. The second deliverance is from sin's power over us, which is what verses 5-14 describe.

In my judgment, these verses are the most important of the chapter if we consider them in terms of the weakness of the church of Jesus Christ today. They tell us that if we have been saved by Christ, then we have necessarily also been changed by him. In other words, not only have we who have believed on Jesus as Savior been justified, we have been regenerated as well.

Therefore, if we are not living a new life in the power of the indwelling Holy Spirit, it is not simply that we are unfulfilled or defeated Christians. We are not Christians at all! As we will explore later, it is only "those who are led by the Spirit of God" who are the "sons of God" (v. 14). Many who are not living by the Spirit need to awaken to the fact that they are not truly Christians.

The other side of the picture is that, if we are so living, we can know that this is the Spirit's work and that it is another evidence that we are no longer under condemnation but have been saved forever.

Sons (and Daughters) of God

The Holy Spirit does not only change us, giving us a new nature and thus delivering us from our sinful former selves. The Holy Spirit also gives us a new standing before God, which is what the next section of the chapter teaches (vv. 15-17). What a standing this is! Before, we were slaves, wicked and condemned slaves at that. Now we have become God's daughters and sons, by which we cry, "Abba, Father," and confidently present our deepest questions, sharpest hurts, and most pressing needs to him.

Hope of Future Glory

Being a child of God means that we are also heirs of God together with Jesus Christ, God's unique Son. All that he has we have, and all that he experienced we are also to experience in some measure. This includes his sufferings, as Paul has said: "Now if we are children, then we are heirs—heirs of God and co-heirs with Christ, if indeed we share in his sufferings in order that we may also share in his glory" (v. 17).

But this suggests a great comparison to Paul. Share in his sufferings? Yes. But also in his glory, and "our present sufferings are not worth comparing with the glory that will be revealed in us" (v. 18). In these verses (vv. 18-25) Paul lifts the matter of our redemption to a cosmic level, asserting that the restoration of fallen men and women through the work of Christ is only one part of what God is doing in salvation. God is redeeming nature, too, which means that he is saving creation from the decay it experienced as the result of Adam's fall in Eden.

What a tremendous revelation this is! D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones says:

The radical defect in so many of us is that we are so subjective and always thinking of our particular moods and states. The Apostle Paul reminds us that sin not only affects us and our fellow human beings, it has affected the whole creation—the animals, even inanimate nature, everything is affected. God's work, God's creation has been marred. Sin has come in, and evil has polluted it all. We are to look at salvation and ourselves as a part of the glorious scheme which is going to renovate the entire cosmos. And because God is going to do that to the whole cosmos he is going to do it to you!

This is yet another reason why there is "no condemnation" for those who are in Christ Jesus. By grace we have been caught up into this cosmic drama.

The Intercession of the Holy Spirit

The fifth reason that believers in Christ can be assured of their salvation and know that there can never be any "condemnation" is the intercession of the Holy Spirit: the third person of the Trinity interceding with the first person of the Trinity on our behalf (vv. 26-27). This does not mean that the Father needs to be persuaded to change his mind toward us, which some imagine either Jesus or the Holy Spirit doing. It means, as Paul points out, that the Holy Spirit interprets our prayers aright so that they are presented to the Father "in accordance with [his] will" (v. 27).

Have you ever tried to pray about something and been confused, not knowing exactly what you should pray for? I know I have. In fact, I find that as I grow older in the Christian life I am less and less certain of what I should pray for. When I was younger I had a more limited range of concerns and experience and saw only limited dimensions of a situation. Now I see more, and the situations in life for which I pray seem increasingly complex. In such situations it is good to know that, however I may pray, the Holy Spirit is constantly present to interpret my prayers correctly. I would not have it any other way. For whatever I may think I desire, in the final analysis it is not my will but the will of God that I want done.

The Purpose and Character of God

The final section of Romans 8, verses 28-39, is the greatest of all. Martyn Lloyd-Jones calls it an argument involving the very character of God. So, if salvation "fails with respect to any believer, the character of God has gone." Charles Hodge speaks of these verses as having two separate arguments: "the decree and purpose of God" (vv. 28-30) and "his infinite and unchanging love" (vv. 31-39).

Verses 29 and 30 contain what commentators have called a golden chain of five links, each of which points to something God has done for believers. They stress the sovereignty of God in salvation. The links in this golden chain of God's sovereign acts are: foreknowledge, predestination, effectual calling, justification, and glorification. Paul calls these acts God's fixed "purpose" for his people.

John R. W. Stott has a wonderful way of handling this last section, and I share it here even though we will come back to it much further on. He calls verses 28-39 "the invincible purpose of God" and divides the section into two parts, the first presenting "five undeniable affirmations" (vv. 28-30) and the second "five unanswerable questions" (vv. 31-39).

The "undeniable affirmations" are the unbreakable chain of five links, which I have already mentioned. Says Stott, "This working together for good, God's purpose in the salvation of sinners, is traced from its beginnings in his own mind to its culmination in the eternal glory." These verses comprise one of the grandest statements in the entire Word of God.

The unanswerable questions occur in verses 31-39:

1. "If God is for us, who can be against us?" (v. 31). Many are against us. Christians have many enemies. But the question is not "are they against us?" It is "can they be against us?" That is, can they prevail. The answer, if God is for us, is "Obviously not!"

2. "He who did not spare his own Son, but gave him up for us all—how will he not also, along with him, graciously give us all things?" (v. 32). Without the gift of Christ, we might wonder if God will give us all things. But since he has given us Jesus, what can he possibly be disposed to hold back? If he gave us the greatest of all gifts, he will certainly give all lesser ones.

3. "Who will bring any charge against those whom God has chosen?" (v. 33). Without the last word of that sentence, the earlier part would have some weight. Certainly there are many who could justly bring charges against us. Even our own consciences could do it. But not against those "whom God has chosen." Paul is speaking of people for whom Christ died, who have therefore been foreknown, predestined, called, justified, and glorified. No charges can stand against such people.

4. "Who is he that condemns?" (v. 34). No one, as long as Jesus has died and is even now in heaven making intercession for us.

5. "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?" (v. 35). In response to this last question Paul brings out all possible separators he can think of: trouble, hardship, persecution, famine, nakedness, danger, or the sword. He acknowledges the troubles Christians face: "For your sake we face death all day long; we are considered as sheep to be slaughtered,'" quoting from Psalm 44:22. He reviews the sources from which such trouble might be imagined to come: death and life, angels and demons, the present and the future, any powers whatever—height, depth, anything in the entire created order. But having reviewed it all and having placed it next to the eternal and invincible love of God, Paul concludes rightly that nothing will be able to separate us from that love in Christ Jesus our Lord (v. 39).

Disappointed with God?

Someone sent me a book by Philip Yancey, a free-lance author and editor-at-large for Christianity Today, titled Disappointment with God. It grew out of counseling sessions the author had with young Christians, all of whom were disappointed with God and whose complaints boiled down to three accusations: (1) God is not fair; (2) God is hidden; and (3) God is silent—he does not answer prayers.

I am sure these accusations are genuine, and I appreciate Yancey's answers. He replies that "fairness" would send each and every one of us to hell; that God has unveiled himself as fully as possible in the person of the historical Jesus Christ; and that it is out of his periods of silence that God draws forth the precious perfume of human faith.

Yet what stuck with me most about the book is its title: Disappointment with God. For I found myself reflecting, particularly since I was beginning at the same time to work through this great eighth chapter of Romans, how any Christian could possibly be disappointed with God.

Disappointment with God? When he sent Jesus Christ to die for us so that we might escape his just wrath and condemnation?

Disappointment with God? When he sent his Holy Spirit to free us from our own sinful and debilitating natures and join us to Christ?

Disappointment with God? When he has made us his very own daughters and sons, with all the privileges that come from it?

Disappointment with God? When he has drawn us into a great cosmic drama of redemption, in which even the heavens and earth have a part?

Disappointment with God? When the Spirit intercedes for us, conforming our ignorant and incomplete prayers to the good, pleasing, and acceptable will of God?

Disappointment with God? When he has set in motion an invincible chain of saving actions, beginning with his affectionate choice of us in eternity past, proceeding through his predestination of us to be saved from sin and conformed to the image of his own blessed Son, his effectual calling of us to faith in Jesus as the Savior, and justification, and ending with glorification in which all the blessed purposes of God toward us are fulfilled?

Disappointment with God? When he has fixed such a lasting love upon us that nothing in all creation can separate us from it?

Disappointment?

Brothers and sisters, whatever are we thinking of? Or is it that we are not thinking? Or thinking only of ourselves? Perhaps our disappointment (if we have it) means only that we are unhappy because God has not done exactly what we wanted him to do when we wanted him to do it, regardless of the fact that he has a much better plan for us and is actually working it out day by day, and will until the end of time.

The only sure cure for our unseemly disappointment is getting our eyes off ourselves entirely and onto God, who has done these great things for us. The best way I know to do this is by a study of Romans 8, which at least in this respect really is "the greatest chapter in the Bible."

Chapter 95.
No Condemnation

Romans 8:1-4

Having surveyed the entire eighth chapter of Romans in our last study, we return now to the beginning of the chapter, concentrating on verses 1-4. The first verse tells us, "Therefore, there is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus." This sentence is the theme of the chapter, as I said in the last study. Everything else flows from it. The rest of the chapter is basically an exposition of this one idea.

But verse 1 is not only the theme of Romans 8. It is the theme of the entire Word of God, which is only another way of saying that it is the gospel. Indeed, it is the gospel's very heart.

This means that it is what Paul has been explaining all along. In Romans 1 he spoke of the gospel, saying that he was not ashamed of it "because it is the power of God for the salvation of everyone who believes" (v. 16). He spoke of the gospel again in Romans 3, adding that "now a righteousness from God, apart from the law, has been made known..." (v. 21). It is the same in Romans 5: "Therefore, since we have been justified through faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ" (v. 1), and "Since we have been justified by his blood, how much more shall we be saved from God's wrath through him!" (v. 9). He ended that chapter by saying, "But where sin increased, grace increased all the more, so that, just as sin reigned in death, so also grace might reign through righteousness to bring eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord" (vv. 20-21).

These are only a few of the many statements of the gospel that have occurred thus far in Romans, and Romans 8:1 is but another. Always it is the gospel. Paul seems never to have grown tired talking about it.

Ah, but we do! Many of us find the gospel wearisome and grace boring.

Why is that, do you suppose? Why are we so different from Paul at this point? I think it is because of what Jesus alluded to in speaking of the woman who anointed his feet with her tears and then wiped them with her hair. She had a sinful past, and those who knew it objected, saying to themselves, like the Pharisee: "If this man were a prophet, he would know who is touching him and what kind of woman she it—hhat she is a sinner" (Luke 7:39). Jesus answered by telling of a man who had been forgiven a great debt and who therefore loved his benefactor greatly. Jesus' point was that "he who has been forgiven little loves little" (v. 47). Isn't that it? Isn't it true that the reason grace means little to most of us is that we do not consider ourselves to be great sinners, desperately in need of forgiveness?

Four Great Words

We cannot appreciate or even understand what Paul is saying unless we recognize that we are sinners and that we have been saved only by the grace of God. This is taught by the four great words in verse 1.

1. Condemnation. I spoke about condemnation in the last study, saying that we have a hard time appreciating what this means because few of us have ever been found guilty in a court of law. "Condemnation," as Leon Morris says, "is a forensic term which here includes both the sentence and the execution of the sentence." But no human being has ever pronounced a sentence of "guilty" against most of us, and we think therefore that we are all basically fine people. We are not, of course. This is what Romans 1:18-3:20 has been teaching.

2. Now. "Now" is a time word, pointing to the change that has come about as the result of believers' entering into the justification that Jesus Christ made possible by his death. We stood condemned by God and were due to suffer the penalty of an eternal death for our sins, the "wages of sin" being "death" (Rom. 6:23). But that has been changed now because of God's great grace and favor to us.

3. No. This word is weak in the English translations. In our texts it is a simple negative, like most other negatives. In the Greek text "no" is strongly emphasized. First, it is not the simple negative ou but the compound and therefore stronger negative oude. Second, it occurs at the beginning of the sentence, which intensifies the negation. Commentators do not know how to render this well in English, but they write things like: "Not any therefore now of condemnation" and "Not only is the Christian not in a state of condemnation now, he never can be; it is impossible." It is a very strong statement.

4. Therefore. The fourth great word in this sentence is "therefore." To what does it refer? To the arguments immediately preceding this verse in chapter 7? To chapter 5 or chapter 3? Most agree that Paul's "therefore" is inclusive, pointing back to the entire argument of the epistle thus far. It is because of God's work in Jesus Christ and because of the application of it to us by the Holy Spirit that there is now "no condemnation."

God's Work, Not Ours

Here is a point at which we need to make sure we really understand what is being said. I have pointed out that there is no condemnation for us because of what God has done. But do we really believe that? Or do we still think that somehow, in some way, we are contributing to our salvation?

What Paul writes is that "there is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus." That is, there are two classes of human beings: those who are in Christ fesus and who are therefore not under condemnation, and those who are not in Christ Jesus and who are therefore still under condemnation. What he is promising is for those in the first class only. But the question is: How do we get out of the one class and into the other. Is this something we do? Do we earn it? Do we attain it "by faith"? If you have understood what the apostle has been saying up to this point, you will know that it is none of the above. It is because of God's work in joining us to Christ. This is what the last half of Romans 5 and almost the whole of Romans 6 is about.

Here I must deal with a manuscript problem. Those who use the Authorized or King James text will notice the addition of the words "who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit" following the words "Christ Jesus" in verse 1. This is certainly an error, as even the famous Scofield Bible, which uses the King James text, acknowledges in a footnote. It is worth pointing this out because, if the clause is retained, it suggests exactly the opposite of what the text actually says.

In its corrupt form the text reads, "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit" (KJV), which seems to be saying that if we continue to lead a godly life "in the Spirit" we will not be condemned, but that if we fail to lead a godly life we will be.

How did such a serious textual error come about? We do not know exactly, but it is not hard to imagine how this might have happened. For centuries before the invention of the printing press just prior to the Reformation, Bible manuscripts were copied by hand, and from time to time the copyists made errors, as we would have done ourselves. In the vast majority of cases the copyists were accurate. That is why we have such accurate texts today. Even where there are errors, we can correct them by comparing the errant copy with the multiplicity of other more perfect manuscripts. Still, mistakes were made, and this seems to have been the case here.

We can imagine a weary monk working his way through the Book of Romans, perhaps early in the morning when he was still sleepy or else late at night. He has finished chapter 7 and begins chapter 8, writing,

"There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus...." But at this point he either dozes off or perhaps, weary with the arduous work of copying, looks ahead to the end of the book to see how much more there is to do (he is only halfway through!). When he returns to his work his eye falls not on verse 2, where he should pick up, but on the latter half of verse 4, where he copies "who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." This is a mistake, of course, a serious one, but it sounds right to him. It flows grammatically. So he continues by copying verse 2 and the verses after it.

Does this mean that we cannot trust the Bible? No! There are only a handful of such problems, and besides, they are well known to those who work with Bible texts. They have been corrected. Nevertheless, in this case the problem existed for quite a long time.

What I am saying is that these words do not belong. If they did, our escape from condemnation would last only as long as our next faltering step or sin; then we would be back under condemnation again. Thank God, salvation is not like that! Salvation is from God. It is by God. What the text says is that there is no condemnation for whose who have been joined to Jesus Christ by God the Father through the instrumentality of the Holy Spirit.

The Trinity at Work

Let me repeat that last statement: There is no condemnation for those who have been joined to Jesus Christ by God the Father through the instrumentality of the Holy Spirit. I repeat this because it is a Trinitarian statement—it speaks of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Spirit—and because it is precisely in these terms that Paul goes on to explain what God has done for us and why "there is now no condemnation."

Can you see it in the text? After his opening statement in verse 1, Paul has two explanatory sentences, each beginning with the identical Greek word gar, translated either "because" or "for."

The New International Version obscures this a bit, since it translates the Greek word as "because" at the beginning of verse 2 and as "for" at the beginning of verse 3, and because it divides the second of Paul's sentences (vv. 3-4) into two parts. But it is clear enough anyway. In verse 2 Paul says that there is no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus because "through Christ Jesus the law of the Spirit of life set me free from the law of sin and death." In verses 3 and 4 he says that there is no condemnation because "what the law was powerless to do in that it was weakened by the sinful nature, God did by sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful man to be a sin offering, [thus condemning] sin in sinful man, in order that the righteous requirements of the law might be fully met in us, who do not live according to the sinful nature but according to the Spirit."

When you put together those two parallel explanations of why there is now no condemnation, you see that each of the persons of the Godhead is involved.

1. God the Father. What has God the Father done for our salvation? The answer is in two parts. First, God sent Jesus in the likeness of sinful man to be a sin offering. Second, and by this means, God condemned sin in sinful man so that the righteous requirements of the law might be fully met in those who are joined to Christ.

Do you see now why I have called verse 1 not only the theme of Romans 8 but the very heart of the gospel? As Paul explains the basis of our deliverance, almost the entire gospel is presented in the next few verses. There is the doctrine of the incarnation, God's sending his Son Jesus to be like sinful man. The word likeness (v. 3) is important, of course, for it alerts us to the fact that although Jesus was a real man, which made him able to feel as we feel, endure temptation as we endure temptation, and eventually die, he nevertheless did not become like us in regard to our sinful nature. It is what the author of Hebrews means in noting that "we have one [high priest, that is, Jesus] who has been tempted in every way, just as we are—yet was without sin" (Heb. 4:15).

Paul's statement also contains the doctrine of the atonement. For his argument is that God sent his Son to be a sin offering. This picks up on all we learned about propitiation when we were studying Romans 3. God sent Jesus to die in our place and thus turn the divine wrath aside.

Finally, and by this means, "[God] condemned sin in sinful man, in order that the righteous requirements of the law might be fully met in us, who do not live according to the sinful nature but according to the Spirit." This refers to justification, God's work of condemning sin in Christ so that we might be able to stand before God in his perfect righteousness, and to the necessary work of sanctification that follows justification for all who have been saved. (We are going to look at the nature and necessity of sanctification carefully in the next study.)

2. God the Son. What has Jesus Christ done for our salvation? We have already touched on this by noting that he became like us in order to become a sin offering. In the context of what Paul worked out in Romans 3, this has two parts.

First, as a sin offering to God, Jesus made propitiation for our sins. When we were studying chapter 3, I pointed out that this is a term borrowed from the world of ancient religion. It refers to turning the wrath of God aside. Many in our time have judged this to be unworthy of the character of God and say such things as, "As if his wrath needs to be turned aside! God is not angry, he is love." But this can hardly stand in any honest study of Romans. What Paul has been saying from the beginning is that we are all under wrath because of our wickedness. The wrath of God is precisely our problem. It must be dealt with. How? We cannot turn it aside. All we do serves only to increase it, since we accumulate wrath against ourselves constantly by every thought we have and everything we do. Only God in the person of his Son can turn that wrath aside, and this he has done by Jesus' bearing it in our place. No one who fails to understand and believe this can be a Christian.

Second, Jesus did a work of redemption. Again, when we were studying chapter 3, I pointed out that redemption is a term borrowed from the ancient world of business, just as propitiation is borrowed from the ancient world of religion. It refers to buying something in the marketplace, and also to buying it out of the marketplace so it will not have to be sold there again. This means little if we think of it in regard to mere objects, but it means a great deal if we think of it in regard to people, especially slaves. To redeem a slave was to buy the slave out of the slave market so that he or she might be set free. This is what Jesus did for us. Paul touches on it in Romans 8 when he says that "through Christ Jesus the law of the Spirit of life set me free from the law of sin and death" (v. 2). He means that he was once a slave to sin and death. But Jesus freed him from that, as he has all who have been saved by him.

3. God the Holy Spirit. The third person of the Godhead is brought into the picture in verse 2 ("the law of the Spirit of life set me free from the law of sin and death") and in verse 4 ("who do not live according to the sinful nature, but according to the Spirit").

What has the Holy Spirit done for our salvation? He has joined us to Christ, so that we become beneficiaries of all Christ has done. When we were studying this doctrine in Romans 5, I pointed out two things. First, that it is terribly important and perhaps the most critical doctrine of salvation in Paul's writings. Paul used the phrases "in Christ," "in Christ Jesus," "in him," or their equivalents 164 times in his writings. We can hardly emphasize this enough.

Second, this union is hard to understand. We recognize that this was true for those living in Jesus' and Paul's day as well as for us, because instead of simply explaining the doctrine in abstract language, both Jesus and Paul used illustrations.

Jesus spoke of it as the relationship between a vine and its branches: "Remain in me, and I will remain in you. No branch can bear fruit of itself; it must remain in the vine. Neither can you bear fruit unless you remain in me.... Apart from me you can do nothing" (John 15:4-5). He also used the image of eating and drinking, which we adhere to literally every time we share in the Lord's Supper: "This is my body" and "This cup is the new covenant in my blood" (1 Cor. 11:24-25).

In his writings Paul illustrates the concept by three very powerful illustrations. The first is the union of the head and the body, in which he compares the members of the church to the various parts of Christ's body (cf. 1 Cor. 12:12-27; Eph. 1:22-23; Col. 1:18). The second is the union of the parts of a building, sometimes described as a temple that has the Lord Jesus Christ as its chief cornerstone (cf. 1 Cor. 3:9, 11-15; Eph. 2:20-22). The third and most powerful illustration is the union of a husband and wife in marriage. Paul ends his teaching about marriage by saying, "This is a profound mystery—but I am talking about Christ and the church" (Eph. 5:32).

By joining us to Christ, the Holy Spirit seals our salvation and makes possible the great declaration of this chapter: "Therefore, there is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus."

No, Nay, Never

I think of a popular Irish folksong called "The Wild Rover." Perhaps you know it. It tells of a young man's restless days and of his return home, ending with the chorus, "No, nay, never; no, nay, never, no more will I play the wild rover, no never, no more." It makes me ask, "Can there ever be a condemning judgment for those who are in Christ Jesus?" I answer, "No, nay, never— no more."

Do you remember Jesus' teaching about eternal security in John 10? He was speaking of how he and the Father hold us safely: "My sheep listen to my voice; I know them, and they follow me. I give them eternal life, and they shall never perish; no one can snatch them out of my hand. My Father, who has given them to me, is greater than all; no one can snatch them out of my Father's hand. I and the Father are one" (John 10:27-30).

When I was teaching John's Gospel I compared this to a carpenter who will sometimes join two boards by driving nails through them and then bending the protruding tip of the nails over sideways, embedding them in the wood, thus clinching the nail. I said that this is what Jesus does. His first nail is the doctrine of eternal life, a life that will never end. But lest we fail to appreciate that eternal life really is eternal life, he clinches it by the explanatory words "shall never perish." Then he drives the second nail, that we are secure in his hands. In case we fail to appreciate that, he clinches this nail, too, adding that the Father also has us in his hands, that no one can snatch us out of the Father's hands, and that he and the Father are one.

In the same way, Paul teaches that "there is now no condemnation"—(1) because of the Father's work; (2) because of the Son's work; and (3) because of the work of the Holy Spirit. Now it is "no, nay, never" for those who are in Jesus.

But do not presume on this security. This is a great doctrine for those who truly are in Christ, but it is only for those who are in him. Make sure you are. If you are not sure, give the matter no rest until the Holy Spirit himself plants upon your heart the assurance that you really are Christ's.

Chapter 96.
The Christian Doctrine of Holiness

Romans 8:3-4

Our study of Romans 8 has brought us to the third and fourth verses. But if we can set those aside for a moment, I want to begin by a story drawn not from the eighth chapter of Romans but from the eighth chapter of John.

Jesus had come from the Mount of Olives, where he had been praying, and was met in the temple courts by a gathering of Pharisees and teachers of the law who had devised a scheme to trap him. They had caught a poor woman in adultery, and now they were bringing her before Jesus with a question: "Teacher, this woman was caught in the act of adultery. In the Law Moses commanded us to stone such women.

Now what do you say?" (John 8:4-5). It was a disgusting situation. The law required that there be two or more eyewitnesses to a crime, to the very act, and if this requirement had been met, as the leaders seem to have been claiming, the witnesses would also have had to see the man who was involved. That they did not bring him before Jesus suggests that he may have been part of this plot and that it must have been a set-up, a trap. In other words, these leaders did not care either for the law or the woman but were only intent on trapping Jesus, whom they hated.

It was a clever trap, too. Jesus was known for being compassionate, so he would be expected to forgive the woman. But if he did that publicly, Jesus could be accused of violating or disregarding God's law. What kind of a prophet would do that? He would be discredited as a teacher sent from God. On the other hand, if he condemned the woman, the leaders would laugh him to scorn and mock his words. "Come to me, all you who are weary and burdened, and I will give you rest"? Oh, no! "... and I will kill you." They thought they had him in a box from which even God himself could not escape.

You know the story. Jesus fulfilled the law by demanding that all its requirements be met. Let those who witnessed the sin come forward and cast the first stones, as the law required. But let them be sure that they were not guilty themselves, which they would be, even of this crime, if they had been part of a plot to trap the woman. When the accusers failed to come forward, Jesus exercised the right to judge her not on the basis of the law, which she had indeed broken, but on the basis of his coming death for sinners—in exactly the way he saves us.

He asked the woman, "Where are they [the accusers]? Has no one condemned you?"

"No one, sir," she said.

He answered, "Then neither do I condemn you. Go now and leave your life of sin" (vv. 10-11). The King James Version says, "Sin no more."

No Condemnation

I tell that story because it is an exact illustration of what we find in the first four verses of Romans 8. The opening verse announces the great welcome news of freedom from condemnation for all who are in Christ Jesus. We have already studied this. It means that God has saved, and is saving, a great company of people by the work of Jesus Christ. We have the law. But, like the woman in John's Gospel, we are all unable to keep it. We are condemned by it. We cannot be set free from the law's condemnation by law, because the law is powerless. But what the law could not do, God did by sending his Son to be a sin offering. It is as if, in these verses, Jesus is saying to us, "Neither do I condemn you; go in peace."

But as we come to verses 3 and 4 we discover that it is not merely a question of our being delivered from the law's condemnation. Christ has delivered us from the law's power, too. He died to start the process of sanctification and not merely to provide propitiation from wrath, on the basis of which God has been able to justify believers from all sin. "And so he condemned sin in sinful man, in order that the righteous requirements of the law might be fully met in us, who do not live according to the sinful nature but according to the Spirit."

In other words, to go back to John 8, Jesus is saying, "You are free from all condemnation, but you must now leave your sin."

What this is teaching is that justification and sanctification always go together, so that you cannot have one without the other. Justification is not sanctification. We are not saved because of any good we may do. If that were the case, Jesus would have told the woman: "Leave your life of sin, and if you do that, neither will I condemn you." But Jesus did not say that. It was the other way around. No condemnation! But then a holy life! Nevertheless, just because justification is not sanctification and sanctification is not justification, we are not to think that sanctification is somehow unimportant. On the contrary, according to Romans 8:3-4, sanctification is the very end for which God saved us.

By sending his Son to be a sin offering, God "condemned sin in sinful man, in order that the righteous requirements of the law might be fully met in us, who do not live according to the sinful nature but according to the Spirit."

Let me back up and say this once again, though in different words.

1. Two works. In Romans 8:1-4 we have two great saving works of God. They are justification and sanctification. The first is deliverance from sin's penalty. The second is deliverance from sin's power. God accomplishes both for all Christians.

2. Three agents. In delivering us from sin's penalty and power, three divine agents are involved. God is the agent of our justification. It is he who pronounces us "not condemned." The Holy Spirit is the agent of our sanctification, since he accomplishes in us what the law was powerless to do. It is the remaining person of the Trinity, the Lord Jesus Christ, who makes both works possible by his death for sin. For Jesus not only bore God's just judgment upon sin for us in our place; he also broke its power over those who are joined to him by saving faith.

John R. W. Stott says of Romans 8, "In verses 1 and 2 the scope of salvation is stated: no condemnation, no bondage. In verses 3 and 4 the way of salvation is unfolded: we are told how God affects it."

3. One goal. All this is directed toward one goal, which is that "the righteous requirements of the law might be fully met in us, who do not live according to the sinful nature but according to the Spirit."

What Paul says here is the equivalent of what he says in his letter to the Ephesians, another great doctrinal book, where he teaches that God saved us apart from good works precisely so we might be able to do good works. The pertinent text says, "For it is by grace you have been saved, through faith—and this not from yourselves, it is the gift of God —not by works, so that no one can boast. For we are God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus to do good works, which God has prepared in advance for us to do" (Eph. 2:8-10, emphasis added).

Four Important Truths

Because I have called this chapter "The Christian Doctrine of Holiness," what I need to do now is develop or unfold that doctrine. There are four important truths about "holiness" that we must examine.

1. Holiness is justification's goal. We could also say, since Jesus died to save us from and not merely in our sins, that the purpose of Jesus' incarnation and death was that all who are saved by him might live holy lives. God's sending his Son "in the likeness of sinful man" refers to the incarnation. "To be a sin offering" refers to Christ's death. Therefore, the incarnation and death of Jesus were so that "the righteous requirements of the law might be fully met in" Christians. Stott says, "God condemned sin in Christ, so that holiness might appear in us."

We have the same idea in those important verses from Ephesians cited earlier, for there we are told that God has literally "ordained" or "appointed" us for good works. Ephesians is a great book about election, which is specifically taught in chapter 1. Then, in chapter 2, salvation is clearly said to be a result of God's choice and actions, rather than our own. So this is another case of God's appointing not only the ends but also the means to those ends. In this case, the end is good works. The means is our salvation by the work of Christ apart from human merit. In the language of Ephesians, God made us alive in Christ so that we might live for him. Or, as we can also say, he saved us by grace so that we might be gracious in how we treat other people.

2. Holiness consists in fulfilling the law's just demands. There are two errors to be avoided at this point. One is the error of the Pharisees. The Pharisees thought of themselves as being perfect fulfillers of the law. The law said tithe, so they tithed. They tithed not only their money but their goods, too, even down to the spices on their shelves. The law said keep the Sabbath, so they kept the > Sabbath. They would not lift a finger to do even the smallest thing that might be construed as work. Yet the Pharisees were not righteous. They were self-righteous. Many were filled with pride, even to the point of hating those who were not like themselves. Their worst hatred was for Jesus, because his righteousness exposed their sin. Some of the most critical things Jesus ever said were about these people and their hypocrisy (cf. Matt. 23).

The other error is the exact opposite. It is a characteristic error of our times, the error of hedonistic Antinomianism. This view says, "What really matters is not the law but what I feel in my heart. So even if the law of God says that something is wrong, as long as I feel it is all right, it must be right. Or at least it is right for me."

Have you ever heard anybody say that? I am sure you have. It is the response made to moral demands by thousands of our contemporaries, many of whom want to be considered Christians but who really are not. They show they are not by their tragic disregard of God's requirements.

What, then, does fulfilling the righteous requirements of the law mean? The answer is in the word the New International Version translates as "live according to" but which actually means "walk" (peripateō). This word portrays the Christian life as a path along which we walk, following Jesus Christ who goes before us. The path has a direction, and it has boundaries. The direction is the character of God, which is expressed in the law but which we see fully in Jesus. The boundaries are the requirements God's law imposes. We must not cross over these requirements. If we do, we are not on the path. We are not following after Christ. On the other hand, if we do follow, our eyes are not fixed on the law primarily—that was the error of the Pharisees—but on Jesus, whom we love and desire to serve by our obedience.

Can Christians sin? Of course, they can—and do. We all do. But there is all the difference in the world between stumbling on the path, getting up and then going on, and not being on the path of discipleship at all.

Those who are on the path may fall, but they are following after Jesus Christ and are never fully content unless they follow him.

3. Holiness is the work of the Holy Spirit. This is what we were studying at great length in Romans 7. Paul made two important points in that chapter. First, before his conversion he could not keep the law. He wanted to keep it, and at times he thought he had. But he actually could not. He was an impotent sinner. Second, even after his conversion he found that he was unable to keep the law of God by himself. He describes his struggle in this area toward the end of the chapter, showing that what he wanted to do he could not do, and that what he did not want to do he did. Paul discovered that it is only by the presence and power of the Holy Spirit that he or anybody else could or can be holy.

This suggests two obvious conclusions. First, if we cannot live a holy life apart from the Holy Spirit and yet must do so, then we must keep close to God in Bible study, where God speaks to us, and in prayer, in which we speak to God. We must seek the Spirit's blessing.

Second, we must work at this relationship. We must remember that in Romans 6 Paul developed the key to holiness by saying that we are to understand what God has done for us in Christ and then base our entire lives on it, conforming our conduct to what we know to be true. He said, "... count yourselves dead to sin but alive to God in Christ Jesus. Therefore do not let sin reign in your mortal body so that you obey its evil desires. Do not offer the parts of your body to sin, as instruments of wickedness, but rather offer yourselves to God, as those who have been brought from death to life; and offer the parts of your body to him as instruments of righteousness" (Rom. 6:11-13).

Paul does not mention the Holy Spirit in Romans 6, but, as we now learn in chapter 8, it is only by the power of the indwelling Spirit of God that we can do this.

4. Holiness is mandatory. Once I was asked to do a series of messages on Christian discipleship, and the first question I dealt > with was this: "Is discipleship necessary?" I began by explaining the way the question needs to be interpreted. It should not mean, "Is discipleship necessary if we are to be obedient to Jesus?" That is obvious. Nor should it mean, "Is discipleship necessary in order to live a full and happy Christian life?" That should be obvious, too. What the question should mean (and the sense in which I treated it) is, "Is discipleship necessary for one to be a true Christian? Can you be a saved person without it?" The answer I gave, the answer that should be given by any true Bible expositor, is, "Yes, it is necessary! It is mandatory to follow after Christ to be a Christian."

We need to speak in exactly the same way about holiness. When we say that holiness is mandatory, we do not mean that it is merely good to be holy, and we certainly do not mean that we can be perfect or ever reach a point where we will no longer be in danger of sinning. We mean that we must be on the right path. We must actually be walking according to the Spirit of God, if we are Christians.

Unholy People and Churches

What does that say about us? What does it say about the state of Christianity in the United States today? If holiness is necessary, as we have seen it is, how do we account for the unholy state of so many alleged Christian people and their churches?

George Gallup, the founder and president of the American Institute of Public Opinion, asked this question several years ago and set out to find an answer. He had been struck by the fact that nearly half of all Americans can be found in a place of worship on a given Sunday and that high percentages have high levels of conservative religious belief. He found that:

Eighty-one percent of Americans claim to be "religious," which places them second only to Italians, whose rating is eighty-three percent.

Ninety-five percent believe in God.

Seventy-one percent believe in life after death.

Eighty-four percent believe in heaven.

Sixty-seven percent believe in hell.

Large majorities say they believe in the Ten Commandments.

Nearly every home has at least one Bible.

Half of all Americans can be found in church on an average Sunday morning. Only eight percent say they have no religious affiliation whatever.

Most say that religion plays an important role in their lives. One-fourth claim to lead a "very Christian life."

But although ninety-five percent say they believe in God and four out of five say they are religious, only one in five says that religion is the most influential factor in his or her life. Most want some kind of religious instruction for their children, but religious faith ranks far below many other traits parents would like to see developed in their offspring. Only one in eight says he or she would consider sacrificing everything for God or their religious beliefs. Gallup records "a glaring lack of knowledge of the Ten Commandments," even by those who say they believe in them. He observes "a high level of credulity,... a lack of spiritual discipline," and a strong "antiintellectual strain" in the religious life of most Americans.

Gallup investigated this anomaly and found that those large numbers of people who claim to be religious—fifty to sixty million claim to be "born again"—are actually a terrible distortion. Those for whom religion actually makes a difference are about one in eight, or twelve-and-a-half percent. But, and this is the striking thing, when he studied the life of these people, Gallup learned that they were much happier, had more stable families (there were noticeably fewer divorces), were less prejudiced, and were involved regularly, mostly on a weekly basis, in some kind of service work for other people. And this was all by substantial percentage margins.

What does this suggest? It suggests that many who consider themselves Christians, even in socalled evangelical churches, are not Christians. They may profess the right things. They may lead seemingly acceptable lives, if we don't scratch too far below the surface. But they are not on the path. They are not following hard after holiness. They are not born again.

Isn't it time we had a true revival of religion in our churches? If you have studied the revivals of the past, you know that they have had three characteristic stages. The first stage is an awakening. By that I mean an awakening on the part of alleged Christians to the fact that they are not really Christians. This is why the great eighteenth-century American revivals under the preaching of Jonathan Edwards, William and Gilbert Tennent, and George Whitefield were called the Great Awakening. What impressed those who lived through such times was how the Spirit of God worked first to awaken many professed but counterfeit followers of Jesus Christ to their true condition.

The second stage was the revival itself, which meant the coming to spiritual life of these former mere professors. In England the corresponding movement was referred to as the Wesleyan Revivals.

Finally, there was an impact on society in which many people outside the church pressed into it to find out what was happening and were converted also.

We need such a revival in our time. And what we need to see, as a first stage of this revival, is the awakening of many so-called evangelicals to the fact that they have been Christians in name only, which is proved by their lack of concern for Christian doctrine and their lack of holiness. They must awaken to their condition.

Assurance? It is the theme of Romans 8 and a great doctrine for those who are truly saved. But it is deadly presumption if we are not growing in holiness by following after and obeying Jesus Christ.

Chapter 97.
The Carnal Man and the True Christian

Romans 8:5-8

In my first study of Romans 8, in which I surveyed the entire chapter, I said that in my opinion verses 5-14 are the most important of all if we consider them from the perspective of the weakness and need of the church of Jesus Christ at the present time. This is because they correct a mistaken but very popular understanding of what it means to be a Christian. This mistaken view, as we have already seen, divides people into three classes: (1) those who are not Christians, (2) those who are Christians, and (3) those who are Christians but who are living in an "unsaved" manner. The latter are often called "carnal Christians."

Not long ago I received a book written by two of my friends that (rather uncritically, I think) assumed this mistaken notion. It was a book for laymen and was intended to help them mature as Christians so they could function as leaders in the local church. It encouraged them to move beyond being mere "Christians" to being "disciples" of Jesus Christ. At one point it said, "All followers of [Christ] are his sheep, but not all sheep are his disciples."

I have respect for my friends and applaud their intentions in this book. They are right in wanting laymen to assume their proper role in the church's life. But the problem lies in their procedure. They have adopted the three-category view, and this, I am convinced, inevitably leads the reader to think that—although it may be wise and perhaps even beneficial to become serious about the Christian life—becoming a "disciple" of Jesus Christ is, in the final analysis, merely optional. This conclusion is fatal, because it encourages us to suppose that we can be careless about our Christianity, doing little and achieving nothing, and yet go to heaven securely when we die.

I suppose it is this that has bothered me the most, the idea that one can live as the world lives and still go to heaven. If it is true, it is comfortable teaching. We are to have the best of both worlds, sin here and heaven, too. But if it is not true, those who teach it are encouraging people to believe that all is well with them when they are, in fact, not even saved. They are crying, "Peace!" when there is no peace. They are doing damage to their souls.

Two Classes of People

We come to this problem in the paragraph of Romans 8 that begins with verse 5, because in these verses, for the first time in the letter, the apostle gives a careful definition of the "carnal" person. The idea occurs five times in verses 5-8 ("sinful nature" in NIV). It has already occurred three times in verses 3-4.

"Carnal" is a rather straightforward translation of the Greek word sarx, which means "flesh." But sarx is one of those words that has several natural meanings. Basically, it refers to the fleshly parts of the body, which is why "carnal" (from the Latin word caro, meaning "meat") is used to translate it. But the meaning quickly goes beyond this in Bible passages to refer to certain aspects of what it means to be a human being. One thing it means is to be weak. This is a characteristic Old Testament usage, as in the words, "All flesh is grass" (KJV; NIV has "All men are like grass," to convey the real meaning). To be "fleshly" also means to be human rather than divine. This is because "God is spirit" (John 4:24), and we are mere flesh. A third thing "flesh" means is to be sinful. This is the most important meaning of sarx in the New Testament. It is why, in Romans 8, for instance, the word is translated by the New International Version as "sinful nature." It means to be a merely sinful man, that is, man apart from the regenerating and transforming work of the Holy Spirit of God in salvation.

This is what we have to keep in mind as we study Romans 8. For what Paul is talking about here is the difference between those who are Christians and those who are not. That is, he is speaking of two kinds of people only, not three. Specifically, he is not speaking of how a "carnal Christian" is supposed to move beyond a rather low state of commitment in order to become a more serious disciple of the Lord.

The Carnal or Unsaved Person

What is it that most characterizes an unsaved person? These verses define the unbeliever in four important ways: (1) in regard to his thinking, (2) in regard to his state, (3) in regard to his religion, and (4) in regard to his present condition.

1. His thinking. The first verse of this paragraph concerns the unbeliever's thinking, telling us that "those who live according to the sinful nature have their minds set on what that nature desires" (v. 5). Here is a case in which the New International Version rendering of sarx by "sinful nature" has both a bad and a good side.

The bad side is this: When we hear the words flesh or carnal, most of us naturally think of what we term "fleshly sins," things like sexual promiscuity, drunkenness, a preoccupation with money perhaps, materialism, desire for praise from other human beings, pride, and other such vices. The term does include such things, and they are much of what the world sets its mind on. To replace "flesh" by "sinful nature" causes most of us to overlook these very things. We can forget that if our minds are set on these rather than on spiritual things, we are not Christians.

But the translation of sarx as "sinful nature" has a good side, too, because it frees us from thinking only of what we call fleshly sins. The word includes those sins, as I said, but it also includes many things that we do not associate with being fleshly. Take a very moral person, for example. He or she does not indulge in debauchery. Does this mean that such a person is therefore thinking spiritually rather than according to the sinful nature? Not at all. In an unsaved state, the cultured, well-spoken moral person is as devoid of the Spirit of God, and is therefore as lost, as any other.

Paul himself was once an example. Recall how he summarized his early life in the great testimony passage from Philippians. He said that before he met Jesus on the road to Damascus, he believed that he was right before God. He describes himself as being: "circumcised on the eighth day, of the people of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew of Hebrews; in regard to the law, a Pharisee; as for zeal, persecuting the church; as for legalistic righteousness, faultless" (Phil. 3:5-6). This is a portrait of a moral man. But it is no less a portrait of one whose mind was set on what his sinful self desired. What did Paul desire? He desired to prove himself to God, to prove that he was worthy of God's favor, to show that he could earn heaven. Nothing is so characteristic of the thinking of the unbeliever as this delusion.

2. His state. The next verse of this paragraph describes the state of the unbeliever. It is "death" (v. 6). Paul is not speaking of physical death, of course. He is speaking of spiritual death, and what he means is that the unsaved person is as unresponsive to the things of God as a corpse.

The Bible tells us that the power, wisdom, and glory of God are clearly revealed in nature: "The heavens declare the glory of God; the skies proclaim the work of his hands" (Ps. 19:1). The unsaved person does not see this. He may use the word God at times, but the word does not really mean anything to this person. He would far rather believe that the universe came into being by evolution or chance or in any other way rather than being created by a God who demands a proper respect and right moral conduct from those he has created.

The unbeliever's condition is even worse when it comes to the truths of the Bible. Either he cannot understand them at all or else they seem utterly foolish to him. Why? It is because it takes the Holy Spirit to provide such understanding. The Bible says, "The man without the Spirit does not accept the things that come from the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him, and he cannot understand them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2:14).

D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones relates a classic case of this lack of spiritual understanding in an incident from the lives of William Wilberforce, the man who led the movement to abolish slavery throughout the British Empire, and William Pitt the Younger, who at one time was prime minister of England. Wilberforce was a Christian. Pitt was only a formal Christian, like so many others of that day. However, these two parliamentarians were friends, and Wilberforce was concerned for his friend's salvation. In those days there was a great preacher in London whose name was Richard Cecil. Wilberforce thrilled to his ministry and was constantly trying to get his friend Pitt to go with him to hear Cecil. Pitt kept putting Wilberforce off, but at last after many invitations Pitt agreed to go. Cecil was at his best, preaching in his most spirited manner. Wilberforce was ecstatic. He couldn't imagine anything more enjoyable or wonderful. He was delighted that Pitt was with him. But as they were leaving the service afterward, Pitt turned to his friend and said, "You know, Wilberforce, I have not the slightest idea what that man has been talking about." Clearly, Pitt was as deaf to God as if he were a physically dead man.

3. His religion. At first glance it might seem strange to speak of the "religion" of those who operate according to the sinful nature, since we have just shown that they are unresponsive to God. But strange as it may seem, the unsaved do have a religion. The third verse of the paragraph speaks about this. It tells us that "the sinful mind is hostile to God. It does not submit to God's law, nor can it do so" (v. 7).

Not long ago I was reading an article in which the writer was speculating on the nature of things to come and in one place talked about religion. He used a phrase that struck me. He said that in the future we are likely to see a growth of "a la carte religion," meaning that people will choose the items they like from a potpourri of religions and then combine them to make their own comfortable little religious systems. I liked that description, because it struck me as something I had already observed. I had noticed that in our largely irrational age it is a common thing for people to hold many mutually inconsistent ideas, the only force holding them together being their own individual attractions to them. But, as I have thought about it, it seems to me that this is what all religions already are in one sense. They are collections of human thoughts held for no other reason than that they are comfortable. They are comfortable because what they actually do is to protect their adherents from the only truly valid claims of God.

This is why Paul says that people in their unsaved state are hostile to God and why they do not submit to his law. The two go together. They do not submit to God's law because they are hostile to him, and because they are hostile to God they inevitably try to construct a religion that will protect themselves from him.

4. His present condition. The last thing Paul says of the unsaved, or "fleshly," individual is that a person like this "cannot please God" (v. 8). How could he, if he is hostile to God and is doing everything humanly possible to resist and trample down his just law? Pleased with the wicked? Of course not. God is displeased with unbelievers constantly.

Characteristics of the Christian

The apostle is not writing only of unbelievers in these verses, however. He is also writing of Christians, contrasting them with unbelievers. He lists two of the Christian's contrasting characteristics specifically.

1. The Christian's thinking. In verse 5 the apostle contrasts the unbeliever and the Christian in terms of their thinking, saying that the unbeliever has his mind set on what the sinful nature desires but that the Christian has his mind "set on what the Spirit desires." This is a profound way of speaking, for it eliminates many misconceptions of what it means to be a Christian while it establishes the truly essential thing.

First, it eliminates the idea that the Christian is someone who is merely very "religious." To be religious and to be mindful of the things of the Spirit are two entirely different things. The Pharisees were religious, excessively so, but they killed Jesus. Before he was saved, Paul was religious, but he expressed his religion by trying to do away with Christians. Ironically, one function of religion is to try to eliminate God, as we have seen.

Paul's way of speaking also eliminates the idea that a Christian is anyone who merely holds to right theological beliefs. Much popular Christianity makes this destructive error, suggesting that as long as you simply confess that you are a sinner and believe that Jesus is your Savior and "receive him," whatever that means, you are right with God and will certainly go to heaven. Do not get me wrong here. I know that there are degrees of understanding on the part of Christians and that many true Christians are yet babes in Christ, perhaps because they have never been given adequate teaching. Many might be unable to describe their faith in any terms more adequate than those I have just given. I do not want to deny that they are Christians. But what I do want to say is that it is possible to confess those things and still not be a Christian, simply because being a Christian is more than giving mere verbal assent to certain doctrines. It is to be born again. And since being born again is the work of God's Spirit, it is right to insist that those who are truly born again will have their minds set on what God desires.

Finally, Paul's way of speaking eliminates the idea that a Christian is someone who has attained a certain standard of approved conduct.

What, then, does being a Christian mean? It means exacdy what Paul says. The Christian is someone who has been born again by the work of the Holy Spirit and who now, as a result of that internal transformation, has his mind set on what the Spirit of God desires. If we are Christians, it does not mean that we have attained to this standard, at least not fully. But it does mean that we want to. Do you remember the illustration of the path? Being on the path does not mean that we have arrived at our destination. If it did, we would already be completely like Jesus. But it does mean that we are moving along this path, that we are following Jesus, who is going before us, that we are trying to be like him.

Having our minds set on what the Spirit desires takes us back to verse 4, in which the purpose of God in saving us is spelled out as our fully meeting the just requirements of the law. That is what the Spirit desires, and if we are Christians, our minds will be fixed on doing exactly that.

2. The Christian's state. The second specific characteristic of the Christian is his state, described as "life and peace" (v. 6). It is the opposite of "death," which describes the non-Christian. The Christian is a person who has been made alive by God's Spirit. Spiritual matters make sense to him now. Before, he was dead in his sins; now he is alive to a whole new world of reality. And he is at peace—peace with himself, as he never was before, in spite of many heroic efforts to convince himself that he was. Above all, he is at peace with God.

The word peace, as Martyn Lloyd-Jones points out, corresponds to the points of verse 7 step by step. "The natural man, the carnal mind, is 'enmity against God, is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be.' But of the Christian, you say at once: 'He can be subject to it, he is subject to it, he desires to be subject to it, and he goes out of his way to subject himself to it.' He 'hungers and thirsts after righteousness,' he desires to keep the commands which God has given."

Signs of the New Life

I come to the end of this study, to the application, and it is very, very simple. Everything I have said is directed to one end only, and that is to have you look into your heart and take stock of whether or not you are a true Christian. I do not mean whether or not you are an exemplary Christian or a well-instructed Christian, certainly not a perfect Christian (no creature like that exists), but whether or not you are truly born again. Has the Holy Spirit of God made you alive in Jesus Christ so that your thinking, state, religion, and present condition have been changed?

More than two hundred years ago, when preaching in this country was vastly superior to what it generally is today, Jonathan Edwards wrote "A Treatise Concerning Religious Affections" in which he examined the "signs" of God's gracious work in a person and attempted to distinguish between signs that are true and certain and signs that are not. His subheads in the first part of the essay read:

> Great effects on the body are no sign.
> Fluency and fervor are no sign.
> That they are excited by us is no sign.
> That they come with texts of Scripture is no sign.
> Religious affections of many kinds are no sign.
> Joys following in a certain order are no sign.
> Much time and zeal in duty are no sign.
> Much expression of praise is no sign.
> Great confidence is no certain sign. Affecting relations are no sign.

Edwards was convinced, no doubt rightly, that none of these things, as powerful or moving as they may sometimes be, in itself proves that the person is being acted upon by God, rather than by the mere emotion of the moment, or that the individual is saved.

What is a sure sign, then? The answer boils down to whether the person has his or her mind set on the things of the Spirit of God and whether this is moving, as it must, in the direction of a true righteousness.

Are you born again? Do you have a new nature? Have you passed out of death into life, from being dominated by the sinful nature to being controlled by the Spirit of God? If you do not know the answer to that question, do not let the matter rest until you know that you really are in Christ. Nothing in all life comes close to that matter in importance. Pursue it with all your strength. And if by the grace of God—perhaps through the application of his Word to your heart through this study—you realize that you are not yet a new creature in Christ, call out for salvation. Trust that, as God has been gracious in opening your eyes to your true condition, he will also work in grace to bring you out of death into the utter newness of the Christian life.

Chapter 98.
Who Is a Christian?

Romans 8:9-11

A few years ago, at one of the early Philadelphia Conferences on Reformed Theology, John Gerstner was speaking on the parable of the five wise and five foolish virgins from Matthew 25. He was arguing that, although each of these women seemed to be what we would today call believers, only five were actually taken to be with the bridegroom when he came, which means that only five were saved. He pointed out that: (1) all had been invited to the wedding banquet;
(2) all belonged to what we would call the visible church; (3) all professed to have the bridegroom as their Lord; (4) all believed in the Lord's "second coming"; (5) all were waiting for Jesus; and (6) all even fell asleep while waiting. Nevertheless, five were not accepted. And when they cried to Jesus, "Lord, Lord, open the door for us," he replied, "I do not know you" (see Matt. 25:11-12).

The point of Gerstner's message was that professing Christians should examine themselves to see if they really are Christians, knowing that a mere profession of faith is not enough. The study was so powerful that a number of people told me afterward that they did indeed begin to wonder whether they had truly been born again.

Self-Examination and Assurance

Perhaps you began to wonder about your own state at the end of the previous study. There I was trying to show that (according to Romans) there are not three categories of people in this life— those who are Christians, those who are not Christians, and those who are Christians but live as if they were not—but rather only two types—those who are dead in their sins and are therefore as unresponsive to God as dead people, and those who have been made spiritually alive by the Holy Spirit and are therefore following Jesus Christ in true discipleship. I acknowledged that Christians do sin, sometimes very badly. But a person who is on the path of discipleship gets up again and goes forward with Christ, while the unbeliever does not. In fact, the unbeliever is not on the path of true discipleship at all.

If teaching like this shakes you a bit, it is probably good for you to be shaken—particularly if you have been taking sin lightly. The Bible says that we are to examine ourselves to make sure of our calling (2 Peter 1:10). We should not be at ease in this matter. We should not rest until we are sure that we really do rest in Christ Jesus.

Yet we are studying Romans 8, and if you remember my introductory study, you will recall that the chapter's purpose is not to instill doubt in believers but rather the exact opposite. It is to give them assurance. Romans 8 teaches that if you are truly in Christ, nothing in all creation will be able to separate you from God's love (v. 39). I suppose that is why, having called us to examine ourselves by sharply contrasting those who live according to the sinful nature and those who live according to the Spirit (vv. 5-8), Paul continues by showing, in a most encouraging manner, who a Christian really is (vv. 9-11).

His outline is simple. He talks about the Christian's past, present, and future. The past is discussed in verse 9. The present is discussed in verse 10. The future is discussed in verse 11.

The Christian's Past

Verse 9 discusses the Christian's past. It is important, because it makes clearer than any other verse in this chapter the very point I have been making: that the description of those who are not controlled by the sinful nature but who live in accordance with the Holy Spirit applies to all Christians, not just to so-called spiritual ones. In other words, there is no ground for the doctrine of the "carnal Christian" here. Notice the apostle's ruthless logic: (1) if you do not have the Spirit of Christ, you do not belong to Christ; (2) if you belong to Christ, you have the Spirit of Christ; and (3) if you have the Spirit of Christ, you will not be controlled by the sinful nature but by the Spirit. In other words, if you belong to Jesus, you will live like it. If you do not live like it, you do not belong to him, regardless of your outward profession.

But this is meant to be encouraging, as I said, which is why Paul begins the first sentence as he does. He is writing to the believers in Rome and says to these believers, "You, however, are controlled not by the sinful nature but by the Spirit." That is, he is assuming that these professed Christians really are Christ's, and he is trying to explain the difference their new identification with Jesus has made and will make in the future.

What difference has it made? Well, when we look to the past, which is what the apostle does first, we see that as Christians we have been lifted out of our former sinful or fleshly state and into the realm of the Spirit. We are now "in the Spirit," and, as Paul also says here, the Spirit is "in" us.

This is an absolutely critical thing, for it means that being a Christian is not merely a matter of adopting a particular set of intellectual or theological beliefs, however true they may be. It involves a change of state, which is accomplished, not by us, but by God who saves us. D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones says, "It is not that a man just changes his beliefs and no more. No, he was in the realm of the flesh, and he is now in the realm of the Spirit. He was dominated by the flesh before, and governed by it.... He is now in a realm which is governed and controlled and dominated by the Spirit." You and I cannot make this change ourselves. It is something God does.

Paul said the same thing in Romans 5, where he wrote that the Christian is no longer under the reign of sin unto death but instead has come under the reign of God's grace in Christ. The fact that it is "of grace" shows that God has done it.

This change also means that being a Christian is not a matter merely of living in a Christian manner either, important as that also is. If you are a Christian, you will live like one. That is what we have been seeing throughout our studies of Romans 5-8 and were discussing in the previous study especially. But living like a Christian, at least in an external, observable sense, does not in itself mean you are one. Many unbelievers live outwardly moral lives.

A Christian is someone who has been delivered from one realm, the realm of sin and death, and has been transferred to the realm of God's Spirit, which is life. This, of course, is something God has himself done, and it means that "salvation is of the Lord" and that it is all of grace. It is because of this—because salvation is of God and not of ourselves—that it is possible to speak of the Christian's eternal security, as Paul does. The only reason we can be assured of our salvation is because salvation is a work of God, whose ways are always perfect, whose promises are never broken, and who does not change his mind.

The Christian's Present

Verse 10 describes the Christian's present state, saying that "if Christ is in you, your body is dead because of sin, yet your spirit is alive because of righteousness." In some versions of the Bible the word spirit in this verse is printed with a capital 5, as if referring to the Holy Spirit, but this is certainly an error. The verse is referring to our spirit and should be printed with a lowercase s, as in the New International Version. It is a reference to our being born again.

The difficulty of this verse is with the clause "your body is dead because of sin." What does this mean? "Body" (Greek, soma) clearly refers to our literal human bodies, not to some "mortal principle" within us. But in what sense is this body dead, since our mortal bodies are in this life clearly alive? Some have taken "your body is dead" to teach that the tendency of the body to draw us into sin has been completely destroyed or overcome. I discussed this several times in my treatment of Romans 6 and 7, where Paul does speak of having died to the past and of having been made alive to God. But the difficulty with this view is that in the earlier chapters it is the "self who has died, that is, the old self. And when Paul speaks of the body, as he does in Romans 6:11-14, his point is not that the body is dead but, on the contrary, that it is the source of our continuing troubles and struggles. We have to overcome it.

In view of this, it seems best to take "your body is dead because of sin" to refer to the fact that our physical bodies have the seeds of literal death in them and will eventually cease to live: "For the wages of sin is death..." (Rom. 6:23). Yet the contrast in verse 10 is the important thing. Although our physical bodies will die and are, in a certain sense, as good as dead now, our spirits have been made alive by the Holy Spirit whom the Father has sent to do precisely that.

What does it mean to have our spirits made alive by the Holy Spirit? Paul is talking about the present experience of the Christian, remember. So he means that by the new birth the Spirit has made us alive to things we were dead to before.

1. Alive to God. The first thing we have become alive to is God himself. Before we were born again, we may have believed in God. Indeed, the Bible says that only the fool does not. But God was not real to us. We had no true sense of who he was or what he was like. When we prayed— if we did pray—God seemed far off and unresponsive. However, when we were born again this changed. Now, although there is still much we do not know about God and although his ways are still often strange and puzzling to us, we do not feel that God is unreal. On the contrary, he is more real to us even than life itself. We know that God loves us and is watching over us. We trust his wise management of our earthly affairs. God is particularly close in sickness and sorrow. We know that in the hour of our death we will pass from this world to the presence of the Lord.

2. Alive to the Bible. We have not only become alive to God as the result of the Holy Spirit's work; we have also become alive to the Word of God. It is in the Bible that God speaks to us clearly, regularly, and forcefully. Before we were born again, the Bible was a strange and closed book. Little in it seemed to make sense. We even found it to be boring. As Christians that has changed also. Today, when we read the Bible, we know that God himself is speaking to us in it. And not only does the Bible make sense; we know that it is true. Whatever the world may believe, whatever our nonbelieving teachers or friends may tell us to the contrary—we know that the words of the Bible pass the high standard of absolute truth and will endure forever, even when heaven and earth have passed away (Matt. 5:18).

We also find the Bible to be effective in our lives. We find that it changes us. We echo the words of Paul to young Timothy, when he said, "All Scripture is God-breathed and is useful for teaching, rebuking, correcting and training in righteousness, so that the man of God may be thoroughly equipped for every good work" (2 Tim. 3:16-17).

3. Alive to the Spirit of God in other Christians. Finally, we have also become alive to the Spirit of God in other Christians. For just as the Spirit of God bears witness with our spirit that we are children of God (Rom. 8:16), so does the Spirit within us bear witness with the Spirit in other believers that we are fellow members of the one spiritual family of God and that these others are our brothers and sisters in Christ.

I would suggest the following as excellent tests of whether a person is a Christian—whether you are a Christian.

First, is God real to you? I do not mean, "Do you understand everything about God and God's ways?" Of course, you do not, for you will never understand God completely. I simply mean: Is God real to you. When you pray do you know that you are really praying to him and that he is listening to you and will answer you? When you worship him in church, is it a real God you are worshiping?

Second, is the Bible a meaningful and attractive book to you? I do not mean, "Do you understand everything you read there?" Obviously you do not. But does it seem to be right when you read it? Are you attracted to it? Do you want to know more?

Finally, are you drawn to other Christians? Do you want to be with them? Do you enjoy their fellowship? Do you sense how much you and they have in common? If God is not real to you, if the Bible is not attractive, and if you are not drawn to other believers, why do you think you are a Christian? Probably you are not. On the other hand, if these things are true of you, you should be encouraged by them and press on in following after Jesus Christ.

The Christian's Future

Verse 11 describes the Christian's future, pointing forward to his or her physical resurrection. It is true, as verse 10 has said, that the "body is dead because of sin." But although we die we shall all nevertheless rise again. The text says that "if the Spirit of him who raised Jesus from the dead is living in you, he who raised Christ from the dead will also give life to your mortal bodies through his Spirit, who lives in you."

There are two common mistakes in the interpretation of this verse that we should not fall into. Lloyd-Jones discusses them. The first misunderstanding is that the text is speaking not of a future physical resurrection but of some kind of moral resurrection now. True, there is a kind of "resurrection" in which we who have been dead in sin have been brought into newness of life and are now increasingly putting to death the deeds of the body and living to Christ and righteousness. But that is not what Paul is thinking of here. The comparison between the resurrection of Christ and our own resurrection makes his real meaning clear. The point is that God will raise us just as he raised Jesus.

The second mistake is to think of this in terms of "faith healing," which some have done, supposing it to be a promise of perfect health for those who believe God will heal them. This idea is simply foreign to the context.

The verse is speaking about a future resurrection, and it is regarding it as certain for all who are in Christ. Indeed, it could hardly be stated with greater certainty, for in developing the point the apostle brings in each member of the Trinity, as if to say that our final resurrection is as certain as God himself. Earlier we had a statement relating to the deity of Christ. When Paul spoke of the Holy Spirit he spoke of him as both "the Spirit of God" and "the Spirit of Christ" (v. 9).
Things equal to the same thing are equal to each other. So these two verses together assert Christ's deity. Here, however, it is not just the divine Christ but also the divine Father and divine Spirit who are in view. All three combine to guarantee our final resurrection. At the resurrection, being freed completely from sin's dread penalty, power, and presence, we shall be with God in heaven forever.

Such is the past, present, and future of the Christian.

Ironside and the Gypsy

Whenever I think of the past, present, and future of the Christian, as our text in Romans causes us to do, I remember an anecdote told by the great Bible teacher and former pastor of the Moody Memorial Church in Chicago, Harry A. Ironside. It is told in his study of Ephesians 2:1-10, which provides a similar description of what it means to be a Christian.

Ironside was riding on a train in southern California one Saturday when a gypsy got on and sat beside him. "How do you do, gentleman," she said. "You like to have your fortune told? Cross my palm with a silver quarter, and I will give you your past, present, and future."

"Are you very sure you can do that?" Ironside asked. "You see, I am Scottish, and I wouldn't want to spend a quarter and not get my full value for it."

The gypsy was very earnest. "Yes, gentleman," she said. "I can give you your past, present, and future. I will tell you all."

Ironside then said, "It is not really necessary for me to have my fortune told, because I have had it told already. It is written in a book. I have the book in my pocket." The gypsy was astonished. "You have it in a book?" she said.

"Yes," said Ironside, "and it is absolutely infallible. Let me read it to you." He then reached in his pocket, pulled out his New Testament and began to read from chapter 2 of Ephesians: 'As for you, you were dead in your transgressions and sins, in which you used to live when you followed the ways of this world and of the ruler of the kingdom of the air, the spirit who is now at work in those who are disobedient. All of us also lived among them at one time, gratifying the cravings of our sinful nature and following its desires and thoughts. Like the rest, we were by nature objects of wrath.' "That is my past," he said.

The woman had been startled when he pulled the New Testament from his pocket and now tried to get away. "That is plenty," she protested. "I do not want to hear more."

"But wait," Ironside said. "There is more. Here is my present, too: 'But because of his great love for us, God, who is rich in mercy, made us alive in Christ even when we were dead in transgressions—it is by grace you have been saved. And God raised us up with Christ and seated us with him in the heavenly realms in Christ Jesus....'" "No more," the gypsy protested.

"But," said Ironside, "you must hear my future, and you are not going to have to pay me a quarter for it. I am giving it to you for nothing. It says, '...in order that in the coming ages he might show the incomparable riches of his grace, expressed in his kindness to us in Christ Jesus.'" By now the gypsy was halfway down the aisle of the train, saying, "I took the wrong man!"

We are dealing with a different text here, of course, and the specifics of the past, present, and future described in Romans 8:9-11 vary from what is said about them in Ephesians 2. But it is the same idea. Christians are people whose past has been altered. Before, they were dead in sin; now they are alive in Christ. Their present has been altered, too. They have been awakened to the reality of God, the beauty of the Scriptures, and the presence of the Spirit of God in other Christians. Theirs is a whole new world. Finally, they have a changed future before them. For in time death will be overcome, and they will be raised in a new resurrection body, like the resurrection body of Jesus, and will be with God and Jesus Christ forever.

Are you a Christian? By all means, ask that question of yourself. Be sure of the answer. But when you are sure, be sure of this truth, too: that nothing in heaven or earth will ever separate you from the love of God in Christ Jesus, and that your future will be even better than is your life with Jesus now.

Chapter 99.
Sanctification: The Moral Imperative

Romans 8:12-13

I once received a letter from an old friend whom I had not seen for four or five years, and it contained an old problem. Two years earlier she had begun to date a man who was not a Christian. At the beginning of the relationship, when she had raised the question of religion, he had brushed it off, claiming to be an agnostic. My friend reasoned that the relationship would not last anyway, so she dropped the subject. But the relationship did last. And now it was two years later, and she was in love with a man who was not a Christian and had no interest in becoming one.

Of course, she had prayed. But God had not answered her prayer by bringing the man to faith. And now she had a twofold problem. One was how to find strength to break off the relationship, which she knew she should do. The second was with God. Why was God not intervening to bring her friend to faith? The relationship mattered to her. She had prayed for his salvation. There seemed to be no other men around who were Christians. What was wrong? In fact, in looking back over her life, she had begun to wonder if God had ever intervened in any special way to do anything just for her. And if he hadn't, why was she to assume she had a special relationship with him? Or, for that matter, why was she to believe that God was even there?

I think this letter expressed a very common dilemma, one you may have experienced yourself. Your specifics probably differ; the problem may be a job-related situation, a habit or sin needing to be overcome, some puzzling choice needing to be made. But the questions are the same. How can you do the right thing in your particularly difficult situation? And why doesn't God intervene in some way to work your problem out?

False Approaches to Sanctification

I want to suggest that the answers to those important questions are in the section of Romans 8 to which we come now, because in these verses Paul is talking about our obligation to do the right thing as Christian people. And he is implying—I am sure you will see this as we go on—that, as Christians, we not only have an obligation to live a holy life, doing the right things, but also the ability to live rightly. In fact, the obligation and ability are both grounded in the fact that we are Christians.

The place to begin this analysis is not with Paul's answer to how we are to live the Christian life, however, but by looking at a few of the inadequate approaches to sanctification that are often recommended in our day.

1. A method. In some circles what is recommended to believers who are fighting against sin, trying to live the Christian life, is a method. It may be a special approach to prayer or Bible study. It may be a special way of ordering one's daily life, or something else.

I do not want to be misunderstood at this point. Certain methods of organizing prayer, pursuing Bible study, and disciplining one's daily life are not bad. They may, in fact, actually be quite good. There is nothing wrong with keeping a list of items to pray for, or proceeding regularly through some personal program of Bible study, or having certain times of the day or week that we devote to specific Christian activities. I regularly recommend such items, and others. But what I want to say is that a method does not in itself guarantee sanctification or give us strength to do the right thing in some crisis.

As an illustration, we can think of Martin Luther's experience in the monastery of Erfurt before his conversion. Monasticism was a method. It was the very apogee of method; that was its genius. But although Luther fasted and prayed and kept vigils and confessed his sin, often for hours at a time, he was unable to find either peace or holiness in such practices. Luther's deliverance came in a different way entirely.

2. A formula. A second approach to godly living, which many recommend, is a formula. You have probably heard of some of them: "Let go and let God," "Give Jesus control of your life," "Let Christ have the throne," or "Take it by faith." The appeal of formulas is that they are easy to grasp and for a time may seem to provide the solutions we are seeking. But they are too easy, too simple, and in the end they just do not work. In itself no mere formula is adequate for the harsh realities of human life.

3. An experience. Perhaps most common today is the recommendation that believers seek some life-transforming experience, often described as a "second blessing" or "second baptism of the Holy Spirit." This experience is supposed to mark a major advance in the Christian life, after which the discouragements and defeats of earlier days are replaced by a new experience of holiness, joy, and victory. Proponents usually think this idea is supported by Paul's teaching in Romans 7 and 8. In Romans 7 Paul is describing what seems to be a stage of life characterized by defeat in spiritual matters, but in Romans 8 he is victorious. What is the difference? Obviously, so the argument goes, the difference is an experience of the Holy Spirit, who is not mentioned in Romans 7 but is mentioned repeatedly in Romans 8.

> We are told that if we have this special experience of the Spirit, the victories of Romans 8 will be ours.

Unfortunately, as we have seen, this is just not the teaching of Romans 8. Paul does talk about the Holy Spirit in the chapter, but his point is not that this is an experience a defeated Christian is somehow to attain in order to become spiritually victorious, but rather that the possession of the Holy Spirit is the very essence of what it means to be a Christian. This is not a second experience but an initial and determining one. Paul said it clearly in verse 9: "... if anyone does not have the Spirit of Christ, he does not belong to Christ." That is, he is not a Christian. The chapter argues that those who belong to Christ do have the Holy Spirit, and as a result, they live like it.

An Inescapable Obligation

What is the proper approach to sanctification, then? How are Christians to achieve victory over sin and grow in holiness? Paul gives the one and only adequate answer in these verses.

In some ways the most important word in verses 12 and 13 is the first, the word therefore. It points to what the apostle has just said. We have seen the same thing several times before. The first important occurrence of "therefore" was at the start of Romans 5, after Paul had explained the gospel in chapters 3 and 4. The word introduced the consequences of the salvation achieved for us by God through Jesus Christ, the most important being that our salvation is certain or assured. In fact, there is a sense in which everything we have been studying since (in Romans 58) has been a working out of that "therefore."

We saw this word again in Romans 5:12 and at the start of Romans 8. In each case it introduced a consequence following on what had previously been said. It is the same in verse 12.

Paul is arguing that Christians "have an obligation" to live according to the Holy Spirit, rather than according to the sinful nature. And the reason for this, which he has just stated, is that the Holy Spirit has joined them to Jesus Christ so that: (1) they have been delivered from the wrath of God against them for their sin and been brought into an entirely new realm, the sphere of God's rule in Christ; (2) they have been given a new nature, being made alive to spiritual things to which they were previously dead; and (3) they have been assured of an entirely new destiny in which not only will they live with God forever, but even their physical bodies will be resurrected. These are things God has done (or will do) for us. We have not done them for ourselves; indeed, we could not have. But, says Paul, because God has done them for us, "we have an obligation" to live like God has lived. We must—it is an imperative—live for him.

Let me say this another way. Everything that we have seen in Romans 8 up to this point has been a general description of the Christian: his status, present experience, character, and future expectation. Now, for the first time, Paul draws a specific conclusion, saying that the work of God for us and in us presents us with a serious obligation. It is to live for God and not according to our sinful natures.

In these two verses the specifics of this obligation are stated negatively, though positive expressions follow. We are not to live according to the sinful nature, and we are not to give reign to the misdeeds of the body. Yet the positive side is implied. Instead of living according to the sinful nature, we are obviously to live according to the Spirit. And instead of giving reign to the misdeeds of the body, we are to put the sins of the body to death and instead yield the members of our body to God for righteousness.

No New Teaching

Does this sound familiar? It should. If you remember our earlier studies, you will remember that this is exactly the teaching found when we were studying Romans 6:11-14.

In that chapter Paul was teaching about our union with Christ, following up on his introduction of that doctrine in the second half of Romans 5. He was teaching that, if we are Christians, we have been united to Christ in his death (so that his death becomes our death) and in his resurrection (so that his resurrection becomes our resurrection), and because of this union with Christ we are no longer what we were. We have a new status before God, and we are changed people. Therefore, he says, "... count yourselves dead to sin but alive to God in Christ Jesus... [and] do not let sin reign in your mortal body so that you obey its evil desires. Do not offer the parts of your body to sin, as instruments of wickedness, but rather offer yourselves to God, as those who have been brought from death to life; and offer the parts of your body to him as instruments of righteousness. For sin shall not be your master, because you are not under law, but under grace."

The key word in these verses is "count," or "reckon." It means to proceed on the basis of what is actually the case, in this case living precisely as a new creature in Christ because that is what one truly is as a Christian. When we studied these verses I pointed out that it is necessary that we do this. There is nothing else we can do. We cannot go back; our past is dead to us. The only direction we can go is forward.

This is exactly what Paul is teaching again in Romans 8. The only difference is that now his chief subject is not our union with Christ, which he was discussing in Romans 5 and 6, but rather the role of the Holy Spirit as the Father's agent in saving us. The Holy Spirit joins us to Christ. But this is the identical point! In other words, all Paul is doing in these chapters is approaching the subject of sanctification from two different directions. Yet, no matter what direction he comes from, the bottom line is the same. If we are Christ's, if the Holy Spirit has joined us to him, the past is dead for us and we must live now as what we truly are. To use Paul's words in verse 12, it is our "obligation."

Since Romans 8:12-13 are parallel to Romans 6:11-14, the earlier verses give an interpretation of the words "put to death the misdeeds of the body." They show that this means offering the parts of our body to God for righteousness rather than to sin.

"A Sin unto Death"?

I want to wrap up this study in a practical way. But before I do, there is one more matter that needs to be discussed. It concerns verse 13, which says, "If you live according to the sinful nature, you will die." What kind of a death is this? Is it physical or spiritual death? And, regardless of how we answer that first question, what would we actually have to do—how bad would we have to be—to experience it?

The most common way of answering these questions in evangelical circles is by thinking of this as "a sin unto [physical] death." The biblical phrase "sin unto death" comes from 1 John 5:16-17, in which John writes, "If anyone sees his brother commit a sin that does not lead to death, he should pray and God will give him life. I refer to those whose sin does not lead to death. There is a sin that leads to death ['a sin unto death,' KJV]. I am not saying that he should pray about that. All wrongdoing is sin, and there is sin that does not lead to death." These verses are difficult, but they seem to be speaking of some one sin or type of sin committed by Christians that is so bad that God will take the offending person to heaven early by death rather than allow him or her to stay in it.

If we look for illustrations of this in Scripture, we may have one in Paul's description of people who participated in the Lord's Supper in an unworthy manner. He wrote, "That is why many among you are weak and sick, and a number of you have fallen asleep" (1 Cor. 11:30). Paul seems to be saying that some of the Corinthian Christians died because of the way they dishonored the Lord's Supper. Another example might be found in the deaths of Ananias and Sapphira, who lied to the church about the selling price of some land (Acts 5:1-11).

This interpretation is attractive to teachers who find the doctrine of the carnal Christian in Romans 8. For it seems to say that if a Christian is "carnal" enough, he may die physically, though, of course, he will not lose his salvation.

I want to repeat that 1 John 5:16-17 is a particularly hard passage to interpret. Various interpretations have been given. To see it as dealing with physical death for sinning Christians seems to be one good possibility, though it is hard to reconcile this with the very next sentence in the passage, where John says, "We know that anyone born of God does not continue to sin..." (v. 18). If those born of God do not continue in sin, how can it be possible that any true Christian can sin so grievously that God would punish him or her by death? That, at the very least, is puzzling.

But even if 1 John 5 does concern punishment by physical death for some Christians, this is not an interpretation that fits the text we are studying. In Romans Paul is not talking about sinning Christians. He is distinguishing between Christians, who live by the Spirit, and unbelievers, who live according to the sinful nature. So his point seems to be rather that those who live according to the sinful nature, that is, unbelievers, will die spiritually—indeed, they are already spiritually dead—while those who live by the Spirit, that is, Christians, will live spiritually. Paul must be saying this, because it is what he has been saying all along.

Why, then, does he write as he does, saying to Christians, "For if you live according to the sinful nature, you will die"? The answer is that this is a general statement, like saying to a child, "If you put your finger in the fire, you'll get burned." It does not necessarily imply that a person hearing the words might ignore the warning or even be able to ignore it.

May I put it bluntly again? Paul is saying that if you live like a non-Christian, dominated by your sinful nature rather than living according to the Holy Spirit, you will perish like a non-Christian—because you are a non-Christian. "If you live according to the sinful nature, you will die." On the other hand, if you really are a Christian, you will not live according to the sinful nature. Instead, you will acknowledge what you actually are in Jesus Christ and live accordingly.

D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones concludes that here "the apostle teaches quite clearly that the way of sanctification is the way of realizing the truth about ourselves as Christians, and then putting it into practice."

"You Can Do It!"

Now let me apply this teaching practically. At the beginning of this study I told of a letter I received from an old friend and that it had two questions: (1) How can I find the strength to do what is right; and (2) Why doesn't God intervene in my life in special ways to help out?

I want to return to that letter now, having looked at Paul's teaching about the way to sanctification, and share how I answered it. I called my friend, and after I had asked how she was doing—finding, incidentally, that she was doing remarkably well—I said something like this:

I am sure you will find strength to do what is right in this situation, and the reason I am sure you will find strength is that I know you already have it. You can do it! I do not mean that you have the necessary strength or willpower in yourself, because none of us do. We can't do anything by ourselves or in our own strength. The reason I know you have the strength you need is that you have the Holy Spirit, which is true of every Christian. The reason you are troubled by the need to do right and are not willing simply to drift along in wrong living, as unbelievers do, is that you know you belong to Jesus Christ and therefore really want to please him. God's Spirit is within you. So if you were to say, "I don't have the strength to serve God," you would really be saying that the Holy Spirit is inadequate.

And that is the answer to your other question, too. You want to know why God has not intervened in your life to do something special. I have heard many people ask that question—it is a natural one, particularly since we read about special interventions by God in people's lives in the Bible and in Christian biographies.

But what do we mean when we ask that question?

Do we mean that we want God to reorder events to suit our own personal wishes? If so, we have no right to ask that, nor should we want to. That would mean that we know better than God, that we can order the events of our lives better than he can. That would be terrible.

Or do we mean—I think this is actually the case—that we want God to solve our problem by some external means, perhaps by removing the temptation, by changing our thinking so that we are no longer attracted by the wrong, or by providing an experience that will strip the temptation of its power? But if God were to do that, which he could, it would mean that what we are able to do as normal Christians unaided by some supernatural intervention of God does not count. And this would mean that the Christian life ultimately has no meaning. What would be the point of being a Christian if, in crisis situations, God always has to intervene in some way.

To be a Christian means this. First, God has already done everything necessary to save you not only from sin's penalty but from its power, too. You have God's Holy Spirit within you, and as a result you can live for him. You do not need some secret method, esoteric formula, or mystical experience. God has already equipped you perfectly for every good work.

Second, you will live for him. And not only will you live for him, putting to death the misdeeds of the body and living in accordance with the Holy Spirit's desires, your doing that will also matter profoundly. What would it prove if God did the hard thing for you? Nothing at all! We already know that God is all-powerful. But when Christians do the right thing—even when it breaks their hearts or when they suffer for it—when they do it in utter dependence on God and out of love for him, then their obedience to God proves everything. It proves that they matter and that God matters. And that victory, their victory and yours, will endure to the praise of our great God throughout eternity.

My friend's two questions probably occur to every Christian at one time or another. My response was helpful to her—I hope it also furthers your own understanding of sanctification.

Chapter 100.
The Family of God

Romans 8:14

One of the things I have said about Romans 8, as we have been working our way through it, is that basically Paul is not teaching anything new here but is instead reinforcing what he already stated. The general theme is assurance of salvation, but that doctrine was laid out in chapter 5. And, as I have explained, chapters 6 and 7 were a digression to answer several important questions growing out of chapter 5, after which the apostle picked up where he left off earlier.

But true as that is in general, we find something new when we come to Romans 8:14. This verse tells us that "those who are led by the Spirit of God are sons of God," and here the idea that we are "sons of God" appears in Romans for the first time.

This is not merely an incidental thought, although it would be possible for a new idea to appear at some point simply by accident, as it were. There is nothing accidental about this reference. Paul is talking about assurance of salvation and is arguing that one basis for this is our new relationship to God, which is a family relationship. Moreover, having introduced the theme in our text, he then elaborates upon it in verses 15-17, speaking of such related concepts as "sons," "sonship," "children," and "heirs." Some of the words reappear later on in verses 19, 21, and 23.

The idea is so important that a number of commentators, such as John R. W. Stott, treat verses 14-17 as a separate section, in spite of the fact that verse 14 is linked to the preceding verse by the word because, or for.

Technically, verse 14 is introduced as proof of what has gone immediately before. Calvin saw this and said, "The substance... amounts to this, that all who are led by the Spirit of God are the sons of God; all the sons of God are heirs of eternal life; and therefore all who are led by the Spirit of God ought to feel assured of eternal life." Therefore, Romans 8:14 is meant to be both a test of spiritual life and a comfort.

Verse 14 is one of those amazing verses, found often in the Bible, which is literally loaded with important teachings. I want to list five of them.

Two Fathers, Two Families

The first point is a negative one: Not everyone is a member of God's family. The reason this is important is that we have an idea in western thought, a product of older liberalism, which said that human beings are all sons or daughters of God and that therefore we are all members of one family. The popular way of putting this has been to speak of "the universal fatherhood of God" and "the universal brotherhood of man." I am sure you have heard those expressions.

There is a sense, of course, in which all human beings are brothers and sisters, having been created by the one God. This is the way the apostle Paul spoke in Athens when he quoted the Greek poets Cleanthes and Aratus to say to that particularly intellectual audience that "we are [all] his [that is, God's] offspring" (Acts 17:28). But that is not the way the words "sons of God" are used in Scripture, and it is certainly not the way the apostle is speaking here. When Paul writes of "those who are led by the Spirit of God," he is distinguishing between those who are led by the Spirit and those who are not led by the Spirit, which means that only a portion of humanity are God's spiritual children.

The clearest statement of this important truth is from the mouth of Jesus Christ. The relevant passage is John 8:31-47. Jesus had been teaching the people and had made a statement similar to what Paul has been saying in Romans: "If you hold to my teachings, you are really my disciples. Then you will know the truth, and the truth will set you free."

This offended his Jewish listeners, because they did not like to think of themselves as enslaved.

"We have never been slaves of anyone," they said.

Their statement was absurd, of course. They had been enslaved by many nations during their long history, and even then were under the domination of the Roman Empire.

But Jesus ignored that point and answered instead that he had been speaking spiritually. "I tell you the truth, everyone who sins is a slave to sin.... I am telling you what I have seen in the Father's presence, and you do what you have heard from your father" (vv. 34, 38).

They answered that Abraham was their father.

Jesus denied it, saying that if they were Abraham's children, they would be like Abraham and would not be determined to kill him, which they were. He said again that, instead, they were acting like their true father.

They then replied that God himself was their only Father, at which point Jesus became most explicit: "If God were your Father, you would love me, for I came from God and now am here.... You belong to your father, the devil, and you want to carry out your father's desire.... The reason you do not hear is that you do not belong to God" (vv. 42, 44, 47).

It cannot be said any clearer than that. In these words Jesus made clear that there are two families and two fatherhoods, and that only those who love and serve God are God's children.

Born of God

This leads to the second important teaching of this verse. In fact, it is the main one: All Christians are members of God's family. This involves a change that is radical, supernatural, and far-reaching.

1. It is radical. To become a child of God means that the individual has experienced the most radical or profound change possible. This is because, before a person becomes a son or daughter of God, he or she is not a member of God's family but is a member of the devil's family (to use Jesus' terminology in John 8) or is merely "in Adam" (to use Paul's earlier teaching in Romans). We do not need to review Paul's earlier teaching in detail, because it was covered thoroughly in our studies of chapters 5 and 6. To be "in Adam" means to be in sin, a slave to wickedness, under divine judgment, and destined for eternal death. To be "in Christ" is the reverse. It means to be delivered from sin and its judgment, to be growing in holiness, and to possess eternal life. The change is as radical as passing from a state of slavery to freedom or from death to life.

2. It is supernatural. This change is not only radical. It is supernatural, too, which means that it is done for us from above by God. Here again we are helped by the very words of Jesus Christ, as recorded in John 3. He had been approached by Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews, and had told Nicodemus that he would never be able to understand spiritual matters unless he was "born again."

This puzzled the Jewish ruler, so he asked, "How can a man be born when he is old?"

Jesus replied, "I tell you the truth, no one can enter the kingdom of God unless he is born of water and the Spirit. Flesh gives birth to flesh, but the Spirit gives birth to spirit. You should not be surprised at my saying, 'You must be born again.' The wind blows wherever it pleases. You hear its sound, but you cannot tell where it comes from or where it is going. So it is with everyone born of the Spirit" (vv. 5-8). In these words Jesus made clear that becoming a child of God is a matter of spiritual birth and that this is something only the Spirit of God can do. The Greek word translated "again" implies that this birth is "from above," rather than from below, which means that this new spiritual life is divinely imparted.

3. It is far-reaching. This point will be developed more as we proceed through this section, but it is important to say here that the end of this spiritual rebirth is not only deliverance from sin's judgment—or, as many in our day seem to think, happiness now—but glorification. This is where chapter 5 began, and it is where chapter 8 will end. It is the point of this section of Romans: "Now if we are children, then we are heirs—heirs of God and co-heirs with Christ, if indeed we share in his sufferings in order that we may also share in his glory" (v. 17).

In his exceptional study of these verses, D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones stresses that the apostle's interest "is always in glorification," bemoaning the fact that the interest of today's church has settled on sanctification "because we are so miserably subjective."

A Practical Result

Not every characteristic of our age is bad, however, though super subjectivity undoubtedly is a troublemaker. One potentially good characteristic is modern-day practicality. We are a down-toearth people and want to see results. So I ask, what is the practical result of this important change that has happened to us? What does being a Christian mean in one's daily life?

Here is where Romans 8:14 provides us with a third important doctrine: To be a Christian means to be led by God's Spirit. Up to this point the doctrines I have been explaining might be thought to refer to a change of status only—before, we were "in Adam"; now we are "in Christ." Before, we were under condemnation; now we are delivered from condemnation. Before, we were spiritually dead; now we are spiritually alive. All that is true, of course, and Paul has taught it. But it is not the only truth he is teaching. Because our change of status has been accomplished by the Holy Spirit, who lives within every genuine Christian, being a Christian also means that we will be led by that same Spirit. Or, as I have said in different words, it means that we will be growing in holiness increasingly.

This is the way verse 14 is tied to the preceding one. Verse 13 said that we will live spiritually, now and forever, "if by the Spirit [we] put to death the misdeeds of the body." Now verse 14 adds that we will indeed do that if the Spirit is within us, for this is the direction the Holy Spirit is leading.

A Test of Spiritual Paternity

From time to time we read in the papers of a "paternity suit," in which a mother sues for support of her child on the grounds that a certain man is the father though he denies it. In earlier ages this was a matter usually impossible to prove, which made a situation like this extremely difficult for the woman. But today a test can be made of both the alleged father's and the child's genetic makeup, and the relationship can be established (or disproved) with nearly 100 percent accuracy.

This introduces the fourth important teaching in this verse, which is, we might say, a test of paternity. It tells us how we can know we are in God's family. We are in God's family if the Spirit of God is leading us in our daily lives.

Do you remember what I said earlier about this being a new idea and a new section of Romans 8? Here I have to confess that it is not such a new idea after all, since we have really been noting this point all along. It is only another way of saying that those who are Christians will necessarily live accordingly. They are on the path of discipleship. Therefore, although they may fall while walking along that path, they also inevitably get up again and go forward. They grow in holiness.

A big question still remains: How does the Holy Spirit lead us?

People have a lot of ideas at this point, many of them unbiblical. Some answer in terms of outward circumstances, suggesting that God orders external events to direct us in the way we should go. Others look for special intimations or feelings or perhaps even special revelations. Some think of guidance almost magically, expecting God's Spirit to direct them to some verse supernaturally or to let them overhear some human remark that is actually from God. We have to be careful in this area since it is futile to deny that God does indeed sometimes lead in "mysterious" ways. Saint Augustine was converted by hearing a neighbor's child singing the words, "Tole lege (Take, read)." He received it as a word from God, picked up a Bible and, turning to a passage at random, fell upon verses that spoke to his specific need, and so was converted. We dare not say that this was not from God.

But is that sort of guidance what we are to expect normally? If so, the majority of us have not experienced it. If being "led by the Spirit" is what it means to be a Christian, and if that is what it means to be led, then most of us are not Christians! Of course, this is not what Paul is saying.

The place to start is by recognizing that the Holy Spirit works within us or, as we might say, "internally." Everything in the passage indicates this. Paul has been talking about our minds being set on what the Holy Spirit desires and about our having an obligation to live according to the Spirit rather than according to the sinful nature. In the next verses he will speak of an internal witness of the Spirit by which we instinctively call God "Father." God can order external events, of course, and he does. He orders everything. But that is not what is being discussed here. In this verse Paul is talking about what God's Spirit does internally within the Christian.

So we reduce the earlier question to this one: What does the Holy Spirit do internally in Christians to lead them? Let me suggest three things.

1. He renews our minds. The first area in which the Holy Spirit works is the intellect, and he does this by what Paul will later call "the renewing of your mind." This comes out very clearly in Romans 12. There, having laid down the great doctrines of the epistle, the apostle begins to apply them to the believer's conduct, saying, "Therefore, I urge you, brothers, in view of God's mercy, to offer your bodies as living sacrifices, holy and pleasing to God—this is your spiritual act of worship. Do not conform any longer to the pattern of this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind. Then you will be able to test and approve what God's will is —his good, pleasing and perfect will" (Rom. 12:1-2).

The person who discovers, tests, and approves what God's pleasing and perfect will is obviously is being led by God. But the key to this, according to Romans, is the mind's renewal.

How, then, are our minds to be renewed? There is only one way. It is by our reading and being taught by the Spirit from the Bible. That is what God has given the Bible to us for—to inform us, enlighten our minds, and redirect our thinking. I hold the Bible and the Holy Spirit together in this, however, as the Reformers were particularly astute in doing. For alone, either is inadequate. A person who considers himself to be led by the Spirit apart from the Bible will soon fall into error and excess. He will begin to promote nonbiblical and therefore false teachings. But a person who reads the Bible apart from the illumination provided by the Holy Spirit, which is true in the case of all unbelievers, will find it to be a closed and meaningless book. The Christian is led by the operation of the Holy Spirit and the Bible together.

Here is a test for you. Has the Holy Spirit been leading you by enlightening your mind through Bible study? Have you discovered things about God, yourself, the gospel, and the ways of God that you did not know before? Do you realize that they are true? Are you beginning to live differendy? Unless you are crazy, you will begin to live differently. Because a person who realizes that one way is true and another is false and yet takes the false path must be out of his or her mind, irrational. If your mind has been renewed, you will show it.

2. He stirs the heart. Figuratively, the heart is the seat of the emotions, and the Holy Spirit works upon it by stirring or quickening the heart to love God. In the verse that follows our text Paul speaks of an inner response to God by which we affectionately cry out, "Abba, Father." This verse does not actually mention the heart, but in a parallel text in Galatians Paul does, showing that he is thinking of the operation of the Holy Spirit upon our hearts explicitly. He writes, "Because you are sons, God sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, the Spirit who calls out, 'Abba, Father'" (Gal. 4:6). In other words, the Spirit of God leads us by making us affectionate toward God and his ways. It is the Spirit who causes us, as Jesus said, to "hunger and thirst for righteousness" (Matt. 5:6).

This brings us to another test of whether or not you are a Christian. I mentioned it in an earlier study. Do you love God? I do not mean, "Do you love God perfectly?" If you think you do, you probably do not love him much at all. I mean only, "Do you try to please God? Do you want to spend time with him through studying the Bible and praying? Do you seek his favor? Are you concerned for his glory?"

3. He directs our wills. Just as the Spirit leads us by renewing our minds and stirring our hearts or affections, so also does he lead us by redirecting and strengthening our wills. Paul speaks of this in Philippians, where he writes: "Therefore, my dear friends... continue to work out your salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God who works in you to will and to act according to his good purpose" (Phil. 2:12-13).

God gives us a singleness of purpose—to do his will. It is the way God works. Has your will been redirected in that way? When you look deep inside, do you find that you really want to serve God and act according to his good purpose? God does not force you to be godly against your will. He changes your will by the new birth so that what you despised before you now love, and what you were indifferent to before you now find desirable.

John Murray had it right when he wrote, "The activity of the believer is the evidence of the Spirit's activity, and the activity of the Spirit is the cause of the believer's activity." If you are trying to please God, it is because the Spirit is at work within you, leading you to want and actually do the right thing. It is a strong reason for believing you are in God's family.

Our Brothers and Sisters

There is one more important teaching in this short but potent verse, and it comes from the fact that the words we are dealing with are plural: "those who are led by the Spirit of God are sons of God." Therefore: Those led by the Spirit of God are our true brothers and sisters. We are part of the same divine family.

The older, King James Version started this verse with "For as many as..." and I am almost sorry this has been changed, since it emphasized the inclusive nature of God's family better than "those" in the New International Version. Yet it is the same thing. And the problem is not so much our understanding the point as practicing it. There are many differences between believers within the church of Jesus Christ—differences of class, personality, background, economic status, temperament, abilities, drive, sensitivity, and thousands of other things. They have led to divisions in the church, for not all divisions (perhaps not even the majority) are doctrinal. Many divisions exist that should not exist, and sometimes these lead Christians in one camp to suspect and even fail to associate with those in another.

This should not be, for the text teaches that what makes other believers our brothers or sisters in Christ is not what denomination or movement they may belong to, but whether or not they are being led by God's Spirit. Anyone for whom that is true is our brother or sister in Christ, and we should recognize it and be willing to work with that person to fulfill God's purposes.

Chapter 101.
No Longer Slaves But Sons

Romans 8:15-16

We are continuing to study the section of Romans 8 in which, for the first time in the letter, Paul introduces the thought of Christians being members of God's family. The section begins technically with verse 15 and continues through verse 17, though the phrase "sons of God" was introduced in verse 14 and the words "sons of God" and "children of God" are also used later. Paul's development of this idea makes these verses among the most important in the chapter.

It is important to see how they fit in. Remember that the apostle's overall theme in Romans 8 is assurance, the doctrine that Christians can know that they truly are Christians and that, because they are, nothing will ever separate them from the love of God. The experience of assurance demands that we actually be God's children. For this reason I have stressed the need to test our profession. It would be fatal to presume in this matter. However, the chapter has not been written to make us uncertain of our salvation, but to give assurance of it, and that is where these verses come in. They give multiple and connecting reasons, one in each of the four verses, why the child of God can know that he or she really is a member of God's family. Robert Haldane puts it like this:

Here and in the following verses the apostle exhibits four proofs of our being the sons of God. The first is our being led by the Spirit of God; the second is the Spirit of adoption which we receive, crying, "Abba, Father," verse 15; the third is the witness of the Spirit with our spirits, verse 16; the fourth is our sufferings in the communion of Jesus Christ; to which is joined the fruit of our sonship, the Apostle saying that if children, we are heirs of God, and then joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together.

We looked at the first of these proofs in the previous study. We will look at the fourth in the next. In this study we will look at proofs two and three, adoption and the witness of the Spirit with our spirits, which belong together.

Adopted by God

We begin with verse 15: "For you did not receive a spirit that makes you a slave again to fear, but you received the Spirit of sonship. And by him we cry, 'Abba, Father.'" The chief idea in this verse, which is also a new idea, is "adoption," though this is obscured somewhat by the New International Version, which speaks of "sonship." But the Greek word is huiothesia, which means "to have an installation or placement as a son" and is the technical Greek word for "adoption" (the term used in KJV). Adoption is the procedure by which a person is taken from one family (or no family) and placed in another. In this context, it refers to removing a person from the family of Adam (or Satan) and placing him or her in the family of God.

Adoption is related to regeneration, or the new birth, but they are not the same thing.
Regeneration has to do with our receiving a new life or new nature. Adoption has to do with our receiving a new status.

But first we need to back up and consider a problem. It comes from the way Paul uses the word spirit in this verse. You will notice that "spirit" occurs twice, once in the phrase "a spirit that makes you a slave again to fear" (KJV uses the words "spirit of bondage") and a second time in the phrase "Spirit of sonship [or adoption]." The question is: To what do these two words refer?

The word spirit can refer to either of two things in the Bible, either the Holy Spirit or a human spirit, or disposition. These two meanings, in various combinations, give us three possible interpretations of the verse.

1. Both occurrences of "spirit" can be taken as referring to the human spirit. Those who think this way believe that Paul is talking about a person's disposition or feelings in both cases and would interpret the verse as saying that we used to be fearful but that now, following our conversion and because of it, we have a cheerful spirit of adoption by which we call God "Father." That is probably true enough. But there are good reasons for thinking that Paul is saying something considerably more important in this passage.

2. The second possibility is to take both occurrences of the word as referring to the Holy Spirit. Martyn Lloyd-Jones does this, referring the first to the time in our lives in which we are presumed to come under the conviction of sin but in which we have not yet come forth into the liberty of the gospel. This is an important point with Lloyd-Jones, since it is linked to his interpretation of Romans 7:7-25. He takes over two hundred pages to expound this and other points in his treatment of Romans 8:15-16. Donald Grey Barnhouse also takes both occurrences as referring to the Holy Spirit, but he views the "spirit of bondage" as the time in which the people of God, the Jews, lived under the law of Moses, that is, before the coming of Christ. John Murray refers both to the Holy Spirit but in a specialized sense, as meaning, "[You] did not receive the Holy Spirit as a Spirit of bondage but as a Spirit of adoption."

3. The third view is a combination of the two, in which the first word is taken as referring to the human spirit and the second as referring to the Holy Spirit. This is the view reflected in most translations, such as the New International Version, where the first "spirit" appears with a lowercase s and the second with a capital.

In my judgment, there is no question but that the second use of the word must refer to the Holy Spirit, if for no other reason than that it appears in precisely this way in the parallel verse in Galatians: "Because you are sons, God sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, the Spirit who calls out 'Abba, Father'" (Gal. 4:6). However, it is not so easy to say what the first use of the word refers to. Clearly, it could refer to the Holy Spirit negatively, which is how Murray sees it ("You did not receive the Holy Spirit as a Spirit of bondage but as a Spirit of adoption"). But if we take the parallel passage in Galatians seriously and apply that context here, it seems that the bondage involved is bondage to the law and that the contrast is between that bondage and the grace and freedom from trying to serve God by the law, which came through Jesus Christ (cf. Gal. 4:1-7).

Moreover, this interpretation fits Romans. For Paul has been talking about the Christian's former state—in which, being in Adam, we were enslaved to sin—and he has argued that we have been delivered from that former bondage by the Holy Spirit. Now he adds that this new state, which conveys freedom from bondage, also contains the privileges of sonship.

The word adoption is not common in the New Testament, being used only by Paul and that only five times (three times in Romans), and it does not occur in the Old Testament at all, since the Jews did not practice adoption. They had other procedures, polygamy and Levirate marriage, for dealing with the problems of widows and orphans and inheritance.

Paul took the idea of adoption from Greek and Roman law, probably for two reasons. First, he was writing to Greeks and Romans (in this case to members of the church at Rome), so adoption, being part of their culture, was something they would all very readily understand. Second, the word was useful to him because "it signified being granted the full rights and privileges of sonship in a family to which one does not belong by nature." That is exactly what happens to believers in salvation.

Our Father in Heaven

I have spoken of adoption as giving the adopted one a new status. But "new status" may not be the best description of what happens. What is really involved is a set of new relationships—new relationships to other people, both believers and unbelievers, but above all a new relationship to God. When we speak of salvation as justification, we are thinking of God as Judge. That is a remote and somewhat grim relationship. When we think of regeneration, we are thinking of God as Creator. That, too, is remote. But when we think of adoption, we are thinking of God as our Father, which denotes a far closer relationship.

This is why the apostle says that the Spirit of adoption causes us to cry out, "Abba, Father."

It is important to recognize that our authority to call God "Father" goes back to Jesus Christ. It goes back to no less important a statement than the opening phrases of the Lord's Prayer, which begins, "Our Father in heaven..." (Matt. 6:9). Today we take the right to call God "our Father" for granted, but we need to understand how new and startlingly original this must have been for Christ's contemporaries. No Old Testament Jew ever addressed God directly as "my Father."

This has been documented in a thoroughly German way by Ernst Lohmeyer, in a book called
"Our Father," and by Joachim Jeremias, in an essay entitled "Abba" and a booklet called The Lord's Prayer. According to these scholars: (1) the title was new with Jesus; (2) Jesus always used this form of address in praying; and (3) Jesus authorized his disciples to use the same word after him.

No one would deny that in one sense the title of "father" for God is as old as religion. Homer wrote of "Father Zeus, who rules over the gods and mortal men," and Aristotle explained that Homer was right because "paternal rule over children is like that of a king over his subjects" and "Zeus is king of us all." In those days "father" meant "lord," or "master," which is what all kings
(as well as fathers) were. The important point, however, is that the address was always impersonal. In Greek thought their God could be called a "father" in the same way that a king might be called a father of his country. So, too, do we call George Washington the father of our country. But the deity is never pictured as "my father" or "our father" in Greek writing.

The situation is similar in the Old Testament. Occasionally the word father will be used as a designation for God, but it is not frequent and it is never personal. In fact, it occurs only fourteen times in the whole of the Old Testament. God refers to Israel as "my firstborn son" (Exod. 4:22), and David says, "As a father has compassion on his children, so the LORD has compassion on those who fear him" (Ps. 103:13). Although Isaiah writes, "Yet, O LORD, you are our Father" (Isa. 64:8), in none of these passages does any individual Jew address God directly as "my Father." In fact, in most of these passages the point is that Israel has not lived up to the family relationship.

Thus, Jeremiah reports God as saying, "How gladly would I treat you like sons and give you a desirable land, the most beautiful inheritance of any nation. I thought you would call me 'Father' and not turn away from following me. But like a woman unfaithful to her husband, so you have been unfaithful to me, O house of Israel" (Jer. 3:19-20). Similarly, Hosea records God's words: "When Israel was a child, I loved him, and out of Egypt I called my son. But the more I called Israel, the further they went from me..." (Hos. 11:1-2).

Moreover, in the time of Jesus the distance between the people and God, suggested by the detached reverence by which God was customarily addressed, was widening rather than growing more narrow. The names of God were more and more withheld from public speech and prayers. And the great name for God, the Tetragrammaton (YHWH), usually translated "Jehovah" or "Yahweh," was so protected that we do not know even today precisely how it was pronounced.

The reason is that it was not pronounced, and no indication of how it should be pronounced was given. Whenever the word Jehovah appeared in the sacred text, the vowel pointing for the word Adonai, which means "Lord," was substituted for the vowel pointing of the divine name. This was to remind readers to say "Adonai" instead of "Jehovah," which is what they did. God was considered to be too transcendent to be directly addressed, and his name was considered too holy to be on human lips. So the distance between God and man continued to grow wider.

All this was completely overturned by Jesus Christ. He always called God "Father," and this fact must have impressed itself in an extraordinary way upon the disciples. Not only do all four of the Gospels record that Jesus used this address, but they report that he did so in all his prayers. The only exception—the cry from the cross, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" (Matt. 27:46; Mark 15:34)—enforces the importance of this point. That prayer was wrung from Christ's lips at the moment in which he was made sin for us and in which the relationship he had with his Father was in some measure temporarily broken. At all other times Jesus boldly assumed a relationship to God that was considered to be highly irreverent or even blasphemous by his contemporaries.

This is of great significance for our prayers. Jesus was the Son of God in a unique sense, and God was uniquely his Father. He came to God in prayer as God's unique Son. We are not like him. Nevertheless, Jesus revealed that this same relationship can be enjoyed by all who believe on him, all whose sins are removed by his suffering. They can come to God as God's children. God can be their own personal Father.

But even this is not all. When Jesus addressed God as Father he did not use the normal word for father. He used the Aramaic word abba, which is what Paul quotes in Romans 8:15 and the parallel text in Galatians 4:6. Obviously this word was so striking to the disciples that they remembered it in its Aramaic form and repeated it in Aramaic even when they were speaking Greek or writing their Gospels or letters in Greek. Mark used it in his account of Christ's prayer in Gethsemane ("Abba, Father, everything is possible for you," Mark 14:36). Paul used it in the texts we are studying.

What does abba mean specifically?

The early church fathers, Chrysostom, Theodor of Mopsuestia, and Theodore of Cyrrhus, who came from Antioch, where Aramaic was spoken, and who probably had Aramaic-speaking nurses, unanimously testified that abba was the address of small children to their fathers. The Talmud confirms this when it says that when a child is weaned "it learns to say abba and imma" (that is, "daddy" and "mommy").

So this is what abba really means: daddy. To a Jewish mind a prayer addressing God as daddy would not only have been improper, it would have been irreverent to the highest degree. Yet this is what Jesus said in his prayers, and it quite naturally stuck in the minds of the disciples. It was something very unique when Jesus taught his disciples to call God "daddy."

Now let me back up to something I said in the previous study when I was trying to explain how the Holy Spirit leads us. I spoke of his work upon our hearts, producing affection or love for God. A good illustration is the story of the prodigal son. When he came to his senses he remembered his father, his affection was quickened, and he determined to get up and go to him. That is the attitude the Holy Spirit creates in our hearts to assure us that we are no longer the devil's children but rather are God's sons and daughters. We now know that God is our loving Father, and because we know this we are drawn to him.

Witness of the Spirit

We come finally to the third verse in this four-verse section, a verse that gives another reason for knowing we are in God's family. It says, "The Spirit himself testifies with our spirit that we are God's children" (v. 16). There is no question what the two "spirits" refer to in this verse. The first is the Holy Spirit. The second is our human spirit. But it is not so clear about what this third proof of our being children of God consists.

One thing is clear. There is a contrast between verse 15, in which we give testimony to this new relationship, crying "Abba, Father," and verse 16, in which the Holy Spirit himself bears witness. Verse 16 concerns the Holy Spirit's witness, which is separate from our own. But what is this witness? How is it separate from what Paul has already said (and I have been discussing)?

I know that what I am going to say now will be misunderstood by some people and that a few may even condemn it as being wrong and dangerous, especially some in the Reformed tradition. But what I am convinced this teaches is that there is such a thing as a direct witness of the Holy Spirit to believers that they are sons or daughters of God, even apart from the other "proofs" I have mentioned. In other words, it is possible to have a genuine experience of the Holy Spirit in one's heart.

Experience of the Spirit? I know the objections. I know that no spiritual experience is ever necessarily valid in itself. Any such experience can be counterfeited, and the devil's counterfeits can be very good indeed. But the fact that a spiritual experience can be counterfeited does not invalidate all of them.

I also know that those who seek experiences of the Holy Spirit frequently run to excess and fall into unbiblical ideas and practices. Every such experience must be tested by Scripture. But in spite of these objections, which are important, I still say that there can be a direct experience of the Spirit that is valid testimony to the fact that one is truly God's child.

Haven't you ever had such an experience? An overwhelming sense of God's presence? Or haven't you at some point, perhaps at many points in your life, been aware that God has come upon you in a special way and that there is no doubt whatever that what you are experiencing is from God? You may have been moved to tears. You may have deeply felt some other sign of God's presence, by which you were certainly moved to a greater and more wonderful love for him.

This has been a very common experience in revivals. Martyn Lloyd-Jones illustrates it by many dozens of pages of revival-time teaching and testimony. While I believe he is mistaken in referring to this as a "baptism of the Holy Spirit," I nevertheless believe that he is correct in calling it a genuine and desirable reality.

If this idea is foreign to you or if it seems dangerous, perhaps you are not ready for it at this point. Let it go. You have plenty to occupy yourself with in what has already been taught in verses 14 and 15. But if you have had any of these intensely spiritual moments, perhaps in your quiet times or while sitting in a church service, thank God for them. Know that they do not replace any of the other things I have stressed. The Bible is primary. But rejoice that God also has a way of making himself so real to us that we are actually lifted up, even in hard times, and are assured by that spiritual whisper of divine love that we are and always will be God's children.

Chapter 102.
The Inheritance of God's Saints

Romans 8:17

Romans 8:17 introduces us to two important biblical ideas: suffering and glory. Or, as Ray Stedman says, "the hurts and hallelujahs." The verse begins with the glory, talks about suffering, and ends with glory again. The first statement is that children of God are God's heirs and co-heirs with Jesus Christ.

What a marvelous thing this is, to be an heir of God himself! Sometimes children hope fondly for what they might inherit from their parents, but quite often these very human hopes are disappointing. One of the richest men who ever lived was Cecil Rhodes (1853-1902), an Englishman who emigrated to South Africa for health reasons and there amassed a vast fortune through diamond mining. He died when he was only forty-nine, and in his will he left most of his riches not to his immediate family, much to their resentment, but to endow the famous Rhodes scholarships.

"Well, there it is," said his brother Arthur when the disappointing news reached him. "It seems I shall have to win a scholarship."

The French writer of the Middle Ages, Francois Rabelais, who was also a Franciscan friar, made the following will: "I owe much. I possess nothing. I give the rest to the poor."

How different with God. God owes nothing, he possesses everything, and he gives it all to his children.

True and False Evangelism

There are certain things we need to know about our spiritual inheritance, however, and the first is that it is laid up for us in heaven, that is, in the future. This should be almost self-evident, but it is important to emphasize it in light of a certain kind of evangelism that has been developed in our age.

This evangelism says, "Jesus died to give you abundant life now, and this means that he has promised to provide all you either need or want. If you are in trouble, he will solve your troubles. If you are unhappy, he will make you happy. If you are discouraged, he will lift you up and give you a joyful and unquenchable heart song. Whatever your needs may be, Jesus is the provision for those needs. Tell him about them. Claim the answers to those needs by faith." In some of its more extreme expressions, this teaching has become what is called a "health and prosperity" gospel.

During their brief reign on religious television, Jim and Tammy Bakker preached this kind of evangelism. They taught that God would make believers rich and prosperous. Tammy said, "When I tell God what car I want, I even tell him the color."

Such a gospel forgets that Jesus came not to bring peace but a sword, and that his call to discipleship says, "If anyone would come after me, he must deny himself and take up his cross daily and follow me" (Luke 9:23). It is why, in our text, Paul follows his statement that if we are God's children, we are heirs of God with a sober reminder: "if indeed we share in his sufferings." True Christianity is honest at this point. It does not deny that there are very important promises for this life—promises that God will be with us in trouble, provide an inner peace in turmoil, minister comfort when we are distressed, and never leave us. But the basic idea is not that we shall escape trouble here but rather be given grace to go through it. And the blessings of our inheritance are almost entirely reserved for us in heaven.

D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones says, "True evangelism does not offer some panacea for all the ills in our life in this world; it does not promise to make us perfect in a moment or set the whole world right. It says rather, 'In the world ye shall have tribulation; but fear not, I have overcome the world.' "

The Inheritance to Come

So we start from the truth that most of our rewards are in the future. But then we immediately want to ask: "Of what does our inheritance consist?" What will believers actually possess in heaven? There are a number of things that I call "lesser items," and then there is the greatest prize of all.

The Lesser Items

1. A heavenly home. The first thing that comes to mind here is the promise of a heavenly home that Jesus made to his disciples just before his arrest and crucifixion. He said, "Do not let your hearts be troubled. Trust in God; trust also in me. In my Father's house are many rooms; if it were not so, I would have told you. I am going there to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come back and take you to be with me that you also may be where I am" (John 14:1-3). This is a place prepared especially for all believers, and it is guaranteed by no less an authority than the Lord of glory himself, Jesus Christ.

2. A heavenly banquet. In several of his parables the Lord spoke of a heavenly banquet to which his own are invited. In one story he told of a great wedding supper to which many were invited who later refused to come, and of how the master sent to unexpected places to find guests (Matt. 22:1-14; cf. Luke 14:15-24). In another parable it is a banquet prepared for the prodigal son (Luke 15:11-32). In still another it is a wedding feast to which five wise women are admitted and five foolish women are shut out (Matt. 25:1-13).

There are similar but passing references to other occasions of shared celebration.

These stories present our inheritance as joy and secure fellowship. We have a foretaste of these things in our observance of the Lord's Supper, which looks forward to the coming great marriage supper of the Lamb.

3. Rule with Christ. Another feature of our inheritance is that we will rule with Jesus in his kingdom. There is some difference among Bible scholars as to whether this refers to an earthly rule with Christ in some future age or to a heavenly rule only. But whatever its full meaning, there is no doubt that some important ruling authority is promised. Paul told Timothy, "If we endure, we will also reign with him" (2 Tim. 2:12). In one of his parables, Jesus spoke of servants who had shown their faithfulness during their master's absence being awarded cities over which to reign in the master's kingdom (Luke 19:11-27).

4. Likeness to Christ. One of the promised blessings, which means a great deal to me, is that we will be made like Jesus himself. John writes about it in his first letter, using language similar to Paul's in Romans 8. "Dear friends, now we are children of God, and what we will be has not been made known. But we know that when he appears, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is" (1 John 3:1-2). It is hard to imagine a greater inheritance than to be made like the Lord Jesus Christ in all his attributes.

The Lord, Our Portion

In view of the magnitude of those last four items, why did I call them "lesser"? Because of the amazing and infinitely greater blessing that awaits us as "heirs of God."

Let me begin by reminding you of a grammatical distinction, namely that there are two kinds of genitives in most languages. One genitive is what grammarians call a subjective genitive, the other is what they call an objective genitive. Here are examples: "the love of money" and "the value of money." In each case the words "of money" are the genitive, having to do with possession. In the first phrase, "money" is the object, since it is the thing loved. The person involved has a love for money. In the second phrase, "of money" is still the genitive, but here it is the subject. The phrase does not refer to an individual who values money. It speaks of "money's value," value that money possesses.

Now take another phrase: "love of God." Is that a subjective genitive or an objective genitive? That answer is that, in this case, it can be either. If God is the subject, the phrase refers to God's love for us. If God is the object, it means that we have a love for God. Since the words can have either meaning, the interpretation has to be determined by the context.

With that distinction in mind, let's come back to our text to the phrase "heirs of God." Is this a subjective or an objective genitive? Again, it could be either. If it is a subjective genitive, then God is the subject and the meaning is that we belong to God as God's heirs. He has fixed his love upon us and made us his heirs by grace. If it is an objective genitive, then the meaning is that we have God as our inheritance. This is the boldest of the two possibilities, but it is what I am convinced Paul is saying here.

Here are my reasons.

First, this is taught in the Old Testament, which Paul certainly knew and from which he often borrowed. It is true that the Old Testament often speaks of the land of promise as the people's inheritance. This was a literal, earthly inheritance, though it was connected with God's greater promises to the patriarchs and their descendants. The important thing, however, is that it is transcended by passages that speak of God himself as their inheritance. Psalm 73:25-26, for instance, says:

> Whom have I in heaven but you?
> And earth has nothing I desire besides you.
> My flesh and my heart may fail, > but God is the strength > of my heart and my portion forever.

Or Lamentations 3:24, "I say to myself, 'The LORD is my portion; therefore I will wait for him.'"

This greater reality was kept before the people in an interesting way in regard to the inheritance of the tribe of Levi, an inheritance given to them when the people invaded Canaan to possess it in the days of Joshua. You will recall that the land was divided tribe by tribe, along the lines specified by Moses even before the conquest. Each got its predetermined portion: Reuben, half tribe of Manasseh, Gad, Judah, Ephraim, the other half tribe of Manasseh, and all the others. Except Levi! Levi was the tribe of priests. They were scattered throughout the land in the fortyeight priestly towns, from which they were to serve the whole people in God's name. They had no inheritance because, as it was said of them, "the God of Israel, is their inheritance, as he promised them" (Josh. 13:33).

In the case of Israel, the land was certainly a good thing, promised from the time of Abraham. But the truly great inheritance was God himself. The purpose of scattering the Levites was to remind them of it.

Second, Romans 8:17 speaks of our being "co-heirs with Christ." That is, we inherit whatever we do inherit along with him. But as soon as we ask, "What does Jesus inherit?" all the items I mentioned earlier do not seem to fit. Jesus does not inherit heaven or a home in heaven; he has gone there to prepare a place for us. He does not actually inherit a kingdom over which he is to rule, though we can sometimes think of it like that; rather, he is already the ruler, the sovereign God. Similarly, neither the heavenly banquet nor his own character can rightly be said to be something willed to him or passed on to him by God.

What is Jesus' inheritance, then? The only thing that can properly be said to be his inheritance is the Father. This is what he had in mind in his great prayer just before his crucifixion. He prayed, "I have brought you glory on earth by completing the work you gave me to do. And now, Father, glorify me in your presence with the glory I had with you before the world began" (John 17:4-5).

Christ's inheritance is the glory of God, which means the vision of, participation in, and enjoyment of God himself. This is exactly the flow of the thought in Romans 8:17. For having spoken of our being heirs and having reminded us that we must enter into our possession by the gate of suffering, Paul ends up again with glory, reminding us that "we may also share in his [Christ's] glory," which is the glory of God.

Third, elsewhere in his writings, although not here, Paul speaks of the Holy Spirit who is given to us as the "earnest" (or "deposit") guaranteeing our inheritance (Eph. 1:14; cf. 2 Cor. 1:22, 5:5). An earnest is a pledge of something greater, but it is more than a mere document, bill of sale, or contract. It is a part of what is actually to come later. For example, when we buy a house we usually guarantee our intent to purchase it by making a prepayment of a small amount, a cash pledge of the greater amount to come. So, if the earnest of our inheritance is the Holy Spirit and the Holy Spirit is God—as he is, being the third person of the Trinity—then the full inheritance must be God himself.

Robert Haldane, who often writes brilliantly on the deepest subjects, says at this point, "God is the portion of his people, and in him, who is 'the possessor of heaven and earth,' they are heirs of all things.... God is all-sufficient, and this is an all-sufficient inheritance. God is eternal and unchangeable, and therefore it is an eternal inheritance—an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled and that fadeth not away.... It is God himself, then, who is the inheritance of his children.... He communicates himself to them by his grace, his light, his holiness, his life."

If God is our inheritance, we can be assured of salvation, since nothing is going to move God. Nothing is ever going to dispossess us of our heavenly inheritance.

Looking Forward

All of this would be mere pie-in-the-sky if it did not have a practical effect on us, however. Yet that is precisely what it does have, if we truly believe this and are thinking this way.

Consider Abraham. The history of God's acts of redemption begins with Abraham when God called him out of his own country and sent him into a new land that he would show him, promising, "I will bless you... and all peoples on earth will be blessed through you" (Gen. 12:23). This calling contained the promise of a land, but it was far more than that. By promising a blessing to the nations through Abraham, God was also promising the Redeemer who was to come through his offspring. That promise was amplified throughout Abraham's long life, and it was this upon which Abraham's faith and hope fixed. This is why, when the author of Hebrews came to praise Abraham for his faith in the great chapter on the heroes of the faith (chap. 11), he says of Abraham, "By faith he made his home in the promised land like a stranger in a foreign country; he lived in tents, as did Isaac and Jacob, who were heirs with him of the same promise. For he was looking forward to the city with foundations, whose architect and builder is God" (Heb. 11:9-10).

"Heirs" of the promise? Yes, but the promise was not earthly. It was a promise of great spiritual blessing to be fulfilled ultimately in heaven.

It is the same with all the other heroes of the faith in this chapter. This is the point of Hebrews 11.

"By faith Abel offered God a better sacrifice than Cain did," and God accounted him to be "a righteous man" (v. 4). Abel received no earthly inheritance. He was murdered for his righteous stand. But he received a reward in heaven.

Enoch was a preacher. He preached of judgment before the great flood, warning the ungodly of his day to repent and flee from sin to God. He preached for three hundred years, but he had no reward here. He was utterly unsuccessful. No one was converted, and when the time for the flood came the only ones who were saved were Noah, his wife, and their immediate family. Enoch pleased no one on earth. But he has this testimony: "he was commended as one who pleased God" (v. 5b).

What did Noah inherit? Everything he had was swept away by the flood. Yet the writer says of him, "By his faith he condemned the world and became heir of the righteousness that comes by faith" (v. 7b).

Isaac and Jacob lived with Abraham in tents, having no real inheritance here. But they looked to the future and hoped for that (vv. 20-21), though they sometimes did it badly.

Joseph lost his home and his freedom for righteousness' sake. And even though God later advanced him and made him second in power only to Pharaoh of Egypt, Joseph's hopes were not there. He hoped in God's promise, in proof of which he gave instructions that his body was not to be buried in one of the Egyptian tombs but was to be carried from Egypt to Canaan when God eventually led the people out of slavery (v. 22; cf. Gen. 50:24-25).

Moses had no love for earth's treasures. He sought no earthly reward. Rather, he turned his back on the riches of Egypt, regarding "disgrace for the sake of Christ as of greater value than the treasures of Egypt, because he was looking ahead to his reward" (v. 26).

It was the same with all the Old Testament believers: Rahab, Gideon, Barak, Samson, Jephthah, David, Samuel, and the prophets. Such heroes of faith "were tortured and refused to be released, so that they might gain a better resurrection. Some faced jeers and flogging, while still others were chained and put in prison. They were stoned; they were sawed in two; they were put to death by the sword.... They wandered in deserts and mountains, and in caves and holes in the ground. These were all commended for their faith, yet none of them received what had been promised" (vv. 35-39, emphasis added).

Not then! But they have received it now. They have gone before us to take possession of the inheritance prepared in heaven for God's saints.

"Joy Hereafter"

Why should we expect it to be any different for us? It will not be. So why, when all Scripture teaches that our inheritance is in heaven and not on earth, should we spend so much effort trying to amass our fortunes here? Or why should we expect our lives to proceed along a gentle primrose path, when others gained heaven only by a sail through bloody seas?

I recently came across some wonderful words by Charles Haddon Spurgeon. They were written for preachers to encourage them to keep on in tough times, but the message is equally good for anyone. It goes like this:

Be not surprised when friends fail you: it is a failing world.

Never count upon immutability in man: inconstancy you may reckon upon without fear of disappointment. The disciples of Jesus forsook him; be not amazed if your adherents wander away to other teachers: as they were not your all when with you, all is not gone from you with their departure.

Serve God with all your might while the candle is burning, and then when it goes out for a season, you will have the less to regret.

Be content to be nothing, for that is what you are. When your own emptiness is painfully forced upon your consciousness, chide yourself that you ever dreamed of being full, except in the Lord.

Set small store by present rewards; be grateful for earnests by the way, but look for recompensing joy hereafter.

Continue with double earnestness to serve your Lord when no visible result is before you. Any simpleton can follow the narrow path in the light: faith's rare wisdom enables us to march on in the dark with infallible accuracy, since she places her hand in that of her Great Guide.

Between this and heaven there may be rougher weather yet, but it is all provided for by our covenant Head. In nothing let us be turned aside from the path which the divine call has urged us to pursue. Come fair or come foul, the pulpit is our watch-tower, and the ministry our warfare; be it ours, when we cannot see the face of our God, to trust under the shadow of his wings.

Chapter 103.
Suffering: The Path to Glory

Romans 8:17

I do not think it was very good exegesis, but it was intriguing. A number of years ago a churchgoer asked a minister the meaning of the word reproof in 2 Timothy 3:16 ("All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness," KJV). The minister replied this way: "It means proof of doctrine, and then proof and proof again—re-proof." As I say, I do not think that is correct. I think the New International Version is right when it translates the Greek word elegmos as "rebuking." Still there is something to be said for "re-proofing." In fact, it is what we have in Romans 8:14-17.

Several studies back, when we were in the midst of this section (at v. 15), I pointed out that verses 14-17 contain four proofs of our being sons and daughters of God, if the Holy Spirit has indeed brought us into God's family. First, we are led by God's Spirit. This refers to our conduct. If we are following after Christ in true and obedient discipleship, then we are Christ's and can be assured of salvation. Second, we have the internal witness of our spirits by which we cry "Abba, Father." We know that we have a new family relationship to God. Third, the Holy Spirit witnesses to us. I described this as an overwhelming sense of God's presence, something most Christians have experienced, though they may not understand it or know how to describe it. Fourth, we participate in Christ's sufferings.

These items are certainly proof and reproof, being four good reasons why a child of God can know that he or she really does belong to God and that nothing in heaven or earth will ever snatch him or her away from God's love or break the family relationship.

The Problem of Suffering

But why should Paul introduce the idea of suffering, of all things—and at this point? None of us would do it. If we were trying to assure Christians that they really are Christians and their salvation is secure, suffering is probably the last thing we would mention. We think of it in the "problem" category. Hugh Evan Hopkins wrote a book called The Mystery of Suffering. C. S.
Lewis called his book The Problem of Pain. Most of us are probably closest to Rabbi Harold S.

Kushner's approach when he titled his problem-solving book When Bad Things Happen to Good People.

We Christians acknowledge the problem of suffering and sometimes wrestle with it. But few of us would think of presenting it as a proof that the suffering person is a true child of God. It would seem to be the other way around. So why does Paul drag the subject in here?

The first reason, surely, is that he was a realist. More than that, as an evangelist and a pastor, he knew that the people to whom he was writing were suffering. The early ministers of the gospel began to suffer for the gospel as soon as they began to obey Christ's Great Commission. Peter and John were jailed. Stephen was killed. Paul himself was imprisoned, beaten, shipwrecked, starved, threatened, and exposed to the elements. And what was true of these early preachers soon became true of their followers as well. They were ridiculed, hated, abused, and eventually martyred for their faith in great numbers. In addition, they endured the many disappointments, deaths, deprivations, and disasters common to all human life in a fallen and extremely sinful world.

Read the New Testament with suffering in mind and you will be startled to discover how extensively it is mentioned. Jesus said, "In this world you will have trouble" (John 16:33b). Most of the New Testament epistles have important discussions about suffering.

Suffering is as common to God's people today as in New Testament times. We need to understand that. It is true that most of us do not experience that special kind of suffering we call persecution, though our brothers and sisters in other parts of the world do. But we all know suffering. We suffer when we lose a husband or wife or other family member through death. We grieve when life itself or our friends or children disappoint us. We groan under pain, trauma, and sickness. We are hurt by prejudice, poverty, or sometimes a lack of rewarding work. The list is endless. Realism and pastoral concern undoubtedly caused the apostle to introduce this subject. Honesty did not allow him to talk about our inheritance without at the same time acknowledging that the path to glory involves a cross.

A second reason Paul probably introduced the subject is that he must have been aware of the many non-Christian approaches to suffering that were around. They were around then, and they are around today. His words, though quite brief, correct the following non-Christian approaches.

1. Anger. One response to suffering is anger. This is common with unbelievers, who blame or even curse God for their misfortunes. But it is also sadly true of some Christians. They blame God because he has not done something for them that they wanted—given them a loving spouse, for example—forgetting that Jesus has not promised us an easy life here, much less the fulfillment of our desires. He has called us to discipleship. The glory is hereafter.

2. Avoidance. A second approach is avoidance. If the path before them looks hard or even undesirable, some people turn from it and try to find something easier or more rewarding. Or, if the path cannot be avoided, they try to balance it with other things that are more attractive. The ancient name for this approach is hedonism. The Christian form of it is to ask God to remove the undesirable thing—sickness, for example, particularly a terminal illness. Christians who take this approach think the correct way is to ask God to remove the sickness so that afterward they might praise him for the healing. Of course, it sometimes is God's will to heal, so it is not wrong to ask for healing. But this is not the most profound or uniquely Christian approach to suffering.

A special form of this approach is used in some types of counseling. There the bottom line seems to be the individual's personal happiness or fulfillment. People are advised to do whatever makes them happy or "feels good," which ignores the truth that real growth comes by working through our hardships rather than by avoiding them.

3. Apathy. The third non-Christian approach is apathy, detachment from the problem. It is the attitude that says, "It just doesn't matter," and then tries to think about something else. One form of apathy is stoicism, the philosophy of the stiff upper lip. Stoicism may help you get by, but it is joyless and far removed from Christianity.

Paul was surrounded by these non-Christian philosophies, just as we are today, which is why I suggested that a second reason he introduced the subject of suffering at this point was to counter them. For our part, we need to know that these approaches are all less than truly Christian and come to understand suffering in a different light. We need to know that, for the Christian, suffering is the arena in which we are to prove the reality of our profession and achieve spiritual victories.

In the title of the fifth volume of my studies of John's Gospel, I called the Christian approach "Triumph Through Tragedy." Of course, the key word is "through." We do not triumph by avoiding hardships.

Proof of Sonship

This brings us to the value of suffering according to a right theological framework or life-view. It has several important values, and the first is the chief reason Paul mentions it in Romans: He has been talking of Christians being sons and daughters of God; now he speaks of suffering as proof of that relationship, though the suffering may be in any of three different forms, each with a particular purpose.

1. Persecution. Some suffering is in the form of persecution, as I suggested earlier, and one value of persecution is that it proves to us that we really are children of God. Jesus taught this many times. In the Sermon on the Mount, near the beginning of his ministry, he said, "Blessed are you when people insult you, persecute you and > falsely say all kinds of evil against you because of me. Rejoice and be glad, because great is your reward in heaven, for in the same way they persecuted the prophets who were before you" (Matt. 5:11-12). Again, in the Upper Room near the close of his ministry, he said, "If the world hates you, keep in mind that it hated me first. If you belonged to the world, it would love you as its own. As it is, you do not belong to the world, but I have chosen you out of the world. That is why the world hates you. Remember the words I spoke to you: 'No servant is greater than his master.' If they persecuted me, they will persecute you also..." (John 15:18-20).

There are two points here. First, Jesus suffered. Suffering was his lot, and it has always been the lot of God's godly people. It must be that way since they were (and are) living in a sinful world. Second, suffering proves that we are on the side of Jesus and these godly people, for if we were not, the world would approve of us rather than being hostile.

Jonathan Chao, president of Christ's College, Taipei, and director of the Chinese Church Research Center in Hong Kong, has studied suffering in the context of the suffering of the church in China. He says, "One can almost say that suffering for Christ is a mark of discipleship." D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones, who explores this line of thought extensively in his study of Romans 8:17, says, "If you are suffering as a Christian, and because you are a Christian, it is one of the surest proofs you can ever have of the fact that you are a child of God." That is an important use of persecution. It proves that we are Christians and therefore disciples for Christ.

2. Purification. Not all suffering is in the form of persecution, however. Some of it is from God and is for no other reason than to produce growth and holiness. This is what the author of Hebrews was talking about when he wrote in reference to Jesus, "In bringing many sons to glory, it was fitting that God, for whom and through whom everything exists, should make the author of their salvation perfect through suffering" (Heb. 2:10).

That is a bold thing to say, of course, for it suggests that in some way Jesus was not perfect, which causes us to think immediately, though incorrectly, of some moral imperfection. We would be wrong to think that, since Jesus was utterly without sin. He was morally impeccable. Nevertheless, as Luke says, his life in the flesh included growth "in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man" (Luke 2:52). Perfection means wholeness, and Jesus grew into a wholeness of experience and trust in God through such things as poverty, temptation, misunderstanding, loneliness, abuse, and betrayal. God used these and many other experiences to "perfect" him. He also uses them to perfect us.

We are sinners, of course. So one image the Bible uses in speaking of this similar work in us is the refining of precious metal (Zech. 13:9; Mal. 3:3). It pictures God as a skilled refiner, heating the ore until the dross that has been mixed with it rises to the surface, where it may be scraped off. The refiner knows the metal is ready when he can see his face reflected in the glimmering molten surface. In the same way, God purifies us until he can see the face of Jesus Christ in his people.

One of our hymns puts it nicely:

> When through fiery trials thy pathway shall lie,
> My grace all-sufficient shall be thy supply;
> The flame shall not hurt thee, I > only design Thy dross to > consume and thy gold to > refine.

Another image of the Christian's suffering is of God disciplining us as an earthly father disciplines his children. The author of Hebrews writes of this, too, saying, "Endure hardship as discipline; God is treating you as sons. For what son is not disciplined by his father? If you are not disciplined (and everyone undergoes discipline), then you are illegitimate children and not true sons.... Our fathers disciplined us for a little while as they thought best; but God disciplines us for our good, that we may share in his holiness. No discipline seems pleasant at the time, but painful. Later on, however, it produces a harvest of righteousness and peace for those who have been trained by it" (Heb. 12:7-8, 10-11).

3. Training. A third kind of suffering also has value for Christians and can be likened to the suffering endured when a soldier is trained for combat by his commanding officer or, for that matter, the suffering endured in the battle itself. Paul wrote to Timothy, "Endure hardness with us like a good soldier of Christ Jesus" (2 Tim. 2:3). Elsewhere he changes the image and speaks of the rigorous preparation of an athlete: "I beat my body and make it my slave so that after I have preached to others, I myself will not be disqualified for the prize" (1 Cor. 9:27).

If you are called to endure any of these three kinds of suffering, you should be encouraged by them because they prove that you are a child of God and are being prepared to be used by him in the spiritual warfare that will lead to final victory.

The Power of the Christian's Witness

A second value of suffering is that our witness to Christ is empowered by it. I do not mean that we grow stronger in our ability to witness to Christ to the extent that we are called to endure persecution or some other form of suffering, though that is undoubtedly true. The blind man of John 9 grew stronger in his witness every time the religious authorities leaned on him to get him to modify his testimony. I mean, rather, that the witness of Christians carries particular weight when it is given under duress, when it is evident to everyone that it would be easier and apparently more rational to back off from one's witness or even, as Job was advised by his wife, to "curse God and die!" (Job 2:9).

Physical suffering gives particular clout to the witness of Christians. It means something special when a person can testify to God's grace when he or she is suffering from acute bodily pain or while dying. It is even more convincing when Christians bear witness to Jesus when they might suffer the loss of all things for it.

I previously mentioned Jonathan Chao and his insights into Christian suffering. He has studied the suffering church in China and reports many instances of this empowerment. One young Chinese pastor was imprisoned in 1960 and released in 1979. When he was released he discovered that during that nineteen-year period his parish had grown from 300 to 5,000 professing Christians. Today that same community has grown to 20,000.

In 1982 a Christian community in central China dispatched a missionary team in response to a Macedonian-type cry for help from another area. In a month of intense work they had established several new churches. But then most of the senior pastors were arrested. They were imprisoned for four years. However, their arrest forced the younger pastors to take over the leadership positions, and as a result not only were the home churches cared for, but the mission expanded and the growth in that area was phenomenal. People were persuaded to believe on Christ by the quality and duration of their leaders' suffering.

A fourteen-year-old girl understood this. She was one of nine young evangelists who were arrested by the local police and forced to remain kneeling in one place day and night. On the third day of this torture she fainted and was released. The others were made to suffer the same continuing torment for nine days and eight nights. Eventually they, too, were released, and when they were reunited the fourteen-year-old began to cry. "Why are you crying?" they asked.

She replied that she was crying because they had been called on to suffer for nine days while she had only been called on to suffer for three. Fourteen years old! But she understood the point of suffering for the sake of Jesus Christ and counted it not a burden but a privilege.

Is it any wonder that the church in China is growing at a tremendous rate today while the church in America is barely holding its own in numbers and is declining markedly in devotion and character? Most of us want only the good life, not godliness. And our fourteen-year-olds think they are suffering if they have to turn off their personal TV and do their homework.

The Path to Glory

The final thing we need to say about the value of suffering is that it is the ordained path to glory. Paul says this explicitly in Romans 8:17: "... we share in his sufferings in order that we may also share in his glory." He also says this elsewhere. In 2 Corinthians 4:17-18 he writes joyfully, "For our light and momentary troubles are achieving for us an eternal glory that far outweighs them all. So we fix our eyes not on what is seen, but on what is unseen. For what is seen is temporary, but what is unseen is eternal."

There are two basic things to remember about suffering.

First, suffering is necessary. Jesus taught that it was necessary for himself when he said to the Emmaus disciples, "Did not the Christ have to suffer these things and then enter his glory?" (Luke 24:26). Then he proved that this was necessary by showing it to them in the Scriptures, beginning with Moses and all the prophets. Jesus taught that suffering is necessary for us when he said, "If they persecuted me, they will persecute you also" (John 15:20b) and "In the world ye shall have tribulation" (John 16:33a, KJV).

Second, although suffering is necessary (and has value), suffering is not the end of the story for Christians. Glory is! If suffering were the end, Christianity would be a form of masochism, suffering for suffering's sake. Since it is not the end, since suffering is the path to glory, Christianity is a religion of genuine hope and effective consolation.

The Christian who needs to worry about suffering is not the one who is suffering, particularly if it is for the sake of Jesus Christ. The person who should worry is the one who is not suffering, since suffering is a proof of our sonship, a means for the spread of the gospel, and the path to glory.

So let's hang in there! And let's encourage one another as we run the race and fight the long battles.

We need each other, but we have each other. That is what we are given to each other for. Thus, by the grace of God, we may actually come to the end of the warfare and be able to say as Paul did to his young protege Timothy, "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith. Now there is in store for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will award to me on that day—and not only to me, but also to all who have longed for his appearing" (2 Tim. 4:7-8). May it be so for all God's people.

Chapter 104.
The Incomparable Glory

Romans 8:18

There are times in every preacher's work when, if he takes the task of teaching the Bible seriously, he comes to themes that he knows are beyond him. In one sense everything in the Bible is beyond us. The Bible contains God's thoughts, and none of us is ever fully able to encompass the mind of the Infinite. Nevertheless, there are teachings that we do basically understand—because God has revealed them to us. Not so with every idea in the Bible. From time to time, we come to thoughts that we know we shall never fully understand, at least not until we get to heaven.

Glory is one of them. I call it "incomparable," not only because it resists comparison with anything we know in this life, particularly suffering, which is the contrast found in our text, but because glory is truly beyond our comprehension. At best we have only an intimation of it.

Glory is the word best used to describe God's magnificence and therefore also the dazzling magnificence of heaven and our share in it. But when we look for descriptions of heaven in the Bible, in most cases the descriptions have a negative cast only. They tell us what heaven will not contain. The best description of heaven in the Bible is probably that of the New Jerusalem in Revelation 21. But think how the New Jerusalem is portrayed by the "loud voice from the throne"—"Now the dwelling of God is with men, and he will live with them. They will be his people, and God himself will be with them and will be their God. He will wipe every tear from their eyes. There will be no more death or mourning or crying or pain, for the old order of things has passed away" (Rev. 20:3-4). That God will dwell with us is positive. But the strength of the description is in the words: no tears, no pain, no death, no mourning! These are all negative ideas, no doubt because we cannot fully comprehend the positive things but can understand the removal of that which troubles our lives now.

And yet, the greatest word for what is in store for God's people is glory. Our text says, "I consider that our present sufferings are not worth comparing with the glory that will be revealed in us."

What Is Glory?

What is this "glory"? I find definitions of glory in the various commentaries, since incomprehensibility has never kept true scholars from defining anything. But the definitions seem inadequate to me. I want to suggest that in the case of the word glory we will make far better progress with the thinking of someone whose forte is literature, particularly poetry, rather than biblical scholarship. For that reason, I suggest an essay on glory by C. S. Lewis.

In the summer of 1941, Lewis was asked to give an evening sermon at the Oxford University Church of Saint Mary, and he responded by preparing the piece to which I refer. It was called "The Weight of Glory." Lewis, one of the greatest Christian apologists of the twentieth century, began by referring to a longing all human beings have for something that can hardly be expressed. He called it "a desire which no natural happiness will satisfy," and he found it in our wish to be approved by God. He argued that the biblical word for expressing this wish is glory.

At first, the idea of seeking divine approval seems to be unworthy, as it also did to Lewis when he began his study. But he said that he came to see that it is not unworthy at all but, on the contrary, expresses a natural and desirable order of things. A child wants approval from his parents and is right to want it. Creatures should want approval from their Creator. We are God's creatures, and we do. But the problem is that we behave in a way that destroys the possibility of that approval, unless God intervenes to save and transform us, which he does in Jesus Christ. One day we will appear before God for judgment. What will happen to us on that day? Lewis asked his listeners. He answered, "We can be left utterly and absolutely outside—repelled, exiled, estranged, finally and unspeakably ignored. On the other hand, we can be called in, welcomed, received, acknowledged. We walk every day on the razor edge between these two incredible possibilities."

But there is more to glory even than this. Glory denotes not only "worth," "acceptance," or "approval." It also denotes "brightness," "splendor," and "luminosity," perhaps even "beauty." And we long for all that, too! In fact, we long not only to see what is beautiful. We want to participate in it, to be on the inside of this divine, heavenly beauty, rather than on the outside. In my judgment, it is here that Lewis, the poet, is at his best:

We are to shine as the sun, we are to be given the Morning Star. I think I begin to see what it means. In one way, of course, God has given us the Morning Star already; you can go and enjoy the gift on many fine mornings, if you get up early enough. What more, you may ask, do we want? Ah, but we want so much more—something the books on aesthetics take little notice of. But the poets and mythologies know all about it. We do not want merely to see beauty, though, God knows, even that is bounty enough. We want something else which can hardly be put into words—to be united with the beauty we see, to pass into it, to receive it into ourselves, to bathe in it, to become part of it....

That is why the poets tell us such lovely falsehoods. They talk as if the west wind could really sweep into a human soul; but it can't. They tell us that "beauty born of murmuring sound" will pass into a human face; but it won't. Or not yet. For if we take the imagery of Scripture seriously, if we believe that God will one day give us the Morning Star and cause us to put on the splendor of the sun, then we may surmise that both the ancient myths and modern poetry, so false as history, may be very near the truth as prophecy.

At present we are on the outside of the world, the wrong side of the door. We discern the freshness and purity of the morning, but they do not make us fresh and pure. We cannot mingle with the splendors we see. But the leaves of the New Testament are rustling with the rumor that it will not always be so. Some day, God willing, we shall get in. When human souls have become as perfect in voluntary obedience as the inanimate creation is in its lifeless obedience, then they will put on its glory, or rather that greater glory of which Nature is only the first sketch.

Do we understand the meaning of glory now? No, I do not think we do, at least not fully. But we have a framework with which we can address the biblical teaching and uncover the specific contribution of our text.

Ichabod

The first thing the Bible adds to our understanding is that we long for glory because we once enjoyed it. I do not mean that individually we did. We did not exist prior to our births. I mean that we enjoyed glory once as a race—in Adam. Adam was made "in the image of God" (Gen. 1:26-27), which means, as D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones says, "that man at the beginning had a kind of glory." He was like God, and he may even have been clothed with the splendor of God like a garment, as one commentator has suggested.

But man today is a disgrace compared to what he once was. He is a fallen being and well described by the biblical name "Ichabod," meaning "no glory" because "the glory [had] departed from Israel" (1 Sam. 4:21). As far as man is concerned, the glory has departed from his body, his soul, and his spirit.

Man was once a beautiful physical specimen. The man Adam and the woman Eve were the glory of creation. They excelled the rest of the created order in every respect. But when they sinned, physical decay, sickness, suffering, and eventually physical death came upon them. God said, "Dust you are and to dust you will return" (Gen. 3:19b). They were not originally destined to die, but die they did. Man was also beautiful in soul, the most beautiful of all the creatures. He had a nobility that transcends our ability to fathom. But once Adam and Eve sinned, that beautiful soul was tarnished. Now they began to lie and cheat and shift the blame from their own failings to those of others. Most significant was the ruination of their spirits. The spirit was that part of Adam and Eve that had communion with God. They had walked and talked with God in the garden. But once they fell, they no longer sought God out. They hid from him, and the encounter that eventually came was a judgment.

We enjoyed glory once, which is why we long for it so much. But it is gone, gone with the wind. What a marvelous thing it is then, when we turn to the Bible, to find that the end of our salvation in Christ is not merely deliverance from sin and evil and their consequences, but glorification. God is restoring to us all that our first parents lost.

More Than Adam Lost

This is what Paul is beginning to deal with here in Romans, which brings us to our text. But as soon as we turn to that text and try to place it in its context, we notice that something greater even than the restoration of Adam and Eve's lost glory is involved. As we read on in Romans 8 we find that we are to have an enjoyment of God and a participation in God that surpasses Adam's.

Martyn Lloyd-Jones says,

Adam was perfect man, but his perfection fell short of glorification. There was room for development, and it is clear that glorification was the ultimate that was intended for man. As man he was perfect; there was no blemish in him, there was no sin in him; there was no fault in him. He was in a state of innocence, but innocence falls short of glorification. But what is held before us and offered to us in Christ, and promised us in him, is nothing less than glorification. The thing to which man, if he had continued to keep God's commandments, would have arrived, and which would have been given to him as a reward for his obedience, is the thing that is now freely given us in and through our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

Weighed in the Balance

All this brings me directly to the text. For in Romans 8:18 Paul is comparing the future glory to be enjoyed by God's people to their present sufferings, but saying that the glory far outstrips their suffering. That is obvious, isn't it? For if the glory we are to enjoy is to exceed even that minimal glory enjoyed by Adam, it is certain that it will exceed the trials we are enduring now.

Paul introduces an interesting though somewhat hidden image at this point in the verbal adjective translated "not worth comparing." It is the Greek word axiōs, from the verb agō, which means "to drive," "lead," or "cause to move." Figuratively used, it refers to something that is heavy enough to promote motion in a balance or, as we would say, to tip the scales. When we remember that the word glory itself denotes something that is weighty or has substance, it is clear what Paul is suggesting. He is saying that the future glory laid up for us is so weighty that our present sufferings are as feathers compared to it and that they cannot even begin to move the scales.

Paul provides a parallel to our text in 2 Corinthians 4:16-17, following a poignant mention of the many persecutions and sufferings he had endured for the sake of Christ. He says, "Therefore we do not lose heart. Though outwardly we are wasting away, yet inwardly we are being renewed day by day. For our light and momentary troubles are achieving for us an eternal glory that far outweighs them all" (emphasis added).

These two passages suggest several areas of comparison between our present sufferings and the glory that is to come.

1. Their intensity. The first area of comparison is between the intensity of the suffering and the intensity of the glory or, as we have been saying, between the "weight" of the two. Suffering is heavy. It hurts. It can hurt so intensely that we scream with terror or cry out with pain. But, says Paul, the intensity of our sufferings is not worth comparing with the glory. And he should know.

Paul suffered as much as any man has suffered, judging from his descriptions in 1 Corinthians 4:9-13; 2 Corinthians 4:8-12; 6:4-10; and 11:16-33. But he also had a vision of heaven's glory, having been "caught up to the third heaven" (2 Cor. 12:2). In his opinion the intensity of the former is not to be compared to the grandeur of the latter.

2. Their location. The second area of comparison is between the location of our sufferings and the location of our glory. That is an awkward way of putting it, of course, but it is hard to think of something better. In Romans 8:18 Paul says that the glory of God is to be revealed "in us," using a word that literally means "internally" or "in our very being." This should be contrasted with the words "though outwardly we are wasting away," which he uses in the parallel text in 2 Corinthians.

The idea seems to be this: Suffering, though felt deeply, nevertheless only affects our outward persons, our bodies. It does not affect the real "us," those redeemed beings that, says Paul, are "being renewed day by day." It is that "real me," the inner me, that is going to participate in the glory. In other words, it is as C. S. Lewis said. We are not just going to observe the beauty; we are going to share in it: "God will one day give us the Morning Star and cause us to put on the splendor of the sun.... Some day, God willing, we shall get in." The endurance of outward suffering is not to be compared to our participation in this glory.

3. Their duration. The final point of contrast between suffering and glory concerns their duration. In Romans Paul distinguishes between "present sufferings," which means those belonging to this present age, and the glory "that will be revealed," meaning the unchanging and eternal glory of the age to come. In 2 Corinthians he calls the sufferings "momentary" and glory "eternal." You and I do not think much about eternity. But if we can make ourselves think this way, it is evident that there is no comparison between the glory of the eternal state and the sufferings of this passing earthly time, however painful our sufferings may be while we are going through them.

Breaking the Spell

I want to say finally that if we can appreciate what Paul is saying in this text and get it fixed in our minds, we will find it able to change the way we look at life and the way we live—more than anything else we can imagine. It will provide two things at least.

1. Vision. Focusing on the promise of glory will give us a vision of life in its eternal context, which means that we will begin to see life here as it really is. We have two problems at this point. First, we are limited by our concept of time. We think in terms of the "threescore years and ten" allotted to us, or at best the few years that have led up to our earthly existence or the few years after it. We do not have a long view. Second, we are limited by our materialism. Our reference point is what we perceive through our senses, so we have the greatest possible difficulty thinking of "the spirit" and other intangibles. We need to be delivered from this bondage and awakened from our spiritual blindness.

In "The Weight of Glory" Lewis addressed the objection of those who might consider his talk about glory as only fantasy, the weaving of a spell. He replied by admitting that perhaps that is what he was trying to do. But he reminded his listeners that spells in fairy tales are of two kinds. Some induce enchantments. Others break them. "You and I have need of the strongest spell that can be found to wake us from the evil enchantment of worldliness which has been laid upon us for nearly a hundred years." That is not the way I would say it. I would speak of truth as opposed to this world's falsehood. But it is probably the same thing. Both mean that we need to emerge from our darkness into God's light.

2. Endurance. "Breaking the spell" will give us strength to endure whatever hardships, temptations, persecutions, or physical suffering it pleases God to send us. Suppose there were no glory. Suppose this life really were all there is. If that were the case, I for one would not endure anything, at least nothing I could avoid. And I would probably break down under the tribulations I could not avoid. But knowing that there is an eternal weight of glory waiting, I will try to do what pleases God and hang on in spite of anything. Here is the way hymnwriter Henry F. Lyte expressed it:

Jesus, I my cross have taken,
All to leave and follow thee;
Destitute, despised, forsaken,
Thou from hence my all shalt be.
Perish every fond ambition,
All I've sought or hoped or known;
Yet how rich is my condition,
God and heaven are still my own.
Man may trouble and distress me,
'Twill but drive me to thy breast;
Life with trials hard may press me,
Heaven will bring me sweeter rest.
O 'tis not in grief to harm me
While my love is left to me;
O 'twere not in joy to charm me,
Were that joy unmixed with thee.

Haste then on from grace to glory,
Armed by faith and winged by prayer;
Heaven's eternal day's before thee,
God's own hand shall guide thee there.
Soon shall close thine earthly mission;

Swift shall pass thy pilgrim days;
Hope soon change to glad fruition,
Faith to sight, and prayer to praise.

There is one more word in Romans 8:18 that we need to examine. It is the word consider (or "reckon" in KJV). We have seen it fifteen times in this epistle, noting that it has to do with reason. It is the process by which we figure something out. I stress it because, although I referred to the idea of "breaking a spell," I do not want you to suppose that there is anything magical about this. Magic is for fairy tales. But we are dealing with God's real world, and we are instructed to think this out clearly.

Paul writes, "I consider that..." meaning that he has thought it through and concluded that "the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us" (KJV). By using this word he invites us to think it through also.

If you are a Christian, I ask, "Isn't what the apostle says in this verse true? Isn't the glory to come worth anything you might be asked to face here, however painful or distressing?" D. Martin Lloyd-Jones challenged his congregation with these words: "The great reality is the glory that is coming.... Hold on to this idea, that we do not really belong to this present age, that 'our citizenship is in heaven.' This present world is passing, transient, temporary. 'The world to come' is the real, the permanent world. That is the one that has substance and which will endure forever."

If you know that you are part of heaven's citizenry, you will endure—and say with the hymnwriter, "yet how rich is my condition."

Chapter 105.
The Redemption of Creation

Romans 8:19-21

At the end of our previous study I wrote about the importance of the word consider in verse 18.

It refers to a rational process by which a thinking person is able to figure something out. What Paul is thinking about is, as we would say, whether the Christian life is worth it. The Christian life is not easy. It involves rigorous self-denial, persecutions, even some sufferings. Unbelievers, worldly people, seem to have it better. Why should we, too, not live only for pleasure? What is to be gained by godliness?

As Paul considers this, it becomes perfectly evident to him why the Christian way is the only rational way—for two reasons we have already studied and for another that we are to investigate now. The first reason is the contrast between the short duration of our present sufferings and the timelessness of eternity. In verse 18 Paul uses the word present to refer to the shortness of this temporal age and does not actually mention eternity. But in the parallel text in 2 Corinthians 4:17 he contrasts our "momentary troubles" with "eternal glory," making the point explicit.

The second reason why the Christian life is "rational" lies in the contrast between the weight of our sufferings, which is light, and the weight of the glory yet to come. Paul does not deny that the earthly sufferings we experience are grievous. In 1 and 2 Corinthians he lists some of the tribulations he endured, and they were indeed heavy. But, he says, weighty as they are, "our present sufferings are not worth comparing with the glory that will be revealed in us."

Think it out, he says. Put both on a scale. If you do, you will find that our present sufferings are really inconsequential if compared with the glory to come: "Our light and momentary troubles are achieving for us an eternal glory that far outweighs them all" (2 Cor. 4:17).

The Hopeful Cosmos

The two arguments from verse 18 are alone adequate to prove Paul's point: that the Christian life is eminently worth it. But because Paul's was an extraordinary mind, he continues the argument into verse 19 and beyond. We miss this a bit in the New International Version since, in an effort to provide smooth English sentences, the translators have eliminated the conjunction "for," which actually begins the verse. You will see that word at the start of verse 20, but "for" actually begins verse 19 and verse 18 as well.

The verses literally say, "For I consider.... For the creation waits.... For the creation was subjected...." In other words, verses 18-21 are all part of a long and carefully sustained argument.

The new element at this point is "the creation" or, as we would probably say today, "the cosmos." It is important to get this reference straight, for the word creation can obviously refer to every and all things God has made: man, the angels, demons, the physical universe, animals, whatever. But is that its meaning here? A little thought will show that in these verses creation must have a restricted meaning.

John Murray does the best job of anyone in analyzing this, for he shows in his commentary that verses 20-23 clearly delimit the term. "Angels are not included because they were not subjected to vanity and to the bondage of corruption. Satan and the demons are not included because they cannot be regarded as longing for the manifestation of the sons of God and they will not share in the liberty of the glory of the children of God. The children of God themselves are not included because they are distinguished from 'the creation' (vv. 19, 21, 23).... The unbelieving of mankind cannot be included because the earnest expectation does not characterize them." In other words, "all of rational creation is excluded by the terms of verses 20-23." The only thing that is left is the "non-rational creation, animate and inanimate."

And that is just it! Paul is talking about the physical world of matter, plants, and animals. His argument is that nature is in a presently imperfect state, but that it is longing for the day of liberation. Paul is personifying nature, of course, but he does not mean that inanimate nature has personal feelings that correspond to ours. He means only that nature is not yet all that God has predestined it to be. It is waiting for its true fulfillment. But if nature is waiting, we should be willing to wait in hope, too, knowing that a glorious outcome is certain. This is the third reason why Christianity is worth it.

The Blind (Unbelieving) Observer

This view of creation is radically different from the world's, of course, and this is worth pursuing. In general the world makes either one of two errors. Either it deifies the cosmos, virtually worshiping it as an ideal. Or else it regards the cosmos as gradually evolving toward perfection, accompanied by the human race, which is also so evolving.

I am sure many of us have in mind that powerful television image of Carl Sagan on the science series "Cosmos," standing before a large screen on which there is a display of a segment of the night sky in its brilliant starry splendor and saying in nearly mystical tones, "The cosmos is all that is or ever was or ever will be." That is what I mean by deifying the cosmos. In this series Sagan is a portrait of unbelieving man, standing on the very tips of his toes, peering off into the distant and mysterious heavens as far as his telescopes will allow, and declaring with blind arrogance, "The world is all that is."

But Paul gives us a different picture, although he, too, pictures something staring off into the distance. That is the meaning of the words "waits in eager expectation." J. B. Phillips captures this idea literally when he translates "is on tiptoe to see...." But, according to Paul, it is not man who is on tiptoe looking. It is creation itself. In other words, if Carl Sagan could see as the Christian sees, he would say that the entire cosmos is actually looking beyond itself to God. And what creation is earnestly awaiting, as it looks beyond itself, is the "glorious freedom of the children of God" that it will share.

There are few images to equal this in all Scripture.

The world makes another error that is not entirely different from the first but is related to that idea. It sees in nature some kind of ongoing and automatic perfecting principle. This is almost like saying that the world is not God yet, but it is on the way. In cosmic terms this is the principle of evolution. In human terms it is the principle of inevitable perfection: "Every day in every way I am getting better and better." In other words, "I may not be God yet, but I will be, given time." Of course, a lot of time has gone by—millions of years according to L. S. B. Leakey and other evolution-ists—yet man seems to be as much unlike God as he ever was. And man's world is woefully far from perfect.

A Christian World-View

The Christian's perspective, supplied by Scripture, is at this point far more balanced and mature than anything the blind and unbelieving world can devise. The Christian doctrine of the cosmos has three parts.

1. This is God's world. Everything in our passage presupposes this, not least the fact that the cosmos is called "creation." That term presupposes a Creator, which is exactly what the Christian maintains is the case. This world is not eternally existent. Scientific evidence for the Big Bang alone tells us that. Nor did the world come into existence by itself. Reason tells us that. For, in order for the creation to come into being "by itself," it would have to create itself, and that would mean it was in existence before it was created. In other words, it would have had to be and not be at the same time and in the same relationship, which is absurd. The only rational view of origins is that God made everything.

The consequence of this for Christians is that the cosmos—the creation—has value, not because humans ascribe value to it but because God created it and it is therefore valuable to him. Here we have a fundamental divergence between the Christian and the non-Christian outlooks.

Because Christians view the creation as God's handiwork, they respect and value the cosmos but do not worship it as an end in itself. Those who do not understand that God is Creator of the cosmos either worship the universe, which I have suggested Carl Sagan comes very close to doing, or else they abuse it, stripping it of anything that is of value to themselves. People cut down entire forests, allowing the earth to erode uselessly away. Or they poison their water, killing the fish and endangering their own health. Or they pollute the air, perhaps even damaging the protective ozone layer around the earth and thereby subjecting themselves and their descendants to the sun's destructive rays.

2. This world is not what it was created to be. The problems with the cosmos are not only those that the human race has inflicted on it, mostly destruction and pollution. The world has also been subjected to troubles as the result of God's judgment on man, rendered at the time of the fall. God told Adam, "Cursed is the ground because of you," and "It will produce thorns and thistles for you" (Gen. 3:17-18). Nature had not sinned; Adam had. But nature was subjected to a downgrading because of him and thus entered into his judgment. It is this trouble, the result of God's judgment on sin, that Paul is particularly concerned with in Romans. He uses three words to describe it.

First, frustration. This is the feeling we humans have when we know we should attain to some goal and are trying to reach it but are repeatedly thrown back or defeated. I want to go carefully at this point, since Paul does not explain exactly what he is thinking of. But let me suggest that (whether or not this is exactly what he has in mind) we have a picture of the creation's "frustration" in the way nature asserts itself in the annual renewal of springtime but is constantly defeated as spring passes into autumn and autumn into winter. It is as if nature wants always to be glorious but is impeded in its attempts to be so.

If that is a valid example, it leads me to think further to the way C. S. Lewis developed the idea in the first of his Narnia Chronicles, The Lion, the Witch, and the Wardrobe. You may recall that in the first section of that book, when Narnia was under the power of the wicked Witch of the North, the land was in a state of perpetual winter. Spring never came. But when Asian died and rose again, a picture of Christ's resurrection, the ice began to melt, flowers began to bloom, the trees turned green, and an eternal spring was brought into existence. Using that image, we could say that the cosmos as we know it is in a state of winter now but is looking forward to that eternal spring of which the diurnal springs we know here are only hints of what is promised.

Our winters, the "winters of our discontent," link us to inanimate nature in its and our own frustrations.

Second, bondage. The bondage of nature is linked to its frustration and is the cause of it. But bondage speaks of the actual state of things, while frustration has to do with the resulting feelings. Bondage literally means slavery, wherein one entity is unwillingly subjected to the authority of another. This is what Paul means here. He is saying that although nature does not want to be as it is, it is powerless to do anything about it. The creation needs to be delivered by God.

This is what redemption is all about, of course, which is why I have called this chapter "The Redemption of Creation." The creation longs for redemption, and it will have it when the children of God are likewise fully redeemed.

Third, decay. Nothing Paul says about creation is as obvious to today's scientific observers as this: the cosmos is decaying or running down. This is called the second law of thermodynamics. It is another scientific axiom that neither mass nor energy are destroyed but are only converted from one to the other. Einstein's formula of relativity, $E=Mc^2$, is an expression of this. But although, by this formula, energy is not being destroyed, it is nevertheless becoming increasingly dissipated, which means that it is becoming increasingly less useful. For example, the sun's energy is not being lost even though its mass is being converted into energy. But that energy is being dissipated into space, where it is not accomplishing anything, and one day the sun will use up its energy and be gone. The whole universe is like that. It is all running down, dissipating, becoming increasingly useless.

However, Paul was probably thinking specifically of death, which comes to all living things, rather than the scientific principles I mentioned, since he would hardly have known of these "laws" except by general observation. It is not only the sun that is dying, of course. Living creatures die, too.

3. The world will one day be renewed. The third point in a Christian doctrine of creation is that, in spite of creation's current frustration, bondage, and decay, the day is coming when the world will be renewed. Spring will come, and the winter of creation's present discontent will be past history.

I am not sure how to understand this, though I know the options. Some people think of the redemption of creation in terms of the millennium, when Christ will rule on earth and a glorious "golden age" will be ushered in. Some think of this as a future eternal state, intangible and quite cut off from this present age of imperfection and suffering. Perhaps the closest we can come (and still be fairly sure we are on the right track) is by an analogy to the "redemption of our bodies," which is brought into the picture in verse 24. The redemption of our bodies means the resurrection of our bodies. So perhaps this is what creation will experience, a resurrection. In our resurrections we will have a continuity of our bodies (our earthly bodies will be raised), but our bodies will be different, heavenly, glorified. Creation will probably experience something like that, too.

Isn't this what the text must mean when it says, "Creation itself will be liberated from its bondage to decay and brought into the glorious freedom of the children of God" (v. 21)?

Paradise Regained

A few paragraphs back I traced the origin of the world's troubles to Genesis 3, where we are told that creation was subjected to the "frustration" described by Paul because of the sin of our first parents. I return to that chapter now, since in Genesis 3 we also find the promise of God's solution to the problem, which puts the redemption of creation in proper context.

What happened in the Garden of Eden is that Satan, the great enemy of God, tried to impede God's plans to create a world of men and women who would know and love him. Satan thought that if he could get the man and woman to rebel against God, he would defeat God's purpose. When he accomplished their fall, he thought he had done so. Indeed, he seemed to have done even better. For not only did he draw our first parents away from God, he brought the judgment of God upon creation itself. That beautiful world was tarnished, spoiled. It began to decay, and the creatures who had caused its fall and God's judgment soon added their own destructive efforts to its ruin.

Ah, but God intervened. It is true that God came in judgment on Satan and on the woman and the man and the world they had known. But even as he pronounced a judgment upon Satan, God also gave a promise of a future deliverer, saying, "And I will put enmity between you and the woman, and between your offspring and hers; he will crush your head, and you will strike his heel" (Gen. 3:15). This was a promise that Jesus would come one day to save all who would believe on him, but it was also more than that. It was a promise that in Christ God would frustrate Satan, undo his destructive works, and once again bring a redeemed human race into a redeemed creation. The promise was that Paradise will be perfected and regained.

As I said, I do not know what all this is going to mean, anymore than I know exactly what our resurrection bodies will be like. But I know how the prophet Isaiah speaks of it. In that day, he says:

> The wolf will live with the lamb, the leopard will lie down with the goat, > the calf and the lion and the yearling together; and a little child will lead them.
> The cow will feed with the bear, their young will lie down together, and the lion will eat straw like the ox.
> The infant will play near the hole of the cobra, and the young child put his hand into the viper's nest.
> They will neither harm nor destroy on all my holy mountain,
> For the earth will be full of the knowledge of the LORD as the waters cover the sea.

Isaiah 11:6-9

Poetical? Of course, but what a powerful picture of the redeemed world that will be! The creation is waiting for that day, says Paul. And if it is, can we not wait in hopeful expectation, too? And be faithful children of God?

Looking to Jesus

What I am commending to you is a Christian perspective on this life and all we know in it, what the theologians call a world-and-life view. And I am suggesting, as Paul does, that adopting it will rearrange your values and change your approach to suffering and the disappointments of life. If you learn to reason as Paul does, you will experience the following:

1. You will not be surprised when things go wrong in this life. This world is not a good place. We live in a fallen environment. Your plans will misfire, you will often fail, others will destroy what you have spent long years and much toil to accomplish. This will be true even if you are a Christian and are trying to follow Jesus. But your successes are not what life is all about. What matters is your love for God and your faithfulness.

2. You will not place your ultimate hope in anything human beings can do to improve this world's conditions. This does not mean that you will fail to do what good you can do in this life as well as encourage others in their efforts to do good. As a Christian, you will. But you will not delude yourself into thinking that the salvation of the world's ills will be brought about by mere human efforts. You will feed the poor, but you will know that Jesus said, "The poor you will always have with you" (Matt. 26:11a). You will pray for your leaders, but you will know that they are but sinful men and women like yourself and that they will always disappoint you.

3. You will keep your eyes on Jesus. Where else can you look? All others are disappointing, and everything is crumbling about you. Only he is worthy of your trust. He has promised to return in his glory, and we know that when he does return and we see him in his glory, we will be like him

(1 John 3:2). Moreover, when we are made like him in his glory, the creation that is also straining forward to that day will become glorious, too.

No wonder the early Christians prayed, "Maranatha!" Come, Lord Jesus!

Chapter 106.
The Redemption of Our Bodies

Romans 8:22-25

In the passage of Romans 8 that begins with verse 22, and (in the following paragraph) ends with verse 27, we find a word that is repeated three times and yet is found nowhere else in this letter. In fact, it is found only six more times in the entire New Testament. It is the Greek word stenazō (variants, sustenazō and stenagmos), and it is translated "groan" (v. 23), "groans" (v. 26), and "groaning" (v. 22). The interesting thing is that it is applied to three different entities in these verses: to creation, to ourselves, and to the Holy Spirit.

Of creation Paul says, "We know that the whole creation has been groaning as in the pains of childbirth right up to the present time" (v. 22).

Of ourselves he says, "Not only so, but we ourselves, who have the firstfruits of the Spirit, groan inwardly as we wait eagerly for our adoption as sons, the redemption of our bodies" (v. 23).

Of the Holy Spirit he says, "... We do not know what we ought to pray for, but the Spirit himself intercedes for us with groans that words cannot express" (v. 26).

Two of these references are hard to understand. Since Paul is thinking of the inanimate creation and not men, angels, or demons in verse 22, it is hard to imagine how mere matter or even plants or animals can be conceived of as groaning. It is also difficult to envision the Holy Spirit's groans, though for different reasons. The one part of these verses that is not difficult to understand is our groaning, since groaning is a part of daily life with which almost anyone can easily identify.

Still, we need to see two things about this human groaning if we are to understand the verses to which we now come.

First, the groaning mentioned in verse 23 is that of believers in Jesus Christ and not that of all people generally. Paul makes this explicit when he writes that "we ourselves, who have the firstfruits of the Spirit, groan inwardly." I do not think this excludes the kind of groanings that Christians share with other people, expressions of grief caused by physical suffering or the loss of a loved one, for instance. But it means more. Christians grieve over the presence of sin in their lives, which unbelievers do not. In fact, believers grieve for sin increasingly as they grow in Christ. Christians also groan as the result of persecutions suffered for the sake of their life and witness, and this is also different from what non-Christians experience.

Second, the groaning of Christians is not mere grief over the things I mentioned. It is expectant grief, that is, grief that looks forward to a time when all that is causing pain will be removed and salvation will be consummated. Christian groaning is a joyful grief that gives birth to a sure hope and patient endurance.

The passage itself shows this, since hope and patience are the notes on which the verses end. But there is also a powerful image at the start of this paragraph that shows how the groans of Christians are to be interpreted. Paul uses the image of childbirth: "... the whole creation has been groaning as in the pains of childbirth" (v. 22), adding that "we ourselves... [also] groan" (v. 23). This is an important analogy, because it points beyond the cause of grief to its joyful consummation. The pains of childbirth are real pains, severe ones. But they are not endless; they last only for a time. Nor are they hopeless. On the contrary, they are filled with joyful expectation, since under normal circumstances they climax in the birth of a child.

Paul is saying that our griefs as Christians are like that. We groan, but we do so in expectation of a safe delivery.

Groans and Glory

This is a thoughtful continuation of the arguments Paul has been working out since the beginning of Romans 8. The theme of the chapter is the Christian's assurance that he or she has been saved by Christ and will be kept in this salvation by the love and power of God the Father.

The first part of the chapter distinguished between those who are truly saved and those who are not. Paul was aware of the dangers of presumption, of claiming an assurance that one has no right to unless one's conduct shows that the Spirit of Jesus Christ really is within. But having made that point—that those who are Christ's will live for Christ—Paul then got into his major argument, showing that true Christians can know they are saved and be confident in that assurance. We have seen that there are four proofs: (1) the fact that those who are Christians really do live for Christ; (2) the internal sense Christians have of being members of God's family; (3) the Holy Spirit's direct witness with our spirits; and (4) suffering. Paul said, "Now if we are children, then we are heirs—heirs of God and co-heirs with Christ, if indeed we share in his sufferings in order that we may also share in his glory" (v. 17).

But that is a problem, as we saw when we studied that verse. Sufferings? We would think that it would be the absence of sufferings, not their presence, that would prove we belong to Christ. If God loves us, shouldn't he keep us from suffering? Or isn't he able to? When things get hard it is natural that we begin to doubt God's favor rather than being assured of it.

That, of course, is why Paul has digressed to talk about suffering and why he is talking about our groanings now. It is why he has explained the involvement of creation in our present distress. What he is saying is that the sufferings we and "the whole creation" endure are the sufferings of childbirth and are therefore proof that the new age is coming. And it is why, although we do groan, we do not groan hopelessly. On the contrary, our groanings intensify our hope and enable us to wait patiently for the consummation.

The Resurrection of the Body

These verses also do something else that is important. They give substance to the Christian hope.
That is, they begin to flesh out the main features of the consummation for which we are waiting.
In verse 23 this is done by means of three word pictures or images: (1) "the firstfruits of the Spirit," (2) "our adoption as sons," and (3) "the redemption of our bodies." It is easiest to take them in reverse order.

What does Paul mean by the redemption of our bodies? This is an easy question to answer: he means the resurrection, the chief element in the hope of Christians.

This is an important idea to bring in at this point for at least two reasons. First, Paul has been talking about our sufferings, and it is chiefly in our bodies that we experience them. Physical suffering, whether from illness or abuse inflicted by persecutors, is experienced in the body. And there is even a sense in which psychological wounds are physical, though we do not usually think of them that way. We experience them in our minds, which are hard to distinguish from mere brain matter and neurological connections, but the effects are often directly physiological since they are seen in such things as sleeplessness, ulcers, hypertension, and other maladies.

Second, we are our bodies, as well as our spirits and souls. Therefore, salvation must include our bodies if it is to be complete.

Suppose someone should ask you, "Are you saved?" How would you answer? As a Christian it would be proper to answer in three ways. You could say, "Yes, I have been saved." In that case, you would be pointing back to the death of Jesus Christ on your behalf and to that past work of the Holy Spirit in turning you from a path of sin and joining you to Jesus. You could also say, "I am being saved." If you said that, you would be pointing to the continuing work of the Holy Spirit in your life, much as Paul did in the earlier part of this chapter. You would be thinking of the Spirit's work of sanctification. Finally, you could also say, "I am going to be saved." In that case, you would be thinking of the resurrection, when the work of God—begun by the death of Christ and continued by the work of the Holy Spirit in joining you to Jesus and sanctifying you—will be completed. Paul is thinking of that consummation here.

But there is one more question directly related to our text. Paul is writing about the Christian's resurrection, but that is not the word he uses to refer to it. He calls it "the redemption of our bodies." Redemption usually refers to the work of Christ in delivering us from sin's bondage by his death. Why does Paul use "redemption" instead of "resurrection" here?

Robert Haldane, one of the best of all commentators on Romans, suggests an interesting answer:

When this term is... used, it commonly denotes two things—the one, that the deliverance spoken of is effected in a manner glorious and conspicuous, exhibiting the greatest effort of power; the other, that it is a complete deliverance, placing us beyond all danger. On this ground, then, it is evident that no work is better entitled to the appellation of redemption than that of the reestablishment of our bodies, which will be an illustrious effect of the infinite power of God. It is the work of the Lord of nature—of him who holds in his hands the keys of life and death. His light alone can dispel the darkness of the tomb. It is only his hand that can break its seal and its silence. On this account the apostle appeals, with an accumulation of terms, to the exceeding greatness of the power of God to us-ward who believe, according to the working of his mighty power, which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead (Eph. 1:19, 20).

It is no wonder that we groan in these bodies. They are the seat of physical weakness, on the one hand, and of our sinful natures, on the other. But we groan in hope, knowing that these weak and sinful bodies are going to be transformed into bodies that are strong, sinless, and glorious, like the resurrection body of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Our Adoption as Sons

The second image that Paul offers of our sure hope of future glory is "adoption," speaking of "our adoption as sons." This is the same word that we have already seen in verse 15, where it was translated "sonship."

But that creates a problem. In verse 15 our adoption was treated as something that has already taken place. That is the way we considered it when we were at that point in the chapter. I spoke of our having been taken out of the family of Satan and having been brought into the family of God. It corresponds to the way a young couple today might adopt a child who has no parents or has parents who are unable to care for him or her. But in verse 23 adoption is treated as something still in the future, something for which "we wait eagerly." How can adoption be both past and future at the same time?

The answer, of course, is that the word is used in two senses. In one sense we have already received our adoption, since we have been brought into God's family. Nothing is ever going to change that family relationship. Yet in a second sense we still wait for our adoption, because we do not yet enjoy all its privileges.

I am convinced that when Paul speaks of "our adoption as sons" in verse 23, he is thinking of the special Roman custom of adoption and not of what we usually think of when someone uses that word. The Romans (as well as the Greeks) had adoption in our sense, that is, when a child is taken out of one family and is placed into another. But the Romans also had an important ceremony in which the son of a leading Roman family would be acknowledged publicly as the son and heir. It corresponded somewhat to the Jews' bar mitzvah, when a Jewish boy becomes a "son of the covenant," though among Romans it was less religious and more a matter of adulthood and the right of inheritance.

In the opening pages of Lloyd C. Douglas's religious novel The Robe, the young daughter of the Gallio family, Lucia, is reflecting on the day her brother Marcellus was adopted in such a ceremony. Marcellus was seventeen years old. Douglas writes, "What a wonderful day that was, with all their good friends assembled in the Forum to see Marcellus—clean-shaven for the first time in his life—step forward to receive his white toga. Cornelius Capito and Father had made speeches, and then they had put the white toga on Marcellus. Lucia had been so proud and happy that her heart had pounded and her throat had hurt, though she was only nine then, and couldn't know much about the ceremony except that Marcellus was expected to act like a man now— though sometimes he forgot to."

Later Marcellus describes the occasion to a friend named Paulus: "When a Roman of our sort comes of age, Paulus, there is an impressive ceremony by which we are inducted into manhood.... Well do I remember—the thrill of it abides with me still—how all of our relatives and friends assembled, that day, in the stately Forum Julium. My father made an address, welcoming me into Roman citizenship. It was as if I had never lived until that hour. I was so deeply stirred, Paulus, that my eyes swam with tears. And then good old Cornelius Capito made a speech, a very serious one, about Rome's right to my loyalty, my courage, and my strength. I knew that tough old Capito had a right to talk of such matters, and I was proud that he was there! They beckoned to me, and I stepped forward. Capito and my father put the white toga on me— and life had begun!"

As I say, I am convinced that this is what Paul has in mind in verse 23. You will recall that earlier he had spoken of our being "heirs of God and coheirs of Christ, if indeed we share in his sufferings" (v. 17). We are sharing in the sufferings now, but the day is coming when we shall enter into the full rights of our inheritance in glory.

Firstfruits and the Full Harvest

The third picture of the consummation to which believers in Christ are moving is a harvest, suggested by the words "firstfruits of the Spirit." This does not refer to the fruit of the Spirit, as Paul does in Galatians ("But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness and self-control," Gal. 5:22-23). It refers to the Holy Spirit himself as the "firstfruits," which is a harvest image drawn from Jewish life.

The custom is described in Leviticus 23:9-14, which says in part, "When you enter the land I am going to give you and you reap its harvest, bring to the priest a sheaf of the first grain you harvest. He is to wave the sheaf before the LORD so it will be accepted on your behalf; the priest is to wave it on the day after the Sabbath" (vv. 10, 11). The portion of the harvest presented to the priest was called the firstfruits, and it was in the nature of an offering that consecrated the entire harvest. In this Old Testament ceremony the firstfruits were something the devout Jewish worshiper gave God. But in the New Testament Paul usually reverses this and speaks of the firstfruits as what God gives us as an earnest or down payment on the full blessings to come.

The full blessing is the harvest, a joyful time for which those who labor are willing to endure great hardship.

John Stott sums this up by saying, "So the Holy Spirit, who is the Spirit of sonship and makes us the children of God (v. 15), and then witnesses with our spirit that we are God's children (v. 16), is also himself the pledge of our complete adoption to be the sons of God, when our bodies are redeemed." In this, as also in the development of the other two themes, we are reminded of some of the things Paul said earlier.

Hope and Patient Endurance

At the beginning of this study I discussed the word groan, pointing out that it is used of the creation, ourselves, and the Holy Spirit. I said that the usage we understand best is our own groaning, since we groan in our bodily weakness and fleshly sins. But groaning is not the only thing Paul says we do. He also says that "we hope" (v. 25) and "we wait" (vv. 23, 25), adding in the later case that we do it both "eagerly" and "patiently."

1. We hope. Hope is one of the very great words of the Christian vocabulary, occurring in such important phrases as our "blessed hope" (Titus 2:13) and "the hope of glory" (Col. 1:27). It is one of the three great virtues listed in 1 Corinthians 13:13 ("These three remain: faith, hope and love"). Paul has already written about hope in Romans 5: "... we know that suffering produces perseverance; perseverance, character; and character, hope. And hope does not disappoint us, because God has poured out his love into our hearts by the Holy Spirit, whom he has given us" (vv. 3-5).

The word hope has two senses: (1) an attitude of hopefulness, and (2) the content of that for which we hope. Both uses of the word occur in our text, the idea of content in verse 24 ("in this hope we were saved") and the attitude of hopefulness in verses 24 and 25 ("we hope").

What is striking about the Christian attitude of hopefulness is that it is a "sure and certain hope" and not mere wishful thinking. What makes it sure and certain is the content. The specific content is the return of Jesus Christ together with the things we have been mentioning in these verses: the resurrection of the body, the adoption of God's children, and the gathering of God's harvest. These things are all promised to us by God. Hence, the Christian hopes in confidence, a confidence grounded not in the strength of one's emotional outlook but on the sure Word of God, who cannot lie. If God says that these things are coming, it is reasonable and safe for us to hope confidently in them.

2. We wait. More specifically, we wait for them, which is the second verb Paul uses. Verse 23 says, "We wait eagerly." Verse 25 says, "We wait... patiently." It is important to take the two adverbs together, because biblical "patience" is not passivity. This is an active, though patient waiting. It expresses itself in vigorous service for Christ even while we wait for his appearing.

The word eagerly makes us think of the creation waiting ("in eager expectation for the sons of God to be revealed," which Paul introduced in verse 19, though the Greek words are not the same. In verse 19 Paul pictured creation standing on tiptoe, as it were, looking forward with outstretched neck in eager anticipation of the consummation. It is a grand picture, and it is what we are to be doing, too. It is one mark of a true Christian.

Here is how D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones puts it:

Hope is the measure of true Christianity, which is through and through other-worldly. PseudoChristianity always looks chiefly at this world. Popular Christianity is entirely this-worldly and is not interested in the other world. But true Christianity has its eye mainly on the world which is to come. It is not primarily concerned even with deliverance from hell, and punishment, and all the things that trouble us and weary us. That really belongs to the past. True Christianity "sets its affection on things which are above, not on things which are on the earth." It is that which says, "We look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal" (2 Cor. 4:17, 18).

Paradoxically, of course, it is only these heavenly-minded people who are able to make any real or lasting difference in the world.

Chapter 107.
The Holy Spirit's Help in Prayer

Romans 8:26-27

I do not know of any subject that has caused more perplexity for more Christians than the subject of prayer, unless perhaps it is the matter of knowing God's will. And, of course, the two are related. They are related in this text as well as in other places, for the verses we are now studying speak of the Holy Spirit's help in prayer, concluding that "he who searches our hearts knows the mind of the Spirit, because the Spirit intercedes for the saints in accordance with God's will" (v. 27, emphasis added).

Christians who want to pray in accordance with God's will find themselves asking: What should I pray for? How should I pray? Can I pray with confidence, "claiming" things by faith? Or do I have to make my prayers tentative, adding always, "If it be your will"?

What happens if I pray wrongly? Can prayer do harm? Does prayer get God to change his mind? Can it change God's plans? If not, does it even matter if I pray?

As I say, I do not know any subject that has caused more perplexity and been more of a continuing problem for more believers than this one. But we have help in this area, the help of the Holy Spirit, which is great indeed. It is what Romans 8:26 and 27 are about.

"In the Same Way"

These verses begin with the phrase "in the same way." So we first need to ask what this refers to. It is a connecting phrase, of course, and most of the commentators link it to what immediately precedes. That is, they link it to the Christian's hope. The idea seems to be that we endure sufferings in this life but that we are able to handle them in two ways: first, by hope, that is, by a sure and patient looking forward to the final redemption of our bodies; and second, by the help of the Holy Spirit in prayer.

That is a valid connection, of course. But I think that D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones is right when he links the apostle's teaching about prayer in verses 26-27 to his teaching about prayer in verses 15-17. The earlier passage taught that the Holy Spirit enables us to pray, assuring us that we truly are God's children and encouraging us to cry out "Abba, Father." That teaching was followed by an extensive digression dealing with the sufferings endured in this life before we come into God's presence. But then, having dealt with sufferings, Paul returns once more to the Spirit's work in enabling us to pray, adding that the Spirit also "helps us in our weakness" (v. 26).

In other words, Paul returns to the subject of assurance, which is the chapter's main theme. The point of these two verses is that the Holy Spirit's help in prayer is another way we can know that we are God's children and that nothing will ever separate us from his love.

Is Prayer a Problem?

A number of years ago the Bible Study Hour, on which I am the speaker, offered a small booklet containing several messages by another writer and myself and entitled "Is Prayer a Problem?" For most people it obviously is, as I suggested above. So the most important question is not the one in the title of that booklet but rather: Why is prayer a problem? Furthermore, what's to be done about it? At this point our text is extremely helpful.

Let's take the first question—Why is prayer a problem?—and deal with that. Paul answers that it is because of "our weakness."

When Paul speaks of our weakness, it is important to realize that he is not speaking of sin. Weakness is not sin. It is true that we are sinners and often sin and that sin is a barrier to communication with God. David said of his prayer life, "If I had cherished sin in my heart, the LORD would not have listened" (Ps. 66:18). Isaiah told the Israelites, "But your iniquities have separated you from your God" (Isa. 59:2a). But that is not what is being spoken of here. The problem Paul is concerned with is weakness, and this is not sin but rather is grounded in our frailty as human beings.

What kinds of weakness are there? Physical weakness is one kind. The story of the disciples who were left by Jesus in the Garden of Gethsemane to pray provides one illustration. They kept falling asleep even though Jesus had instructed them to stay awake and pray with him.

But in Romans 8 the weakness Paul has in mind is ignorance or a lack of understanding. It is expressed in the fact that "we do not know what we ought to pray for." This is not a question of how to pray but of what to pray. Paul means that we do not know what we should ask of God. What is God's will for us or others? In our human limitations we simply do not know and therefore do not know how to pray rightly.

Notice that when Paul writes the word weakness he adds the word our, thereby putting himself in an identical position. In other words, the weakness that makes prayer difficult is not something that only new, baby, or immature Christians have. It is part of our common human condition.

Even the greatest saints have had this difficulty.

Let me offer four illustrations.

First, there is the case of Job. I pick Job because he had the testimony of God that he was a righteous man: "Have you considered my servant Job? There is no one on earth like him; he is blameless and upright, a man who fears God and shuns evil" (Job 1:8). There was no outstanding sin in Job that might have been a barrier between him and God. Yet, because of the things that happened to him, Job was a confused man. He did not know why he was suffering as he was. His comforters thought they knew. They would not have had any difficulty praying, at least about Job. They had it all figured out—incorrectly. Job, who knew his heart, had no answers. He prayed, "Why have you made me your target? Have I become a burden to you? Why do you not pardon my offenses and forgive my sins?..." (Job. 7:20b-21).

Elijah is another example. This great prophet was a courageous man, having stood against the powerful prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel and by God's provision having won a great victory. Yet after the battle he was so emotionally and physically drained that he retreated to the desert fearing Jezebel, who had threatened to kill him. What did he pray? He asked to die, arguing, "I have had enough, LORD. Take my life; I am no better than my ancestors" (1 Kings 19:4). That much was true; he was no better. But it was still a confused and foolish prayer, since God had more for him to do.

Job teaches that a man can be righteous and still not know what to pray. Elijah teaches that a person can be courageous and have the same problem.

A third example is Mary Magdalene. Her chief characteristic was love. She loved Jesus greatly. Still, love was no defense against ignorance or a lack of understanding. She had not the faintest idea what God was doing in the death and resurrection of Jesus. So when she met Jesus in the garden after the resurrection, thinking him to be the gardener, she asked, "Sir, if you have carried him away, tell me where you have put him, and I will get him" (John 20:15). She was deeply devout, yet confused nonetheless.

